NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Under the title, "A London Lourdes," the Pall Mall Gazette prints a letter detailing some singular cures by the sole means of "the prayer of faith." The Rev. W. E. Boardman is at the head of the mission which is located in a house called Bethshan in the north of London, and the alleged cures are very remarkable. The anonymous correspondent has "been present at more than one of their meetings, and has heard many personal testimonies to a complete cure from almost 'all the ills that flesh is heir to.'" The mission has been in existence six months, and Mr. Boardman states that "there have been about one hundred remarkable cures, including every variety of disease, cancer, paralysis, deafness, consumption, chronic rheumatism, and lameness, many trophies, in the form of crutches, being left behind." No medicines are administered; only implicit faith is exacted. "Many of the cures," we are oddly told, "are said to have been effected by correspondence. The patient is usually anointed with oil, and, after prayer, an immediate cure is looked for." This is peremptory. One would like to know in what proportion of cases the expectation is realised. This whole question of psychopathy is well worth carefully sifting. I propose to return to it shortly. Meantime, I should like Bethshan looked into.

The Theosophist does me the honour of reprinting entire my review of "The Stars and the Earth," a courtesy for which my acknowledgments are due, and asks, whether I "suspect its author." Beyond the fact that the MS. arrived at Messrs. Balliere's with a £50 note to pay for publication, my knowledge does not go. I should be glad to know who is the writer of what I think a very remarkable booklet.

I note that the headquarters of the Theosophical Society are about to be moved from Breach Candy, Bombay, to Adyar, Madras, which is the address in the future to which all communications are to be sent. It is pleasant to congratulate our friends on this move, which is a resultant necessity of increased usefulness. The spread of the T. S. in India exceeds all anticipation.

The receipt of the first Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research leads the Theosophist to remark a series of coincidences. The first meeting of the S.P.R. was held "as, seven years before, the first meeting of the T.S. was held, on the seventeenth of the month: in July, the seventh month of the year: and the members then numbered seventy-five." "Omen faustum," remarks the Theosophist. "Amen," say I.

The December number of the Theosophist contains a remarkable article entitled, "Letters on Theosophy; the Secret Doctrine"—in which the writer sets himself to state the possible reasons which may influence the Himalayan Brothers in doling out so scantily their store of knowledge. It is, in effect, that they foresee that what they have to tell "is calculated to have a very momentous effect on the welfare of mankind." He assumes that what these mysterious persons are possessed of is "the positive truth" (a very considerable postulate it seems to me), and he then says: "The first effect on the minds of all who come to understand it is terribly iconoclastic. It drives out before it everything else in the shape of religious belief." There is something curiously, startlingly, grotesque in the notion of these mysterious unknowns sitting aloft on a Himalayan slope, secure in the possession of absolute truth, which of itself and necessarily kills all the various forms of error that the world busies itself with, while Christian and Brahmin, Mahomedan, Jew, and the rest of us play our little farce, and fancy that we have a revelation from God, and a moral code that is not worthless. These men, we are to learn, are the sole depositories of the knowledge of good and evil; they see a world wallowing in error, men dying in religious faiths that are merely foolish when not mischievous; they can illuminate the darkness, if they only will. And yet they only make the faintest sign with the greatest reluctance! On the assumption of the writer, no graver indictment could be brought against any man by his bitterest foe.

"H. X.," in the Theosophist, touches on the question of a Personal and Impersonal God which has so gravely exercised the Spectator in reference to Mr. Stock's book. The Reviewer cannot for the life of him understand an impersonal Deity—a Deity "without body, parts, and passions"—and he is much concerned to know what manner of man Mr. Stock can be. He has been called, or has called himself, a Materialist, an Atheist, an Atheistic Spiritualist, a Positivist, and a Pantheist, not to mention other nicely differentiated epithets. One wonders much why a logical conception of the Great First Cause, such as "H. X." elaborates, and such as Mr. Stock would probably agree with, should so vex righteous souls. Is the human body the highest conceivable shrine of spirit? Can we not imagine a God not so baldly and bluntly anthropomorphic? But why, indeed, should we vex ourselves at all with vain imaginings? "H. X." puts it well; "Let us remember above all that in this present life the high theoretical questions of Personal, Impersonal, and No-God are of less concern to us than our own every-day life, about the right conduct of which no similar difficulties exist."

Fas et ab hoste doceri. Mrs. Lynn Linton has published a second edition of her "Witch Stories,"* a collection of more than a hundred narratives which will possess more interest and value for Spiritualists than they do for Mrs. Linton. Indeed it is not apparent why she has taken the trouble to gather these records of superstition, as she views them. For to her they must be melancholy little tales, the moral of which the Pall Mall Gazette has told her. They should remind her, her Mentor would say, that she, even she, is separated only by a few generations from these dark days of ignorance and crime, when it was believed that evil spirits not only existed, but that they had power to possess and ruin those who invited them; when diabolic possession was believed to be a fact by other men than Jesus Christ and His disciples: and when ignorance was so rampant that many of these poor mediums, called witches, were foully killed to rid the world of the devil. So these tales should point a moral for their collector—a kind of “memento mori,” with a difference. To us they are simply a useful collection of authentic stories, none the worse for our purposes that they are gathered by the hand of an unbeliever.

Facts, of which I have seen only a single number, that for September last, seems to be the embodiment of an excellent idea. It is a collection of “facts” which tend to prove “the intellectual part of man to be immortal.” It is a quarterly publication, and is excellent in style and typography. The facts are recorded on the authority of those who narrate them, and whose names are prefixed to their recitals. Many of the records have been told at “fact-meetings” at Onset Bay, Lake Pleasant, and Queen City Park. Regular meetings, we are told, are now held at Horticultural Hall, Boston, U.S.A., on every Saturday, at 3 p.m. The Society puts forward a programme not unlike that of the Society for Psychical Research, except that it does not appear to undertake personal investigation. It is “especially anxious to hear from everyone who has been present at the dying of persons who have appeared to see their spirit-friends; also from those having had notable visions or dreams which foretold what afterwards proved to be true . . . in fact, to learn of all classes of remarkable phenomena coming from believers of any creed.” The idea, if due care is used in sifting and verifying offered narratives, is excellent, and I entertain no doubt that the editor is on the right track, and cordially wish his venture all success. The address of the Fact Publishing Company is P.O. Box 3,539, Boston, Mass., U.S.A.

PREMONITION OF DEATH.

A correspondent sends us the following:—“A St. Columb girl helps in a shop at St. Austell, and we went to see her, and she gave us this narrative. One of the sisters keeping the shop was in bad health, and it was arranged to take a cottage at Fowey, on the south coast of Cornwall, where she went for a change, taking with her the St. Columb girl I have mentioned. The father of the invalid came to Fowey to see them, and spent a fortnight, after which he was determined to go home, though there was no particular reason for his doing so, for though I think he was known to have some weakness of the heart, he appeared to be in good health. He returned to St. Austell on the Tuesday, I think, and the girls were left alone in the cottage. On the Thursday evening the bells in the cottage began to ring in an extraordinary way just after the girls had gone to bed, at nine or thereabouts; and they heard heavy steps come up and stop under their window, but on looking out they could see nothing, though it was bright moonlight. Just afterwards they heard a sound as of a heavy fall in their bedroom, and all night the noises continued more or less; but about two they got very bad indeed, and they again heard the heavy steps, exactly like the invalid's father's, come up and stop under their window, but this time they had not courage to look out. This was at half-past two, and afterwards all was quiet. The father at St. Austell was taken ill that evening, and died at half-past two.”

MRS. HARDINGE-BRITTEN'S LECTURE APPOINTMENTS.—LONDON: St. Andrew's Hall, Newman-street, Oxford-street, W., January 7th and 14th.—Address, The Limes, Humphrey-street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

MR. JOHN S. FARMER begs to tender his sincere apologies to all who have received from him an insufficiently paid letter during the past few days. The mistake inadvertently arose from a misconception of the postal regulations. Mr. Farmer will be very glad, as a matter of business, to refund the amount paid by any of his correspondents, together with the cost of applying for its return.—4, New Bridge-street, E.C.—Adet.

OUR BETTER MOMENTS.

To the Editor of “LIGHT.”

SIR,—On looking over some old papers I came across the accompanying verses, written by my younger brother, Herbert Edward Wallace, in 1850, a few months before his death from yellow fever, at Para, at the early age of twenty-two. They seem to me to be so truly spiritual in feeling as to deserve preserving in your pages. I need hardly say that at that time we had neither of us heard anything of the spiritual movement.

Godalming,

ALFRED R. WALLACE.

Our Better Moments.

Uncalled they come across the mind,
We know not why or how,
And with instinctive reverence
Ignoble feelings bow;
A power strange, yet holy too,
Breathes through our every sense;
Each atom of our being feels
Its subtle influence.
High visions, noble thinkings, flash
Like meteors through the brain,
If Paradise was lost to us,
’Tis surely come again!

Better moments! Better moments! Ye are sunny angels’ wings,
Sent to shed a holier radiance o’er all dim and worldly things.

Perchance we love to watch awhile,
In simple, child-like mood,
The waving of the summer grass,
The ebbing of the flood,
And lie upon a mossy bank,
In some secluded shade;
When sudden, from before our gaze
The grass—the waters—fade;
And giving up the spirit’s rein
To unknown guiding hands,
We float in passive confidence
To voiceless spirit lands.

Better moments! Better moments! Ye are sunny angels’ wings,
Sent to shed a holier radiance o’er all dim and worldly things.

Or sitting in a leafy wood,
Some still and breathless hour,
The joyous twitter of a bird
Has strange unconscious power:
The power to send through ev’ry nerve
A thrill of soft delight.
A better moment, like the dawn,
Steals in with ambient light.
The soul expands, and lovingly
Takes in its pure embrace,
All life! all nature! high or mean,
Of colour, tongue, or race.

Better moments! Better moments! ye are sunny angels’ wings,
Sent to shed a holier radiance o’er all dim and worldly things.

A thousand visions, scenes, and times
Awake the better thought,
By which our duller years of life
Become inspired and taught.
In olden times there rudely came
Handwriting on the wall,
And prostrate souls fell horror-struck
At that wild spirit-call;
But now God’s momentary gleam
Is sent into the soul,
To guide uncertain wavering feet
To life’s high solemn goal.

Better moments! Better moments! Ye are sunny angels’ wings,
Sent to shed a holier radiance o’er all dim and worldly things.

BELIEF IN GHOSTS.—A correspondent informs us that at a somewhat excited meeting of “The Old Boys’ Debating Society,” Bradford, on December 14th, the motion “That this House believes in Ghosts,” was carried by a large majority.

MRS. HARDINGE-BRITTEN.—As we announced last week, a reception will be given to Mrs. Britten on Monday evening next, at 38, Great Russell-street, at 7 p.m. The Council of the C.A.S. are earnestly desirous that there should be a good attendance. In the course of the evening, Mrs. Britten will, under spirit-control, answer questions on spiritual topics. Admission will be free both to members and friends.

SOME SPIRITUALISTIC REMINISCENCES.

By Martin F. Tupper.

Having often been asked to put on record my few and far-between experiences of Spiritualism, as on several occasions I have verbally related them, I have hitherto neglected or declined to do so, on account of having really seen little, whereas many others have seen far more. And on the whole it is to me rather an unwelcome task from several considerations; first, because I have never wished to add, by my apparent testimony, to the rising tide of unwholesome superstition in that or any other direction; secondly, because I had always a crowd of more important matters to look after, and, perhaps, was inclined to indolence in the “dolce far niente” respecting things of less consequence to myself; and thirdly, in chief, because, albeit I have seen and heard a few of the petty miracles (avouched for otherwise by thousands of better witnesses) inexplicable to my own reason, I yet entirely abjure and renounce this so-called Spiritualism as any part of my personal belief. In particular, it seems to me quite an inconclusion to give to the spirits of the dead, or to any other existences, good or evil (unless, indeed, by possibility to ourselves as magnetically and sympathetically influenced by some metaphysical potencies whereof we know next to nothing), the seemingly miraculous powers exhibited, however weakly and childishly, in numberless séances, privileged to possess among the company an ecstatic medium between (as is assumed) themselves and beings immaterial.

The little I have seen and heard shall, however, now, upon a reasonable call, be related simply and honestly, without any theory beyond what is parenthetically alluded to in my last sentence, and with no attempt at explanation, but only the expression of this truth, viz., that no collusion apparently was possible (according to my judgment) in any of the following manifestations, and that I promise only to state plain facts, however others may seek to expound them. Of course, where cunning and dishonesty may contrive conjuring tricks it is not worth while to treat such “manifestations” seriously, but I speak of what seemed to be genuine, if trifling, marvels.

To begin, then, with my earliest experience, written down the same evening, and sent to the Brighton Gazette, from which I give an extract. The date is Thursday, January 25th, 1849; the host, the late Mr. Howell, of Hove; the performer, Alexis, pupil of M. Marcelet, who accompanied him. After clairvoyance, induced by passes, Alexis is blindfolded carefully, and then, with the host's own pack of cards, wins blindfolded at games of carté with the writer. Next, a French book, brought by an incredulous physician, was placed open upon the forehead of Alexis, who read aloud some lines of it. This experiment, with variations, was several times repeated. The third was my own test. “The writer had sealed up something unknown to all the world but himself in twelve envelopes of white paper. Alexis, placing the parcel on his forehead, in broken and difficult enunciation, said ‘it was writing, two names, both commencing with M; one of them an English name, the other French, or some language not English; that the first contained four letters, the second six [being really nine],’ but he failed to guess the names, which were Mary Magdalene. It was suggested that if they had been written in French his mind might have more easily discerned them.” After this several locks of hair and sealed up parcels, watches, and lockets were (with some unsuccessful attempts) guessed at, seemingly to the satisfaction of the ladies and gentlemen who had respectively brought them for explanation. “The last experiment regarded a large bon-bon box, in which the host himself had concealed a mystery. Alexis described it as wrapped in several folds, graven all round, oval, a portrait of a young person of eighteen, but done a long time ago, set in gold, ‘femme habillée en blanc; elle est morte, la tête au droit.’ In all these respects the object was faithfully described, in particular to the ‘long time ago,’ which, by a date on the portrait, was found to be 1769.” And there were some other experiments, but Alexis, as appearing to be well-nigh worn out with mental exertion, was then mercifully unmesmerised. I have added: “In conclusion, the writer is startled but not convinced,” &c.; “The clairvoyance of Alexis is sufficiently wonderful to make one ready to admit that the mind of man may by possibility act independently of the bodily organs,” &c.

I may mention, by the way, that the said host at whose house Alexis attended was a firm believer in the power of the human will, and as connected therewith, in mesmerism, whereby he used to cure people of headaches and other infirmities; and, at length, through his philanthropic and energetic attraction to himself of other folks’ disorders (for he fancied he imbibed for his own behoof the pains he drained ab extrâ), he, unhappily, became a paralytic, dying not long after. One of his less perilous attempts at the miraculous, I remember, was this: he brought a street Arab into his drawing-room, and put a half-crown down on the carpet for him to pick it up if he could, and keep for himself; however, this the boy found, to his wonderment, to be practically impossible, seeing that Mr. Howell had secretly willed that he could not and should not pick up the prize. But such efforts of a man's strong will are well evidenced in numerous other instances, and serve to prove that no spiritual interferences beyond our noble selves are essential to such petty miracles.

Amongst other reminiscences of the marvellous, I may refer to a private exhibition in the Berners-street Hotel, to which I was invited by Mrs. Washington Phillips (of whom more anon), to investigate Mr. Vernon's influence over a little girl some twelve years old. The child's speciality was an alleged capability of reading without eyesight, the back of her head low down on the nape doing duty in the way of vision. To omit numerous other successful examples (some failing, which I thought so far evidences of the absence of collusion), I will detail my own conclusive experiment. But let me anticipate an objection relating to the exhibitor himself. Some of our party, a very distinguished one, and known to each other, kept Mr. Vernon in conversation at a distance, while the child was reading our thoughts, or the actual words of print unknown to ourselves, quite independently of his manipulations; he having first comatised her into a mesmeric state of trance. The invited guests were told, as in the Alexis case, that we might bring our own tests; and I had put into my pocket a small volume of Milton, from which she might read on the nape of her neck, if she could. We had previously bandaged her eyes, even to plastering them up; and were only bidden to be careful not to let the handkerchief cover the place of reverted seeing on her neck. I stood behind the child, and, without knowing where I opened my little Milton, placed the expanded volume on the back of her head; and forthwith, slowly and with difficulty, as a child might, she read two lines of blank verse, which I and all immediately verified! Now, I state a fact which I cannot explain; for I myself had not seen the lines, so my own brain was not read: neither could Mr. Vernon nor anyone else have been concerned in the matter. I believe this sort of thing to be well-known to Spiritualists, and they may, for aught I know, refer it to angelic or necromantic interposition: whereas, what physicians tell us of hypochondria is, perhaps, a mysterious explanation nearer the mark.

The same child, refreshed into an abnormal ecstasy, taking the hands of several of our party professed to read their thoughts, with admitted success in some instances. With me she failed, but then I was not considered en rapport. Female believers are always much more susceptible than masculine sceptics. However, I certainly had proof of the child's marvellous power in this slight matter following. Two young ladies had successfully brought her in spirit into their mother's drawing-room in Berkeley-square, the child graphically explaining all she saw as she was mentally led along, and on being asked if she noticed anything new and pretty on the mantel-piece, she got up and placed herself in an attitude of dancing, and she said there was a figure and it was clothed in lace. This was true; it was a bisque statuette of Tagliani. On being led round the room, still in spirit and clairvoyante, the child strangely described wax-flowers under a glass, and laughed heartily at “Taffy riding his goat,”—a china ornament which she could have known nothing of.

With respect to the lady who invited us, I can relate a strange story wherewith the Brighton doctors in 1848 were familiar. Mrs. P. had an invalid daughter subject to violent headaches, and as she had read of the remedial powers of mesmerism from Chauncey Townsend's book, privately resolved to try and cure her, and soon set her to sleep by the usual “passes.” However, when after twelve and even eighteen hours the girl could not be awakened, Mrs. P. and her husband (a clergyman, who knew nothing of the cause) were alarmed and summoned doctor after doctor, to wake her, if they could. But all was in vain, until some one turning to the peccant and magical volume found that by the simple process of reversing the passes the abnormal slumber might be made to cease. This was done at once, and all came more than right, for the girl woke up without her usual headache, and was cured from that hour. At this time of day, after thirty years and more, society having become wiser, and our medical men more physiologically hygienic, we all now wot of mesmerism, and innumerable cases of cure through that mysterious form of catalepsy.

For another small experience, I have several times been among a crowd of others at public exhibitions of those who speak off hand in prose or verse, "inspirationally" as they call it, but as the outer world prefer to believe, improvisatorially, and certainly amid such gifted persons Mrs. Corn Tappan stands out prominently in my memory. At the Brighton Pavilion I gave her for a theme to be versified on the spot extempore my own heraldic motto, "L'espoir est ma force," and to my astonishment, in a burst of rhymed eloquence she rolled off at least a dozen stanzas on Hope and its spiritual power. Some one else among the audience gave the subject of cremation, and forthwith the Lady descended with terrific force on funeral pyres and the horrors of Gehenna; whilst a male performer affected to personate sundry well known dead orators of past days (for as the inspirers were supposed to be disembodied spirits no living orators were allowable), and he certainly imitated both voices and topics with singular success. But everybody has heard of this sort of thing, sufficiently remarkable as a mental effort; and we have all similarly witnessed the more material marvels of Maskelyne and Cook, known to be mechanical contrivances which are still riddles to the world.

Again, there are those who draw and paint in a condition of spiritual ecstasy; and I remember visiting a public exhibition in Bond-street, exclusively of most curious and intricate pictures, asserted to have been inspired by dead artists, some being elaborate flourishes of scenes and figures, said to be thus depicted as with lightning speed. As to living artists, there are in existence several excitable youths and damsels who write and draw very rapidly in an ecstatic state, and I myself possess a dreamy conglomerate of microscopic faces crowded together, and stated to have been drawn thus instantaneously to prove to us "the cloud of witnesses," "the innumerable company of angels," by whom we are continually surrounded.

I pretermitt with brief mention sundry inexplicable wonders, such as those wherewith the spiritualistic papers are frequently full, only stating that I was one of those who investigated the case of the Rev. Mr. Vaughan's pew-opener, at St. James's, Brighton, whose daughter was thought to be "bewitched." Certainly strange knockings accompanied her when she came in at my call, much like those I had heard many years ago at Rochester, U.S.; and her mother (a pious and credible widow) assured me, with tears of unfeigned anxiety, that the chairs and stools followed her about!—a statement only half credible, when we reflect that there is an animal magnetism as well as a mineral one, and that we know nothing of the reasons of either. Our ignorance on such matters is so profound that we may fairly be credulous unless we obstinately refuse altogether our belief in and to human testimony; but if we dare to do this, higher interests are endangered than spiritualistics. Our religion is mainly based upon credible evidence.

There is certainly much that is mysterious in the toy they call "Planchette," a triangular thin slab of polished wood on a couple of small wheels, with a pencil at the apex. Hands laid upon this by two persons properly conditioned, will give apparent vitality and volition to the small machine, and make the pencil seem to write of itself in answer to expressed (or meditated) questions. At a wealthy mansion in South Kensington, for instance, I saw two charming young Italian ladies, sisters, covering, with infinite rapidity, sheet after sheet with the abstrusest essays on occult subjects, given to them to write upon inspirationally, and the chief wonder was (as a learned friend by me well observed) where the knowledge came from, so seemingly infused into two unscientific young girls. Afterwards, when the said learned friend tried Planchette with me, we were considerably startled to find that when I asked of the so-called spirits, "What think ye of Christ?" the pencil under our unconsciously-guided hands made answer, "With the utmost reverence!" I need not assure mankind that neither my friend nor I (both incredulous and unwilling witnesses) lent ourselves or one another to any deception, and were mentally inclined, if at all, to the expectation that the "spirits" might rather blaspheme than bless. It is right to mention that, beyond the pair of young ladies and our two selves, only the host and hostess were in the room, of whom I have this further wonder to report, viz., that the host, whom I must not specify by name without his leave, is afflicted with blindness, notwithstanding which and his alleged incompetence towards poetry as an old naval officer, his wife shewed me several copybooks full of blank verse written by him in a hand unlike his own, and supposed by them to be inspired by Young, as a continuation of his "Night Thoughts." The versification certainly seemed worthy of that prosy poet's Musa Pedestris. The captain and his lady also told us how frequently flowers and sweetmeats (!) were showered on them from the ceiling at their domestic dual séances; and on another occasion a lady shewed my wife and me a paper of seed pearls, alleged to have been flung into her lap from the heavens—through the ceiling—by her departed lord and master! Similarly, a lady well known in the professedly spiritualistic circles, deposited round her chair, in the dark, at Mr. S. C. Hall's, a profusion of bouquets—probably from Covent Garden—and that, notwithstanding the hostess had herself searched the lady before the séance, as it was known that Mrs. G.'s special gift from the spirits was the multitudinous creation of flowers! Really, there must be a stand somewhere made to credulity; but, at all events, the venerable host and hostess believed this, on what seemed to them reasonable evidence, and quite forgave me for not believing it too.

And this brings me, naturally enough, to give a detailed account of the two best and last séances I ever took the trouble to attend; for I have, during many years, entirely avoided such exhibitions, as generally childish, mentally unwholesome, and to some people dangerously seductive. I had several times asked my worthy friends last alluded to, to give me and a friend of mine, a lieutenant in the Royal Navy, the privilege of "assisting" at a séance under their unexceptionable guidance; and accordingly we were invited to meet Mr. Home, the high priest of Spiritualism, a quiet, well-mannered, gentlemanly person enough, known to our host from his birth. The other guests were a Countess, the widow of a colonel, and a distinguished physician; in all we numbered eight. My friend and I were requested privately, by our host, to conceal our probable incredulity if we desired the favour of the "spirits" in the way of manifestations; and as these were what we came for, besides our own polite desire to do at Rome as the Romans do, we readily assented to the reasonable request. After the usual greetings and small talk of the day, and tea and coffee, and so forth, we all took seats round the drawing-room circular table (a very weighty one, as I proved afterwards, on a gigantic central pillar, and covered with a heavy piece of velvet tapestry); and before commencing the special business we came for, I was pleased to hear our host propose that we should all kneel round the table and offer up prayer: this he did, simply and beautifully, in some words extemporary, closing with a Church collect and the Lord's Prayer. On my expressed approval of this course, when we rose, Mr. H. said it was always his custom, as a precautionary measure against the self-intrusion of evil spirits; admittedly a wisdom, even if it seemed somewhat unwise and perilous to be more or less courting the company of such unpleasant guests, if a séance (as experienced afterwards) did not happen to be made safe by exorcism. And now the gaslights bracketed round the room were put as low as possible, making a dim, religious semi-darkness; however, as there was a bright fire in the grate, and some small scintillæ of gas, and one's eyesight soon gets accustomed to any diminution of light, we could soon see nearly as well as usual. This "gloaming" is a common condition in séances, and for ought anyone knows may be an electrical sine quâ non as needed for animal magnetism; albeit some paid professionals may possibly find darkness a very useful veil for chicanery. While we were chatting round the table,—and Mr. Home enjoined this as better than the silent sobriety I looked for—suddenly the table shuddered and a cold wind swept over our hands laid upon it. "They are coming now," said Mr. H., which everybody seemed glad of, though that cold wind felt to me not a little "uncanny," but I said nothing in disparagement, for fear of stopping a "manifestation." Soon, loud knocks were heard, apparently from the middle of the table, and on sundry spirits being alleged to be present, Mr. Home proceeded to question them through the ordinary clumsy fashion of the alphabet, and some unimportant answers were elicited, which I fail to remember and in common honesty must not invent. We were soon to see stranger things; and I suppose the séance was exceptionally successful as I afterwards noticed some of it in print. For while we were looking and expecting, suddenly the table began to tilt this way and that, and then as if by an effort the ponderous mass, with all our hands still upon the velvet pall, positively mounted slowly into the air, inasmuch that we were obliged to rise from our chairs and stand to reach the surface. I could see it at least two feet from the carpet, and Mr. Home invited me to take especial notice that none of the company could possibly be lifting the table; indeed, the strength of all of us combined would have been barely enough for such a heavy task. Of course, every one else but myself and friend supposed that the "spirits" had kindly done this miracle to please us; but I unfortunately said "Oh! Mrs. Hall! it will crush your chandelier!" (one of Venice glass, very precious)—at which unbelieving remark, probably, the spirits took umbrage, for at once the table ceased ascending, and with a slow oscillation descended very gently on to the carpet. This sort of petty miracle is a frequent experience among the Spiritualists, and how it is effected I cannot imagine. There could be no contrivance or machinery in our host's drawing-room, as must be the case imitatively at the Egyptian Hall; none of the company could be conspiring to deceive, and more than all, that huge, heavy table rising up against the law of gravitation was enough to chase away all incredulity. One fact is stronger than fifty theories; and one reliable success overweighs a thousand failures. I testify to that which I have seen.

But more and more wondrous was to follow. All at once Mr. Home flung himself back in his chair, looking wild and white; and then rising slowly and solemnly, went to the still bright fire, into which he thrust his unprotected hands, and taking out a double handful of live coals, placed them—as a fire offering—upon Mr. Hall's snow-white head, combing the hair over them with his fingers, all which our host appeared to receive more than patiently—religiously. Thereafter Mr. Home placed them in the Countess's blonde-lace cap, and carried them, as a favour vouchsafed by the spirits, to each of us, to hold in our hands. When he came to me Mr. Hall said: "My friend, have faith." "Yes," I answered, "and courage, too"; whereupon I was blest with a good handful of those wonderful coals, still hot enough to burn any skin; but, somehow or other, I felt no pain and had no mark. Here was another law of nature put to shame, in the miraculous fact that fire was seemingly deprived of the power of burning. How this could be, I cannot guess; but I record manfully the fact as witnessed. After this, an accordion held under the table by Mr. Home with one hand, the other being upon the table, positively played a tune of itself—"Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon"—requested by Dr. C., "that being the tune his dead child loved so." I was requested to look under the table to see the "spirit-hand" operating near the carpet; but I saw nothing except the vitalised accordion expanding and contracting of itself, being held tightly at the upper handle by Mr. Home. Some of the company, however, claimed to see and to shake hands with the child, and Mr. Home requested me to ask for a similar favour by placing my hand open under the table; this, accordingly, I ventured to do, with the result of feeling my thumb sensibly touched and thrilled, which I was told was a good sign of favour from the spirits—albeit in my own mind I remembered what our omniscient Shakespeare sings at the mouth of one of the Macbeth witches,

"By the pricking of my thumbs Something wicked this way comes"— and failed to feel quite comfortable. Soon, however, Mr. Home said: "The accordion is leaving my hand"; and I saw the mysterious thing crawling on the floor like a lame dog till it got into a corner. Of course, I suspected a secret string; but all at once it moved out and came back, moaning Æolianly as it went, and stood up beside the chair of Mrs. Colonel N.S., who patted it lovingly; thence passing behind me it went and stood beside the Countess, who also caressed it; and then Mr. Home said: "Now ask the spirit to come to you"; whereto I acceded, and the accordion crept near me, as if unwillingly, and stood up; but when I touched it the thing shrank from my unsympathetic hand, and fell down sloop.

After this, I noticed that my naval friend was staring with all his eyes at something over our military widow's head, and that his hair (it is red, which colour is very spiritualistic) stood on end as with fear. "What's the matter, P.?" I asked. "Don't you see it?" responded he. "What?" "The grey figure behind Mrs. N. S., bearded like the Egyptian Sphinx." "That's the Colonel!" exclaimed Mr. Hall, and the widow bowed religiously, with a "Dear! is it you?" On this, as my friend was terribly frightened, we soon took leave; and when we went home, I found that he was so pursued by "spirits" rapping all about him, that he actually vacated his own room and slept in mine, for protection against the invisible, on two chairs till morning broke; when he feared the spirits no longer. I may mention that this insight into an immaterial world (he having been inclined before to Pyrrhoism) quite altered his career, and that soon after he took holy orders. In this connection I may state that according to a printed account I have seen, both Mr. and Mrs. Hall were converted from avowed Materialism by spirit manifestation, and that when the question of "Cui bono?" is raised, his experience and that of divers others (the aforesaid Dr. C. in particular) will avouch for the practical usefulness of these petty miracles.

But I must have done, with only one other reminiscence soon after that at Ashley-place. This time the venue is Fitzroy-square, and the company (to omit needless detail) was a polyglot one, consisting chiefly of a German merchant, a Hebrew financier, a French governess, my naval friend aforesaid, who was quick at Latin, and I, who more or less remembered my Greek. Of course English was represented in the two only other guests; and it will be seen how strangely the science of philosophy enters into this my next and concluding anecdote. After plenty of other rappings and noises (I noticed by the way that all the metal things in the room, as castors and cruet— it was a dining-room—and wine coolers and bronze chandelier, were clicked and clanged), and after the usual stupid alphabet questions and answers had been exhibited; after also the heavy mahogany table on five substantial pillars had been miraculously moved about the room and tilted, as we failed to effect at the finale when we tried; all at once, a thundering knock quite shook the table and startled us; on which, Dr. C., our (unprofessional) medium for the nonce, as he had seen more of spiritualistics than we had, called for the alphabetical test to ascertain who it could be that knocked so furiously, for the blows were often repeated. So then, by the slow method of letter by letter, he made out the name "Jamblic," and then gave it up in despair, as he said it was a mischievous imp that was sporting with us; but the knocks still continued, and some one suggested that perhaps this strange name was foreign, and that his own language would please the incensed spirit better than English. Accordingly, he was addressed by the assembled circle severally in French, German, Hebrew, and Latin, all in vain; when I bethought me of Greek and the Pythagoreans and spoke out "Ei mi Iamblicos," (Art thou Iamblicus?)—on which, as if with joy at having been discovered, there was a rush of noises and knocks all round the room (my perverid imagination might have fancied the flapping of wings), and immediately after there ensued a dead silence! So we soon broke up and went home. Opening my classical dictionary at Iamblicus, I read what I certainly had not seen or thought of for more than thirty years, that he was an author on "the mysteries of the Egyptians," and was bracketed with Porphyry as a professor of the black art. Was then this unpleasant visitor to Fitzroy-square no other than that magician redivivus? An awkward possibility.

And now to bring these scattered reminiscences to a practical conclusion. What can I, what can my readers decide, on a rational consideration of the whole matter? It is, no doubt, very baffling to judge what rightly to think about it. I have stated a few facts that have come under my own personal knowledge; but there are thousands of others similar and even more extraordinary, which numerous persons quite as credible as I am can vouch for in like manner to be true facts while remaining petty miracles. For myself, I must suspend judgment; waiting to see what in these wonderful times some further development of electricity, for example, may haply produce for us. After recent marvels of the telephone, microphone, photophone, and I know not what others, why should some Edison or Lane Fox not stumble upon a form of psychic force emanating from our personal nervous organisation, and capable of operating physically on all things round us, the immaterial conquering the material it pervades? Some such vague theory as to spiritualistic manifestations may be a far more rational as well as pleasing explanation of modern miracles, than to suppose that our dead friends come at any medium's summons to move tables, talk bad grammar, and play accordions, or that angels, good and evil, are allowed to be employed in mystifying or terrifying the frivolous assistants at a séance.

[We have given Mr. Tupper's communication at length because of the value of the testimony which it affords to the genuineness of the phenomena recorded; and because we think that a perusal of his interesting narrative will generally lead to a conclusion very different from that at which Mr. Tupper himself seems to have arrived.—ED. If none were to reprove the vicious, excepting those who sincerely hate vice, there would be much less censoriousness in the world.

What is the position of Spiritualism now as compared with twelve months ago; and what are its prospects in the near future? These are questions which naturally occur to us in commencing the work of another year; and upon the answer which we can honestly give to them depend very much the spirit and confidence with which we can enter upon the New Year's labours.

Have we reason to be satisfied with the present condition of Spiritualism in this country? Upon the whole we think Yes! It is quite true, of course, that we have had some very disagreeable contretemps; that from one cause or other the reputation of Spiritualism has, rightly or wrongly, been brought into discredit; and that from time to time we have been well-nigh disheartened by the malicious assaults of foes, or by the equally damaging follies of friends. But the Cause itself, being founded on right and truth, has suffered no permanent harm; nay, more, has come unscathed—yea, even purified—out of the fiery ordeal through which it has passed. Its friends have learned lessons of prudence and wisdom; and we venture to think that at no time in its history has there ever been amongst them a more genuine jealousy of its fair fame than now—a more sincere and earnest determination to preserve it in every way from the very appearance of evil.

The establishment of the Society for Psychical Research, during the past year, should also be regarded as a cause for profound satisfaction. Spiritualists may take credit to themselves for having kept firm hold of their faith in the demonstrability of spirit communion, till others, distrusting their conclusions, have felt compelled to institute independent inquiries for themselves; and though the new Society proceeds on the principle of taking nothing for granted and sets itself afresh to the solution of questions which Spiritualists have determined years ago; yet there is to our mind no room for doubt that its work will, in the end, bring large accessions to our own ranks. Its investigations will, we believe, inevitably lead to the conclusion that there are constantly recurring phenomena for which no other theory than that maintained by Spiritualists will reasonably account. We are thankful, then, for our new allies, even though they work under another designation. They may sow, but we shall inevitably have a share in the harvest.

But in the meantime we, as Spiritualists pure and simple, must not relax our efforts. We must not be content to stand aside and leave all the labour to those who have not reached the faith to which we have arrived, or who, at any rate, have not the boldness to proclaim publicly the full measure of their convictions. Those who give their complete assent—head, heart, and soul—to Spiritualism, as distinguished from those who only profess to be inquiring, should band together in a strong united effort to make their power felt throughout the land. If Spiritualists would do this they would have the respectful attention of a Press which cannot afford even the appearance of approval of an unpopular thing. We do not urge any movement in the direction of popular propaganda. We would not force our views upon the attention of men who have no taste for spiritual matters; but we think that Spiritualists, nevertheless, are negligent of their duties if they do not take every reasonable means of giving to all an opportunity of learning the truth if they are so disposed. We have, in the C.A.S., an institution which should be the centre of spiritualistic life in this country, and an institution which, if properly supported, would achieve a vast amount of very useful work. We are breaking no confidence, we think, if we say that there are members of the Council who are anxious and waiting to promote some important projects as soon as its financial position will permit, and we cannot but feel that whatever good may be effected by another organisation, the Spiritualists should allow nothing to tempt them to withhold their hearty support from an institution which is peculiarly their own. The Society for Psychical Research deserves, and ought to have, the help of Spiritualists; but in affording this, Spiritualists will commit a grievous error if they allow the C.A.S. to suffer.

PROPHETIC DREAMS.

Could inventive philosophy devise any apparatus capable of photographing dreams, what a remarkable string of tableaux, clicked off in the night-watches, should we sometimes find awaiting us in the morning!

Most of these would probably have found their birth upon the very frontiers of sleep, while the reasoning faculty yet retains sufficient dominion to impart a measure of consistency to the army of fantastic thoughts preparing to hold high carnival in the brain.

Experience has proved that the memory may be educated to retain the dreams of the night; and the records of private life are full of instances in which, where this process has been followed, most singular results have rewarded the pains.

It has even been declared—and fortified by the most authentic testimony—that some forecast of the inevitable future will occasionally overshadow the slumbering fancy; and that a carefully kept dream-book—like that of Tippoo Saib, retained in the museum of the India House, and said to contain some very remarkable foreshadowings of the author's misfortunes—might contain many an augury destined to fulfilment.

The wife of Mr. N. (a gentleman now living, who himself related the following circumstances, to a literary friend of my own) had at intervals throughout her life displayed indications of a second-sighted intelligence, conveyed through the medium of dreams.

Although, as a rule, these previsions referred to matters of slight importance, they occasionally extended to greater things, and the confirmation which almost invariably followed at length induced Mr. N., as well as other members of the family, to regard these prophetic impressions with a respect scarcely inferior to that entertained for them by the dreamer herself.

One night the latter awoke her husband with the intelligence that she had had a dream of terrible augury, as regarded their eldest son, then a midshipman on board a line-of-battle ship at a distant station.

Partially reassured, she calmed herself again to sleep, but on the succeeding night awoke still more agitated than on the first occasion, and declared that "George" had seemed to stand at her bedside, pale, disordered, dripping, as one just drowned. Again a stronger mind strove to impart the hope and comfort it scarcely dared to feel; but the recurrence, on the third night, of the ominous dream, convinced the poor mother that she had been indeed deprived of her child.

Next morning Mr. N., standing at his garden gate, was accosted by a neighbour, who, with some apparent anxiety, inquired if he had heard any especial news.

Mr. N. replying in the negative, his friend announced the report that a terrific hurricane had burst upon the coasts of B. All the vessels lying in the roads had got safely to sea, and weathered the storm, with the exception of three English ships, one a vessel of war, which had been forced on shore and totally lost.

Mr. N. inquired their names, and, on hearing them, exclaimed:—

"God be thanked! George is indeed on that station, as you know, but he is in the L."

"And it is expressly mentioned," rejoined his friend, "that she was the first to get to sea."

Much relieved, Mr. N. hurried in to relate to his wife the comforting intelligence. But not for an instant could she be induced to question the fatal significance of the vision. The image of her drowned boy was ever present to her eyes; and the presage was to be too sadly fulfilled.

When details reached England, it was known that the captain of the L., George's ship, had gone to dine on board another vessel, taking the boy with him. The suddenness and severity of the storm baffled every effort to regain the L. They had to remain, perforce, and were subsequently lost, with those they came to visit.

This was a modern example of the dream-vision, the second of those five classes into which Macrobius divides dreams; and the not unnatural offspring of that condition which Sir Thomas Browne, in his "Religio Medici," attributes to the soul in sleep; "when, during the slumber of the senses, reason is awake the most—not that faculty of comparison and conclusion which we call reason, but that instinct of the soul whereby it concludes without comparing, and knows without syllogising, by an instantaneous operation of its own innate faculties."

An invariable characteristic of this rare phenomenon is the clear, indelible impression it at once stamps upon the mind—the only one that survives, totally unchanged, the transition from sleep to waking. In this lies one of its distinctions from the common dream—that the resumed intelligence does not reject it as a figment of the pure reason, but accepts it as a fact already argued out. "I know it has happened," is the dreamer's expression. The belief never wavers. The actual ground defies analysis, and may almost be compared with that intuition which, before the fall of man, occupied the place of acquired knowledge.

It is impossible not to notice the singular manner in which these reiterated dreams sometimes find accomplishment in fact.

I have met with an instance of a man who, between his youth and middle age, dreamed, at least a score of times, of riding into a village situated in a wild and savage landscape, such as was dear to Salvator Rosa, and of meeting, at a turn of the little street, a bridal procession, the bride at its head, wearing a garland of red and white roses, a purple jacket trimmed with fur, and a crimson petticoat. She had but one eye!

Years passed, and the dreamer found himself travelling in Bohemia. Suddenly, he drew bridle in a spot that seemed familiar to him as the home he had left. Another instant, and the village to which he had made so many dreaming visits revealed itself, feature for feature, to his astonished gaze! Not a living creature was to be seen, but he knew—as he said—the reason, and told his companions that all the rustic community were assembled at a wedding, the procession of which they would meet at the next turn. He even foretold the bride's attire. A few hundred yards more, and there she was, indeed, precisely as dream-foretold—even to the absence of an eye!

The recurring dream becomes stamped, at length, with a sort of prophetic value. "Such and such a thing must happen to me before I die, or why have I dreamed it so persistently?" said one who subsequently experienced the fulfilment of a dream to all appearance as remote as chance could make it, from the path of his life.

Sir Victor Houlton, for many years, and still, Government Secretary at Malta, told me that he had dreamed, in boyhood, with singularly vivid and minute detail, that he was residing in that island while subjected to so rigorous a blockade that rats and mice attained the rank of delicacies, and an entire dog was a thing on which to ground a banquet of unusual magnificence.

Having no interest in, or connection with, Malta, more than any other point of British dominion, and being, moreover, intended for the Church, there seemed little prospect of Sir Victor's dream becoming realised. Circumstances, however, ultimately induced him to embrace a diplomatic career, and he now holds, as I have said, the chief appointment in the above dependency, where, over and above the zealous discharge of his general public duties, he is observed to evince a peculiar, not to say personal interest, in the condition of the provision stores of that important garrison. It is a fact that, since Sir Victor's accession to office, Valetta is victualled for two years.

The waking dream—impulse, or strong impression—though differing from it in some respects, may be regarded as germane to the present matter. In such cases, the understanding remains unfettered, while in the condition of sleep this is suspended, and what has been termed "pure reason" supplies its place.

In 1863, the commercial and seafaring community of Newport, Monmouthshire, witnessed with indignant surprise the return of one of their stout little ships, which after having, against great difficulties, doubled Cape Horn, put suddenly about, and returned to port, cargo and all, precisely as she had started, three months before. The skipper, Captain Matthias, alleged that he had acted in obedience to an impulse he had found irresistible—an impulse in no sort communicated through his outward senses, but speaking, as it were, within him, with all the distinctness and authority of an actual voice, commanding him to put back, on pain of the complete destruction of both ship and crew. He "remonstrated" most earnestly (he always, in his narration, used phrases implying the dealing with another individuality), but the "voice" persisted, and promised, in the event of obedience, fair breezes, from the moment of altering the vessel's course—and this undoubtedly came to pass.

Of course an act so unusual and unaccountable could not be passed over, and the captain, submitting to a court of inquiry, was deprived of his certificate.

His ship, the Esk, sailed once more, under new command, and was lost. Our business, however, is with her old commander.

There was a calmness and consistency about Matthias that, even in the storm of reprobation he had raised, seem to have commanded respect. It is, as a rule, not difficult to discern when a man believes he is telling you the truth. This captain was a teetotaler. He had never exhibited the least token of mental aberration. His crew, to a man, though dissatisfied with his proceedings, declared him the coolest and most skilful seaman among them. A man of strong religious feelings, his life had been in accordance with his professions. All his worldly interests were associated with the successful prosecution of his voyage. And, lastly, he was under a deep obligation to the principal owner, who had assisted him liberally in a time of need.

His address before the board of inquiry was a model of manly, straightforward eloquence, and he acquiesced in the withdrawal of his certificate as a duty to be expected from those to whom he could offer no proof, apart from his bare word, of the extraordinary experience he had described.

In reality, a case like that of Captain Matthias does not present itself twice in a century, and it is worth while to consider what would be the probable conduct of nineteen persons in twenty, subjected to such a test. We know that impulses of this nature have been the parent of deeds of heroic daring. Why not, then, of prudence? of humanity? A person placed in the position of Captain Matthias labours under this difficulty—that it is not within the power of ordinary language to describe the irresistible mind-pressure exercised by this mysterious prompter. Before it, duty, interest, inclination, alike give way. Danger, the love of life, are words without significance—lost in the echo of the inner voice that persistently demands obedience. If it possess not the character, it has in some degree the force, of actual inspiration. Unable to trace it to an intelligible source, he who experiences it refers the mysterious secret to the Source of all intelligence—the soul to the soul's Creator. Nor is it creditable to—though perfectly consistent with—human judgment, to recognise, in these rare examples, no element of justification.

The case of Captain Matthias and the Esk (the incident obtained too much publicity to make it necessary to disguise names) is not the only one that, within these last years, supplies an authenticated instance of the mental phenomenon above described. I may, perhaps, be allowed to revert to the subject in a later paper.

HENRY SPICER.

REMARKABLE MATERIALISATIONS.

From Notes taken by A. Hildreth, LL.B.

I.

On June 10th, 1878, at about ten o'clock p.m., I was sitting with a friend of mine (a medium) and another gentleman, in the drawing-room of Aldwyn Tower, Malvern, the then residence of Dr. and Mrs. Nichols.

Raps came in different parts of the room, and the message was spelled out, "Watch and wait." The medium became entranced and walked the room with energy. We saw in the twilight a white misty appearance accompanying him on the side away from us. "There is a materialisation," said the control, who gave the name of "Dr. Richards"; "we shall try to take the medium into the garden and cause the materialised spirit to go beside him. Follow at a respectful distance, and place your chairs in the middle of the lawn."

The voice that spoke to us had the tone and some of the peculiarities of articulation belonging to the medium's natural voice, but there was a distinct quality unfamiliar to us, partly consisting of deliberation, precision, and authority.

The spirit doctor now gave the signal for the descent into the garden. "Protect your lungs well," said he; "it is chilly." The medium crossed the room, unfastened one valve of the window, and stepped out upon the verandah. We each took a chair and followed, but were delayed at the window by having to open the other valve to admit the chairs, so that when we reached the verandah, the medium had already descended the stone steps and was in the garden. No form appeared beside him.

We placed our chairs on the lawn as directed, while the medium took his seat upon the garden bench; but in a few seconds he came towards us, and, speaking in the now familiar voice of "Dr. Richards," directed us to change our position to a point where our line of vision towards the bench was interrupted by some bushes, which thus would serve instead of a curtain. The medium retraced his steps, and the clear small voice of a spirit known as "Joey" came from the direction of the bench, saying, according to his custom, "Holloa, Arthur!" Then all was silent.

We presently heard the medium breathing heavily, and a mass of white drapery, such as is commonly seen at séances, emerged from behind one of the bushes to our right. It came further into view, and we distinguished two forms standing side by side, draped to the feet and with conical caps on their heads. They remained half a minute and then disappeared.

White drapery again protruded, and remained quiet, projecting a little beyond the bush. The medium crossed over without speaking, and stood before us. Placing his fists together in front of him, he separated them laterally with a spasmodic jerk, and, after other movements, turned and walked away, absorbing the white drapery as he passed round the bush. This seemed to be an attempt, only partially successful, to shew the form and the medium at the same time.

After a short interval, another form appeared on the left. This figure turned its profile, and shewed that it was not surrounded by a skirt, but merely held a white gauze apron before it, two dark legs being visible.

The form having retired, the medium again came towards us. "I do not think it wise," said the voice of "Dr. Richards," "to continue the materialisations longer; we must have darker nights. Follow the medium." We did so, and returned to the drawing-room.

We thanked the spirit for our unexpected pleasure. "The thanks are not due," he answered; "on the other hand, we have to thank you for giving your attention; it was an experiment for our own satisfaction; we have been preparing this séance for two days past." He informed us that manifestations required thought, experiment, and perseverance on the part of spirits, and that not merely a few, but myriads, were associated to produce them. They liked to have their labours appreciated. Drapery served to protect the materialised form from the effects of light and of the human eye. He said he could explain the source from which the drapery was obtained, but did not think it wise. He afterwards concluded that he could do so "without danger," and told us that the drapery was made from the medium's underclothes.

Hoping he should have the "honour" of conversing with us again, the control, after a long talk, wished us "good night."

II.

On another evening, when the medium was seated at the piano in the twilight, the instrument "walked" out from the wall, and hats and other light objects leaped about the room. These effects were attributed to "Joey."

Afterwards the medium became controlled by "Dr. Richards." He said he liked these little conversations, and would answer our questions as well as he could, trammelled as he was by a "human case." He gave an impressive account of his passage into the other world; how, brought up in old orthodox views, he lay on his bed of sickness a prey to horrible anxiety; how, at the moment of his death he seemed to be passing up through an interminable mist, still suffering mental agony, till the clouds parted, and he saw a group of spirits of exceeding beauty waiting to receive him. He found, however, that these spirits who seemed to him so fine, were only of the lower order. He passed from sphere to sphere until he reached the fifth, where he now is. The various spheres might be compared to the ages of a man's life, except that a higher grade was reached by voluntary effort, not by mere growth.

He said that the motives of spirits in communicating with mortals were mainly of a benevolent nature. They desired to elevate the minds of mankind by assuring them of their future destiny and instilling into their minds some of the quiet harmony of their own existence; nevertheless, this intercourse largely benefits the spirits themselves and tends to raise them to a higher sphere. As to human nature, it was substantially the same in the next world as in this, but the sentiment of malevolence, instigating us to inflict pain on others, and which plays so large a part in this world, even with the most benevolent, grows weak in the other world, and finally disappears for want of use, because the causes exciting it do not exist to the same extent there as here. It was impossible for the highest spirits to communicate personally with those still in the body.

The control spoke on many other subjects, sometimes shewing great energy and warmth, at others becoming very ironical, especially when he spoke of our "poverty-stricken world," as he called it, and of our religious squabbles, "when the whole matter lies in a nut shell."

III.

On June 16th a twilight séance was held in the house. A female figure came from the cabinet. She passed close to the sitters, the drapery making a low incessant rustling. She passed behind one gentleman, placed her hands on his shoulders, and bending down, touched the side of her head affectionately against his. The face was not distinct. "That was your mother," cried "Joey," from behind the curtain. "Was it?" said the gentleman. "Do you think anyone else would caress you like that?" replied "Joey."

"Joey," now preparing to materialise, talked constantly behind the curtain. Somebody crept up to listen outside the séance room. "Joey" gave the door a heavy thump, and told us with glee of other instances when he had thus scared away eavesdroppers. He knew of their approach, not by sight, but by feeling their magnetism, which was different in every person.

"Joey" now appeared materialised, seated himself in a chair, and conversed upon spiritual physics. Spirits, he believed, would hereafter attain the power of materialising in full daylight, but they were prevented at present by the mental condition of mankind. If the eyes of the sitters were blindfolded they could even now come in daylight. No arrangement of mirrors for reflecting the spirit, instead of viewing it directly, would answer. If ink or other colouring matter were squirted into the face of a strongly materialised spirit, the marks would afterwards be seen on the medium's face, and would be no test whatever of dishonesty. If a sitter rushed at a materialised spirit and struck it, the magnetism of the former would instantly dissolve the form, which would return to the medium, carrying the blow with it. The medium would suffer as much as though struck directly. "But," said "Joey," and here his tone was unusually fierce, "if anyone should attempt such a thing, I should not scruple, while the power remained, to snatch up the music-box and maim him before he could injure the medium;" and "Joey" gave the great music-box a swing.

"Could a spirit materialise through a cage?" I asked.

"I've got a good idea," said "Joey," "a very good idea—an excellent idea. Put the medium in a hen-coop; one of those long ones."

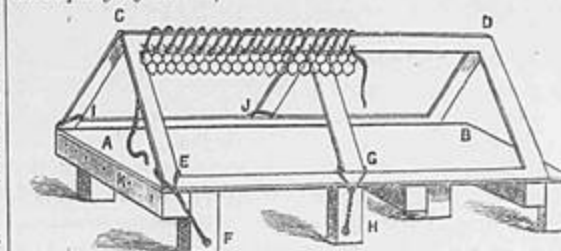

In conclusion he invited me behind the curtain. I felt the medium's head, and took both his hands in mine. They were quivering like leaves. The spirit meanwhile stood beside me, seen by all the sitters.

IV.

On June 19th a séance was held in the garden. Having no hen-coop with which to follow out the suggestion of "Joey," we constructed a cage out of materials at hand.

Two wooden frames hinged together were set upon the garden bench in the shape of a gable roof. Stout wire network was stretched over the two frames and spiked to it. [A portion only of this wire network is shown in the accompanying sketch.]

A strong cord, without knot or splice, was wound round and round the frame-work, at each revolution passing through a mesh of the net. Thus every mesh which touched the frame was bound tightly down to it. The two ends of the cord were finally made to meet on the top of the frame (c), were tied together, and sealed.

Over one end of the cage (A) was spread another piece of netting partly overlapping the first pieces and bound firmly to the frame in the same manner, the ends of the cord being sealed together near the other seal (c). The other end of the cage was left open for the medium to enter.

The contrivance was then fastened firmly to the bench. The test-fastenings, which alone will be described, consisted of four cords passing from the frame on each side (E, G, I, J) to spikes driven into the legs of the bench (as at F, H) and sealed to the wood. The netting which covered the end of the cage (A) was, moreover, nailed to the timber (K), each nail being sealed.

Rugs and a pillow being placed in the cage, the medium, clad in his overcoat, crawled in, and the open end was closed by a fourth piece of netting, secured to the frame by another cord, the ends of which were sealed together at D. This netting was not nailed to the bench at A, but could not be raised more than two inches without violence to the wirework.

The modes of escape from this cage were as follows:—

1. Break through the netting.

2. Make an aperture between the netting and the frame:—

(a) By untying the sealed knot, unravelling the cord from the meshes, and raising the netting from the spikes.

(b) By breaking the cord, unravelling it, and raising the netting.

(c) By untwisting the wire meshes, and thus freeing them from the cord. In doing this, however, the coating of zinc put on in the galvanizing process, and which filled the crevices of the twisted wire, must be broken.

3. Lift the cage from the bench:—

(a) By breaking some cords.

(b) By disturbing the knots sealed to the spikes in the bench-posts.

As a last precaution flour was sprinkled on the ground for a considerable distance in front of the cage.

The medium was fastened in at ten o'clock, p.m., and we took our seats as in the first garden séance. After a short time a man's form, draped in white, appeared from behind the bushes, and bowed many times. A female figure afterwards approached us from the other side, heavily draped. These familiar manifestations were received with a murmur of pleasure.

Upon examining the cage, the network was found intact; all the seals and cords were unbroken; none of the meshes had been untwisted; no tracks were in the flour. From the nature of the position a confederate could not have entered the garden undetected.

This séance was a perfect test of the honesty of the medium in that instance, but it is chiefly interesting for a point of spirit physics, viz., that a wire network forms no obstacle to a materialisation. The spirits only complained of the wooden frame. A more commodious cage on a simpler plan, without a clumsy wooden frame, would thus seem one of the best tests for proselytising purposes.

V.

On June 22nd another garden séance took place, which has already been described in the Spiritualist and Medium. Only the main points will be referred to here. No bush now interrupted our view of the medium. We saw the figure begin to form above him, and at the end of the séance dissolve to a cloud and disappear. The materialised spirit ("Joey") traversed the garden in various directions, going, in all, nearly 400 feet, and attained a distance, in a direct line from the medium, of sixty-six feet. We were informed that the farther the spirit went away, the greater the draught upon the medium, and the greater the difficulty of holding the matter together which formed the figure, and that this was the most remarkable manifestation of the kind that had ever taken place.

CURIOUS INSTANCE OF MENTAL PRESCIENCE.

In the current monthly part of Chambers's Journal (p. 776) a correspondent narrates the following incident which he says happened to him upwards of twenty years ago, and which shews, he thinks, that there is some mental law in operation that is as yet inexplicable:—

"At the time I have alluded to, I attended a church, among the members of which a certain question was then causing a great amount of excitement. Feeling ran very high, and meetings were called time after time to discuss the matter, which touched upon the acts of certain officials. An anti-official party was formed; and I took an active part in its movements. I thought a great injustice was being done, and I did all I could to right matters. Well, a meeting was called one evening in a room not connected with the church, and we malcontents were to be present to discuss the matters in dispute. Our clergyman was exceedingly anxious that party feeling should not run so high as to cause any rupture in the church. That anxiety on his part was put very strongly to me a few hours before the meeting, at which he was not expected to be present; hence I was exceedingly anxious that we should not do anything to give him, personally, any offence. I attended the meeting, having had to hurry from my business to be there in time, and had thus been six or seven hours without food. I mention this, as it may possibly have some bearing on my mental and nervous condition at the time.

"The meeting was an exciting one. I spoke in it. I know I had an excruciating headache; and when I sat down, another speaker followed. I listened to him for a minute or two, when, such was the pain in my head, that I rested it on my hand, and my elbow on my knee, and pressed my aching brow. I at once fell into a semi-unconscious state, or a kind of half-dream, call it what you like. I was perfectly unconscious of what was going on around me, though I felt I was in the meeting. In that state I saw, as in a vision, our clergyman walk in, and, of course, his presence under such circumstances created some little excitement. He told us why he had come, and, indeed, spoke, as I thought, for about a quarter of an hour, and then bowed himself out. On that, I again, as it were, came to myself.

"Now, to shew that I had only been an inappreciably small time in that semi-unconscious state, I may mention that I found that the same speaker was on his legs and that I had not lost a single sentence of what he said. Of course, up to that time our minister had not been in. But the marvellous part of the story is, that in a very short time afterwards, and whilst the same speaker was still addressing the meeting, the minister came in just as I had seen him in my 'vision,' and delivered precisely the same speech as I had heard him deliver when I was in the state described, and went out exactly as I had seen him do before!

"I don't attempt to offer any explanation of the fact, but give it as a curious instance of mental prescience."

THEOSOPHIC TEACHINGS.

By the Hon. Roden Noel.

No. IV.—Conclusion.

The writer of "Fragments" in his fifth instalment (Theosophist, November, 1882) appears to shift his ground regarding these "shells." We now hear of the members of a double consciousness, one of which is the shell. The possibility of such a double consciousness I have admitted. And my contention that the Ego must be behind both seems even here endorsed; for we read of the two both identifying themselves after death with the one earthly person.

If we are to take that view, then the shell would be the person himself, though not the complete person; but we had been assured that it was not such thing. And then what I should contend further is that, being an integral part of the Ego, this shell cannot perish, which we are assured it will.

Whatever view be taken (and to me the expositions given by inspired and uninspired "chelas" seem absolutely Protean in their ever shifting variety), I cannot but regard the doctrine as a rather clumsy, and prosaic stereotyping of what is only metaphorically true, true with qualification, and for a flowing, not too rigid, interpretation—the converse being also true—poured into the cast-iron moulds of dogma. Crystallised, the idea becomes a grotesque untruth. The idea is that of two natures in men—a new, and an old man—Adam and Christ, as Christians say. Certainly there are these, as most of us know to our cost. Certainly one may gradually die away, and so full vitality be secured for the other. But this great truth becomes a merely absurd curiosity of speculation, if you press the literal signification of the words unduly. The old man does not remain behind after I have put him off. All that was essential in him I have extracted and assimilated, and the rest is entirely unreal—so far from remaining behind by itself in some "ether"! And but one or two in an æon have put him off entirely here. If the bad habits are mine, I am in them. If I have left them off, they are in others, or nowhere. The elements of our nature "good," and "bad," however, are far too subtly intermingled, too essential to one another, pass too much into each other, to be thus sharply set apart.

Will it be said that the consciousness of a shell is after all not real, but only apparent, simulated? If this were said, I should answer that such a statement is utterly inconsistent with what the writer of the "Fragments" has written, and with the doctrine of "The Perfect Way" (see chapter on "Discerning of Spirits," and Mrs. Kingsford in "LIGHT" concerning the Ruach). And the "Fragments," in the September Theosophist. Here the distinction is drawn between two kinds of shells. The first kind, which it seems, is not called an "elementary," is thus described: "These shells consist of the fourth, and only a portion of the fifth principles. Half or more of the personal memory is gone, and the more animal or material instincts only survive." This is then said to be the "angel guide" of the average medium. "Such entities of course only survive for a time; gradually all consciousness departs, and they disintegrate." This is quite in accordance with "The Perfect Way." Thus, the shell proper is the lower part of the man himself, divorced from his higher part—his "fourth and fifth principles." "The man," as the world goes, "may have been a good man," and "yet the worse portions of his nature, his lower and more animal instincts, standing now alone and unneutralized by all the better portions of his character, may be evil enough." Again in "Letters of a Theosophist," No. II., in the same, we read, "The shells (as distinct from 'elementaries') are the barely intelligent, disintegrating reliques of human beings, sufficiently elevated to have taken away with them" "their best attributes."

And the statement in the November Theosophist is totally inconsistent with any such view of merely simulated consciousness. All this is plain enough. There is no question here of simulated consciousness—it is an actual portion of our own consciousness detached from the rest—to this, all my former criticisms apply. The "fourth and fifth principles" are distinctly, in the authorised exponents of this system, part and parcel of the conscious man, though they may be removed from him, like warts—and live on—which does not seem to us very feasible. But there is a good deal of shifting of position, and inconsistent explanations of the same terms, in this system of doctrine.

But I have only to refer to the first of my second series of papers in "LIGHT," to shew what I believe idealism is bound to hold concerning any apparently unconscious manifestation of consciousness and memory, either in "secondary reflex action" of the organism, or in the astral body. So far as it is the result of our organising action, and in a relationship of essential connection with our conscious life, it is noumenally, truly ours, and an integral element of our higher intuition, though not an element of our present, lower, phenomenal self-life. So far, again, as it belongs to the world external to us, it represents the consciousness of other spirits or Egos, co-operating with ours, not necessarily with phenomenal knowledge of the fact, but by virtue of their true being, in solidarity with our own, and the controlling power of higher Spirits, the Father and Son—Spirits at their head, who do know, and consciously cause such co-operation. Thus when we have thrown off the burden of direction in these departments of spontaneous, or automatic habit, others take it up, and take it up to some extent because we have voluntarily imposed on them this bent—while they of course are only of full knowledge pursuing the course of their own purposes and development. Thus I would explain final causes, purpose in Nature, and instinct in animals, as well as the phenomena of reflex action, and habit. Even the direction imposed on other spirits by us essentially belongs to us. If the thoughts of other Egos represented by such a supposed astral body could be translated by us into the memories and habits of an individual, that would imply, as I have argued, the transcendent presence of this individual, else there would be no such memory of him possible in us, or suggestion of his personal memories through the shell, for it is admitted that he has influenced it to this result. We are in connection, then, necessarily with this individual Ego, and many others beside, with the latter at all events, in any such communications. Besides, there is always adaptation to present circumstances, intelligent answers to an understood question, often spontaneity of remark, however trivial, no mere reproduction of past memories, which implies a present conscious phenomenal individuality. But how a thinker of the calibre of "C. C. M." can lend his authority to the monstrous and materialistic theories of the book called "Mary Jane," even though it be in harmony with Eliphas Levi and the Occultists, passes my comprehension. Surely Frankenstein, and the Homunculus of Faust are reason itself, compared with such insanities of speculation! Of course I only know the book from your correspondent's report. If one had insight enough, possibly one might pick out and translate the past thoughts of one person from the minds of others, but it would be hard work! But I deny that the astral body we have constructed for ourselves can be divorced from us, and exist apart. Even if it did, it would have to be very carefully studied before its symbols could be translated into the past thoughts of the person to whom it belonged.

We cannot define too accurately—too prosaically—in these dim regions of metaphysics. These subjects are only partly for understanding. A higher faculty, belonging to the higher life, must see. And dogma belongs not to it. Good authorities believe that Gautama did not invent the metaphysical system ascribed to him, any more than our Lord invented the Pauline theology. These highest Teachers breathed in a loftier region altogether. And when we translate their chiefly ethical intuitions into a myriad logical conceptions of the understanding, we do not expand, but degrade them—though the process may be a necessary one for us. No system will fit the universe—though fragments of it may doubtless be reflected in many. The universe is God's thought—and we are not God.

The apparition of the "Double," implying the projection of the astral body, may conceivably take place when the one person is equally conscious of being present bodily in more than one place. A thought of being present in a place is sometimes enough to cause a bodily appearance in it of the person thinking. But is he then also conscious of being where his physical body is? He might be so. But if not, how far is he there? I suppose very little. Again in dreams, or in remembrance, the person dreamed of, or remembered, is not probably always conscious of so influencing the dreamer or rememberer to dream of, or remember him. And yet I hold that such remembrance were not possible without such influence. Hence I seem to be driven to postulate a severance of phenomenal consciousness from the transcendent consciousness of the same person. And it may be said that this is virtually to admit the plurality in our one consciousness, which I object to in Occultism. But then I postulate the one transcendent consciousness of the true noumenal Ego of each behind these plural phenomenal conscious lives, and the synthetic unity in each. But that is not admitted at all in the case of the "shell." There is the difference. Moreover the "shell" involves that severance of parts and functions of our nature from one another, which I hold to be impossible, because they imply one another, as I explain in my first series, and also here. Hence this psychology seems to me crude and unphilosophical. Even the plurality I seem driven to postulate I only admit provisionally, for I confess even this may appear to savour of the absurd! Metempsychosis I grant, but see no probability of its being in the same physical, mundane sphere of the five senses. True, we have lost the memory of our past lives, and so it might be argued that we may again. But then we may have gradually ascended in the scale of being, and our individuality may now have become so pronounced that we shall not again lose memory.

A kind of conditional immortality would be thus virtually admitted—if possible degradation, or insufficient development be predicable of some amongst us. Only this would be temporary only, and all would eventually recover the full privilege of their Divine Birthright, and the memory of all their past lives. Love, Justice, and Righteousness, cannot be satisfied without this. Our true being is in God; and we probably descended (involved in the fall of our inorbing earth-angel Lucifer) as we are now ascending. Such fall is indeed Incarnation, subjection to matter; but this may be either voluntary for redemption of brethren, or involuntary; though originally I believe it was all voluntary, for we in God saw the reason of it. With this I hope to deal more fully elsewhere.

The idea of Wordsworth's great ode is also to be entertained as a possibility—that we descended direct from God; in that case memory would necessarily be lost of that former state of Nirvana, or intuitional perfection. That conception is certainly true, even if we have passed through other degraded lives before, through the animal and subhuman spheres. Plato's "Reminiscence" is true. We are already familiar with the first principles of reason and conduct. Ideas commend themselves to us when we first hear them, and it is because they are native to us. In eternity they are ever before us, as self-luminous, essential Verities, though wandering from our beautiful Home we lose remembrance of them for awhile.

And now, while apologising for my "portentous" length, I take leave of the subject, hoping that the topics incidentally, as well as directly dealt with by my friendly opponent and myself have not been without their interest and profit. By all means let us demand "facts" more or less sensational, but let us occasionally pause to digest them and estimate their value.

A DREAM FULFILLED.

Not long ago a house was being built next to the one I was then living in, and carpenters were at the time engaged in putting up the roof, when I dreamed that one of them would fall, the spot at which he would fall being distinctly portrayed, and the most singular part of it was that in my dream I was told to tell my wife what I had seen. Therefore, while dressing in the morning, I told her the dream, finishing my narrative with the remark that "I was told to tell her." The day following being market day, and a busy one, I had forgotten all about the matter until about four o'clock, when I ran in to see if anything had occurred. On getting to the top room of the house I was immediately told that a carpenter had just fallen with a piece of timber from the roof. The timber falling under him, he had alighted upon it on his back, otherwise he must have gone through between the joists, but the timber saved him, beyond a good shaking. The place he fell corresponded exactly with the one I saw in my dream. For what purpose this dream was given to me I could never see. Perhaps some of your readers may throw a "light" upon it.

PROPOSED CONCERT AND BALL.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It has been proposed by several friends that a concert and ball similar to those which have taken place at Claremont Hall in the last two years, should be held during the present month.

I shall be very pleased to receive offers of assistance from those friends who are willing to take part in the vocal and instrumental part of the entertainment. The proceeds, if any, will be devoted to some useful purpose connected with Spiritualism.

Trusting that the proposal will find favour with your readers, I remain yours faithfully,

FRANK EVERITT.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.—The reception to Mrs. Hardinge Britten at the St. Andrew's Hall, Newman-street, W., has been fixed for Friday next, the 12th instant, instead of Wednesday, the 10th instant, as announced in last week's "LIGHT." The admission will be free, but the Council of the Metropolitan Lyceum hope that friends will generously support the work of the Lyceum, by subscriptions or donations towards its funds. Full particulars of the meetings will be found in our advertising columns.

MR. MORSE AT CARDIFF.—On Sunday last the controls of Mr. J. J. Morse delivered two lectures in this town. The subject in the morning was "The Life of Faith and the Life of Work," and in the evening, "The Science of Spiritualism." These were the last lectures we shall have the privilege of hearing from Mr. Morse's controls for a time, and I wish to take this opportunity of expressing the high regard in which Mr. Morse's work here, extending over a period of about eight years, is held. During this time hundreds have listened with deep interest to the clear reasoning and methodical arrangement of argument, while they have likewise been also enchanted by the unimpeded flow of ideas beautifully expressed. On New Year's night a "Happy Evening" was given at the Society's hall. The programme consisted of selections by an excellent band of local amateur instrumentalists, conducted by Mr. Francis Cooper, songs and solos by various members and friends, ventriloquial sketches, magic lantern, &c. Mr. Morse ably filled the chair, and during the evening read in excellent style the defence of Serjeant Buzfuz in "Bardell versus Pickwick." The refreshment stall was ably managed by Mesdames Cooper, Sadler, and Brooks, and a carpet dance brought an agreeable evening to a close.—E.A.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning, Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübke, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H.I.H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H.S.H. the Prince of Solms; H.S.H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H.S.H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism and also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER, AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

PSYCHOPATHY.

1. The healing of disease by "the prayer of faith," to which I have recently alluded, suggests some attempt to survey the general subject of healing and of spiritual power as a curative agency. It is very necessary to define and to clear away confusion in the use of terms. Spiritual power may be that of a spirit in or out of a body. The influence may be that of the unaided human spirit; or it may be that of those unseen beings who impinge upon our lives in a way and to a degree of which most of us have very little conception. It is extremely hard to say where external spiritual influence does not come in; but some cases, at any rate, need not be referred to any action other than that of the operator.

2. If we attempt to estimate the curative processes of the human spirit, we shall find that the great motive power of spirit in man is the Will: and judging from its effects in other ways it may be expected to be great here. It is, in fact, the great energising power. Another potent faculty is the Imagination. Combine the Will of the operator with the Imagination of the patient, and you set curative agency at work, nor is there any bound to the conceivable action of these potent principles. If Will does not avail (in the language of Eastern hyperbole) to move mountains, it is the most powerful agent, and we know so little of its action as to be unable to set bounds to it. What can Imagination not do in a negative, receptive, meditative mind? The physician can tell what the effect of the imagination of the mother is over the very form and features, and even the mind and disposition, of her unborn child. It can imprint marks on the body; alter and even maim its configuration; paralyse or dwarf the mental faculties. Most of us are familiar with the tragic ending to the practical joke perpetrated by some medical students on one of their number. There was a mock trial, sentence of death by the guillotine, a sham execution, a wooden knife, and some trickling warm water for the blood that was supposed to flow. Imagination did the rest, and the young man was taken up dead.

3. Other less tragic narratives point the same moral. I remember reading, though I cannot now tell where, of a gentleman who, being on a visit and sleeping in a strange room, suddenly awoke with the horrible conviction that he had swallowed his set of false teeth. They were not in the place where he usually put them; sure enough, they were fixed in his throat. He rapidly shewed every symptom of obstruction of the larynx; and his breathing became so embarrassed that a doctor was summoned. It seemed impossible that he should survive till his arrival, when an inquisitive on-looker chanced to turn his eyes to the dressing-table, and there were the teeth resting safely in a corner. The gentleman, in the confusion of his first waking, had forgotten the strange room, and imagination had fastened on a possibility that he had no doubt nervously contemplated before, and had elaborately choked and nearly killed him. In another case a more excitable patient, who had got the same fancy, ran hastily to the house of a doctor with all the symptoms of suffocation. He was out, and she ran off to a neighbouring physician. Before she reached his house she fell dead. As the body was being prepared for burial the missing teeth dropped from the dress, in a fold of which they had become entangled.

4. This action of Imagination is rendered more potent when, for instance, Will acts upon it, as in the case of suggestion to a sensitive who has been brought by a previous course of treatment under the will of a mesmeriser. Gregory, in his "Animal Magnetism" mentions a case in which a mesmeric subject was told, while in a conscious state, that a handkerchief, moist with water, had been dipped in chloroform. He knew perfectly well that it was water in which the handkerchief had been steeped, yet he could not resist the suggestion, and was influenced as if by the anæsthetic. When he came out of the sleep he put the handkerchief in his pocket, but even then fell asleep every few minutes till it was removed. Here obviously the imaginative faculties were in an abnormal state.

5. The effect of this excitation of the imaginative faculties in the cure of nervous ailments presents no difficulty to the mind. I entertain no doubt that nervous headaches, neuralgia, and kindred ailments, even when obstinate and of long standing, are so cured; just as little doubt as that the enthusiastic patient often fancies they are cured when the relief is only temporary and passes with the wave of enthusiasm that the imagination has excited. The alleged cures at Lourdes and Knock must be discounted considerably on this account, but no one can read the narratives, written mostly by unbelieving witnesses, without a conviction that there is, as our friends say of Spiritualism, "something in it"—a large substratum of truth. The sticks and crutches are piled up in a corner of the chapels to attest the miracles, as they were in the ante-room of Dr. Newton, and of the Zouave Jacob, when these two healed the sick in our faithless Metropolis; and as, for aught I know, they may be still in the rooms of our modern Psychopaths, as they certainly are at "Bethshan," according to the correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette.

6. This effect of stimulated nervous energy under the exciting influence of religious enthusiasm is a perfectly well-known fact. Science knows its influence both on mind and body. It is at the root of revivals, and mental epidemics of all sorts and kinds—e.g., the preaching epidemic in Sweden.† Fear, it is equally well-known, can effect the most marvellous results in giving, for example, temporary power to bed-ridden persons to get out of the way of danger, real or imaginary. Anyone who has been in an excited crowd knows how soon fear spreads into panic, and liberates a force that reason is powerless to control. These are familiar facts; and in these Imagination, enthusiastically stirred, or influenced from without by Will, does demonstrably relieve and sometimes cure nervous ailments, and give more or less permanent relief to those chronic diseases, such as rheumatism, and even partial paralysis, which are not to be classed with affections of the nervous system.

7. Can it cure more than these? Can it deal with such ugly facts as tumours, ulcers, and cancers? Can it reach phthisis, and remove tubercles from a diseased lung? There is evidence that it can. Miss Martineau was cured of a malignant ulcer by mesmeric passes after medical science and orthodox treatment had entirely failed. Mr. Thomas Shorter bears very strong testimony to the cure of a large tumour. Our Pall Mall correspondent gives, on the authority of Mr. W. E. Boardman, a case of the alleged cure of phthisis which seems to have been deeply rooted. A carpenter, named Newman, who resides at Dorking, and who suffered from that disease, remained a week at Bethshan, and was completely cured. This is now six months ago, and he is following his trade with no relapse. Further, it is stated by various witnesses, that cancers have been treated psychopathically with complete success.

DIRECT SPIRIT WRITING.

The following message was given by direct writing—that is, without physical contact—at a séance at which Mrs. Everitt was the medium. The circle was composed of Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Everitt, Mr. and Mrs. R. Pearce, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Pearce, Mr. Morell Theobald, and Mr. R. Gale. Though the message consists of more than five hundred and fifty words it was written, as nearly as could be estimated, in about five seconds. It was said to have been given from, though not written by, John Locke:—

"Nescio quomodo inhaeret in mentibus quasi seculorum quoddam angurium futurorum, idque in maximis ingeniis altissimisque animis existit maxime et apparet facillime."—Cicero.

"One of the best springs of generous and worthy actions is the having generous and worthy thoughts of yourselves. Whoever has a mean opinion of the dignity of his nature will act in no higher a rank than he has allotted himself in his own estimation. If he considers his being as circumscribed by the uncertain term of a few years, his designs will be contracted into the same narrow span he imagines is to bound his existence. How can he exalt his thoughts to anything great and noble who only believes that after a short term on the stage of the earth sphere he is to sink into oblivion and to lose his consciousness for ever? For this reason, so useful and elevated a contemplation as that of the soul's immortality cannot be resumed too often. There is not a more improving exercise to the human mind than to be frequently reviving its own great privileges and endowments, nor a more effectual means to awaken an ambition raised above low objects and little pursuits than to value yourselves as heirs of eternity. It is a very great satisfaction to consider the best and wisest of mankind in all nations and ages asserting as with one voice this their birthright, and to find it ratified by an express revelation. At the same time, if you turn your thoughts inward upon yourselves you meet with a kind of secret sense concurring with the proofs of your immortality. You have therefore a good presumptive argument from the increasing appetite the mind has for knowledge and for extending its own faculties, which cannot be accomplished, as the more restrained perfection of the lower creatures may, in the limits of a short life. Another conjecture may be raised from your appetite to duration itself, and from a reflection of your progress through the several stages of it. You complain of the shortness of life and yet are perpetually hurrying over the parts to arrive at certain little settlements or imaginary points of rest which are dispersed up and down in it. What happens when you arrive at those imaginary points of rest? Do you stop your motion and sit down satisfied in the settlement gained, or are you not removing the boundary and marking out new points of rest to which you move forward with the like eagerness, and which cease to be such as fast as you attain them; like the traveller who should fancy that the top of the next hill must end his journey because it terminates his prospect, but he no sooner arrives at it then he sees new ground and other hills beyond it, and continues to travel on as before? Therefore all may observe that, as fast as the time wears away, the appetite for something future remains, and since the Divine Being has implanted no wandering passion, no desire, which has not its object, futurity must be the proper object of the passion so constantly exercised about it; and that this restlessness, this grasping after somewhat still to come, is the spiritual influx which the mind of man has of its own immortality. To be continued."

* There inheres in minds, I know not how, a certain presentiment, as it were, of ages to come, and it exists chiefly and appears most readily in the largest natures and most lofty minds.

FACTS ABOUT MATERIALISATION.

The search for facts goes on with a patient perseverance worthy of much praise. There are "a many" Gradgrinds in our midst. For thirty-three years I have observed and recorded. There are few phenomena of the kind called spiritual that I have not seen. I have not witnessed the fire test, but two of my friends have had it, and have handled fire as scatheless as if it were water, or their own flesh.

The question now comes to us, What are the uses of the many facts presented? Take the one fact of materialisation. The first materialised form I saw was an infant of two or three years, which remained visible only a few moments. The next was a girl of perhaps twelve years. She came to me and took my hand, and kissed it, and said: "I love you. I love your hand that gives." She stayed for many minutes, and subsequently I got well acquainted with her. The next I saw was my own child, of fourteen years when she passed away. She came to me, knelt at my feet, took my hand and kissed it, but could not speak. Subsequently she came and spoke, and wrote, and drew pictures as in life. Once she brought a canary bird, and said she would try to bring one that she could leave with me. It was at my first sitting with Harry Bastian that she came, in a good light, her own sweet self, her white robe girdled, without corset, as in life, and the canary bird with her. For the last months I have seldom sat with Mr. Bastian without her materialised form appearing.

With W. E. I have seen a form who shewed himself plainly, who spoke a great deal, who sat at table, ate and drank with us, and served five persons with their food and drink as a servant would pass them about. He remained in form about two hours.

Another spirit whom I saw with Katy Cook, cut, or allowed me to cut, I forget which, a piece of some inches from her robe and then appeared to create the material to supply the vacancy by passing her hand over the hole. She sat by me, I felt her pulse, and conversed with her. She threw her arms around my neck and kissed my cheek. She remained in form about two hours. Now, to what do these facts point? Clearly to me they betoken that, as we make our lives harmonious with one another and with our spirit friends, by obeying the law of love, our friends will not only shew themselves to us for a few moments, or in rare cases like these I have mentioned for two hours, but they will be able to come to us for longer or shorter visits, as we need to see them, to have their counsel in words and their sympathy in deeds. If our friends can appear full formed, with normal pulse, with eyes that see, and ears that hear, and tongues that speak, and if they can remain an hour or two in rare cases, may we not hope that conditions may be sought and found that will make these cases less and less rare?

If a man, a woman, or a babe may be materialised, and I have seen them all in times too numerous to mention, why may not a bird, or animal? Many think that the birds and animals that have been materialised have been imported, living, from the outside world. But our spirit friends describe to us our dead pets, and say they are with us. Again and again, I have had this done—for instance, a spirit, speaking in the presence of a medium who knew nothing of my past, said: "Your dog that was poisoned by the boys when you were a little girl, is here, and the bird whose leg your husband chanced to break, and which he afterwards accidentally killed, is here, and all your pets are here." All these facts about my pets were true. Now, I do not know that a bird or a dog can materialise; that is a fact that I have not yet observed. If any one has evidence bearing on this subject, I hope it will be given us. If we can influence conditions by our own good conduct, and bring our friends back to us, surely Spiritualists ought to be the best behaved people in the world. Where would be the sting of death if we could lay down our life in this world and take it up again at will, as our Blessed Lord could? And if we love and serve Him, shall we not be like Him?

Love keeps all law, not the love of self, but the love of the neighbour. The law of purgatory is, that we cannot serve or save ourselves, except by serving and saving others. We may see by this what we have to do to bring our loved ones to our hearts, and also to our homes, in material form. I think we ought to begin by respecting mediumship, and by being just to this great gift. I would no more have people medium-ridden, than I would have them priest-ridden. If we defer to mediums unjustly, we spoil them, and give bad spirits the command of them. But if we seek the rightest right for ourselves and them, we promote pure mediumship, and do a heavenly work in the world. For thirty years I have helped mediums, and few have been better rewarded than I have. My record of phenomena and teaching is truly wonderful.

MRS. HARDINGE BRITTON IN LONDON.

Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum.

The promoters of the Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum, which has recently been established under the presidency of Mr. Sandys Britton, must have been gratified by the success of their first public meeting, held on Sunday evening last, in St. Andrew's Hall, Newman-street, Oxford-street. The floor of the spacious hall was well filled, and Mrs. Hardinge Britton, who delivered the opening address of the series, met with a very hearty reception.

Mrs. Britton's subject was "Spiritualism in the Nineteenth Century." There is not a religion, she said, that has ever stirred the heart of man, that has not been founded on Spiritualism. Besides the special movements which have been crystallised into religious faiths, there are many evidences of outpouring from spiritual powers in the past. Many of such movements, from the twelfth century to the present, have partaken of a spasmodic, contagious, and epidemic character, falling for the most part on the ignorant and least imaginative of the people. Examples may be found in the Irish, American, Swedish, German, and French revivals. The Spiritualism of the present day does not partake of this character; it is the fruitage of the ages, the modern Messiah coming in obedience to many an advent voice crying in the wilderness of materialism and superstition. The first of the advent voices proclaiming its arrival was Swedenborgianism. Swedenborg was a representative man of the race, and his speciality was to open the gates of the life beyond, and to create that mighty revolution in religious sentiment which excluded the strange and fantastic doctrines of ecclesiasticism, and pointed to the life hereafter as the next step in advance of the life present. Had there been many seers illuminated like himself, Swedenborgianism would now have been the religion of reason and of humanity. The next great advent voice of Spiritualism is the progress of science, which has mounted step by step from the visible to the invisible until it stands baffled alone by the power by which it examines itself, by the very soul which questions. Another of the waymarks of Spiritualism bears the dread name of Atheism. Up to the time when the French Encyclopedists and philosophers dared to proclaim the duty of reasoning and of thinking, religion had been dealt out at the pleasure of the priest alone, in the form of ecclesiastical dogma. It was then that the pitiless logic of the materialist began to demand strong reasons for the affirmations of ecclesiasticism, and she was speechless. "If God spake with men in olden time, why not now? If angels walked on earth in Jerusalem, why not in Europe?" Those voices have never been silenced; the echo of their demand has come down the ages still unanswered. Then another voice came from the East, from the dry bones of the dead nations, upon which the winds of civilisation were beginning again to breathe, from cave-temples, and ruined cities, and upheaved dynasties, speaking of older ecclesiastic systems, and demanding evidence of the originality of that system that was claiming to be the only revelation to man. But still no answer came. Then came the discovery of electricity and magnetism, realising the dream of the philosopher's stone. Then came Mesmer, as another John the Baptist, shewing that all the correlated forces of matter are concentrated and sublimated within man himself, that the life principle is a reality, that it is transferable, that it is an imperishable, invisible substance, that it can be conveyed from body to body, and, projected by will, can alter the molecular condition of the diseased organism. But there still remains the question—What becomes of this great mystery that quivers before us and traverses space, and is the soul of the universe, and the life of man? The electrician and the mesmerist cannot answer the question. Then comes clairvoyance, another marvellous foot-print in the desert. Thirty-five years ago Alphonse Cahagnet sought to become a master of spiritual things, and when the spirits of his lucides brought back tidings from afar, he rejoiced to think that his materialistic theory was strengthened. "Here," he said, "is expounded all the philosophy of miracle; there is a life power in man that can transcend matter and can take note of its most secret and imperishable elements." But then he found his lucides passing from his grasp, speeding away beyond the limitations of his knowledge, passing into a world of which he knew not, and bringing back tidings of a fair land and a glorious people, of a happy country where no hearts were breaking, and no dark clouds over-shadowed the sun. They declared that these were the people that once lived on earth, and that had now taken their next step in the upward path of eternity. At first he thought the lucides were hallucinated; but there came to him witnesses on all sides confirming their testimony, and he was compelled to acknowledge that the questions which his earnest reason had propounded were answered, that the Elixir vite was found, that the gates were no longer ajar, but were thrown wide open, and the question was for ever answered, "If a man die, shall he live again?" These revelations on the Continent synchronized so closely with the same class of manifestations in America, England, and elsewhere, that it became evident that a universal pentecostal outpouring was pervading the entire world. But for such an outpouring the light of religion would have been wholly quenched. Spiritualism came as a growth, step by step, as the last link in the chain of a great scientific revelation. It came in obedience to the cry of the advent voice proclaiming that the Messiah who should unite the long divorced elements of religion and science was at last at hand. It was received with persistent opposition; but every proclamation of imposture, deception, fraud and hallucination has always been met by spirit power with fresh revelations, fresh potencies, and fresh swords wherewith to do battle with the ghosts of dead arguments. Every sense has been appealed to, and unless science advances into this new path she is disgraced. In every direction the spirit-power has been equal to the new demand made upon it, and instruments have been raised up from all ranks of the people. The work is not a merely human one; it is the work of God and His angels. Spiritualism is not the contagion of a strange magnetic force in the air; it is not an atmospheric epidemic, but it is a science and a religion. Science is the fundamental basis of order in the universe; it is God's law, and Spiritualism is the science of sciences. It is a religion. Religion is the revelation of the Supreme Being, and it consists of three elements,—God, the great First Cause; immortality, the effect of life; and a standard of life practice by which man shall outwork the laws of his being. The first religion was when man, standing by the side of the open grave, followed the parting spirit into the brighter and better land with a consciousness that there is no death. Religion is that which speaks to the soul of the savage and of the saint in the still small voice of conscience. Beyond this we have only forms and modes of expression. But, it may be asked, what can rapping spirits bring to us of such a religion as this—the knowledge of God, immortality, and a perfect standard of life practice? They come to us with the voice of affection and appeal to the heart, and by strange and wonderful monitions bring to us the conviction that the spirits of those that love us and that we have loved are in our midst. Little signs and tokens hidden away in the heart, pet names, old-remembered words,—when these are sounded out by the dancing tables and vibrating floors, after the form we have loved has crumbled into dust and ashes,—such memories convince us that there is no more death, that the spirit lives, that the spirit is the man, and not the broken tenement that has been hidden away in the earth. The world may despise it, but it is a grander and holier sermon than has been preached for eighteen hundred years. But you question further, and you say, "O Spirit! tell me of God:" and the answer comes "God is a Spirit." Now I know the Grand Man of the universe; I know the Engineer that guides the fiery stars; I know the Captain that steers those barques of light on the ocean of eternity; I know the mighty Statesman that has made the laws of the universe; I know the supreme Architect that has built up this glorious world; I know what the spirit is, and so I know God—who is the Spirit. No Spiritualist who has ever clasped hands with the spirit of man from the beyond; no Spiritualist who has ever recognised the fact that the soul lives and preserves all its powers or potencies; will ever more walk alone, need ever more doubt the existence of the Grand Man of the universe. That is what these rapping spirits do for the first great element of religion. Then as to the second element, the most ignorant and undeveloped spirit that has spurned the dust and lived beyond the chemical disintegration of death, proves the fact of immortality; and when it is confirmed by ten thousand legions of returning spirits, we may be said to know the fact for ourselves. As to the third element, you open your Bibles and point to your texts, and you remind me that for eighteen hundred years there have been revelations given to man in the beautiful and simple words of the Golden Rule—that the sweet voice of the Master has come down the ages, ever sounding out the eleventh commandment, which may be summed up in one word, "Love." And still the world is full of crime, and wrong, and hate, of legalised murder and war, and still the journals of the day are disgraced with the ghastly lists of crime, and men, women, and children of this great, rich Babylon are this night walking outcast in your city streets, not knowing where to lay their heads, and obliged to wait for the pitiful dole of charity to find the crust that is to keep them from starvation. Surely we ask for something more than the tender and gracious words that Jesus spoke: we ask for a motive to make us obey them, to incorporate them into our lives. And now we have it. All returning spirits—returning under conditions that prevent the possibility of collusion,—proclaim that they are happy or miserable in precise proportion to the good or evil they have done on earth. Every returning spirit is in judgment even as he has obeyed or disobeyed, and is thus an illustration of the doctrine of personal responsibility. Let us accept the revelation. If you go to the telegraph operator's room you do not stand before the marvel of the electric sounds, or the ingenuity of the battery, or the means by which electricity is made the world's post-boy; but you wait for the message! The phenomenalists of the present day, who call themselves Spiritualists, are no Spiritualists until they listen to the message. Those who rejoice in the marvels of Spiritualism and accept its facts are but Spiritists until they advance into the grander, broader field where Spiritualism becomes a religion. It is at the point where they listen to the message, where their hearts burn and their spirits are lifted up in a great psalm of rejoicing for this glorious light,—it is at this point alone that they become Spiritualists.

Mrs. Britten's discourse—of which we have been able to find space for only a mere outline—was characterised by great power and eloquence, and evidently met with the fullest sympathy and appreciation of her audience.

Central Association of Spiritualists.

On Monday evening the members and friends of this Association gave Mrs. Britten a very cordial reception at their rooms, 38, Great Russell-street. The company present on the occasion included:—Miss Arundale; Mr. E. E. Arnsley; Mr., Mrs., and Miss Allan; Mr. E. Bertram; Mr. Sandys Britton; Mrs. Angelo Bezzi; Mr. J. J. Bodmer; Mr. J. Bowman; Mr. D. Barrett; Mrs. S. Carter; Mrs. Chaplin; Miss Corner; Miss Nina Corner; Mrs. E. Combes; Mr. J. G. Dyne; Mrs. A. Darling; Mrs. Edensor; Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Everitt; Mr. F. Everitt; and Mr. and Mrs. Desmond G. Fitzgerald; Mr. Jno. S. Farmer; Miss Godfrey; Mr. Geo. Gill; Mr. J. N. Greenwell; Mr. G. F. Green; Miss F. Gregory; Mr. S. C. Hall, F.S.A.; Mrs. Heckford; Miss Houghton; Mrs. and Miss Hope; Mr. R. Hopton; Miss M. Hopton; Mr. A. Howe; Mrs. Kate Fox Jencken; Mrs. E. M. James; Mr. J. A. Kenrick; Rev. W. Miall; Mrs. H. Michell; Mr. J. Malcolm, F.R.C.S.; Mrs. Malcolm; Miss A. E. Major; Mr. and Mrs. Morse; The Lady Helena Newenham; Mrs. Noakes; Mrs. Orrock; Mr. C. Pearson; Mrs. S. Pearson; Mr. A. Powell; Mr. and Mrs. R. Pearce; Mr. and Mrs. Dawson Rogers; Mrs. C. Rice; Madame de Steiger; Mrs. and Miss Sainsbury; Mr. Thos. Shorter; Miss Shorter; Mrs. Schweitzer; Mr. M. Theobald; Mr. and Mrs. Warren Thompson; Miss F. E. Till; Mr. and Mrs. Vance; Mrs. M. L. S. Williams; Mr. E. W. Wade; Mrs. Western; Mr. D. Younger; &c., &c., &c.

The first part of the evening was devoted to introductions to Mrs. Britten, and to the interchange of friendly greetings between herself and many old friends, whom she had thus the pleasure to meet once again. Mr. E. Dawson Rogers then took the chair, and on the part of the Council of the Association, tendered to Mrs. Britten a cordial welcome, which was heartily endorsed by Mr. S. C. Hall in an earnest and eloquent address.

Mrs. Britten shortly afterwards, under control, gave the following answers to written questions, which had been sent up to the chairman:—

Question.—The past few years have been times of unrest, transition, and strife—the reflection, we are told, of strife in the spiritual world. During this period, practical work in Spiritualism has been almost impossible. Is this state of affairs passing away, and what do you see in the near future?

Answer.—We must take exception to the premises. There are methods operating from the world of causes which affect humanity, and are received according to the light possessed. All the foundations of religion proceed from the effect of some mighty psychological, but individual, mind. Around this mental power are clustered the various satellites of thought that cannot attain to the single individual's power. Thus are sects formed. As long as the psychological impress of one mind remains effective in the world, the power of that mind becomes a focal point, around which all the followers group. As long as that influence remains potential, so long does the sect remain. When any one of the followers of the leading founder transcends his power, he takes the place of the original leader and becomes the founder of another sect. The aim of Spiritualism is to disintegrate these associative movements, to deal with the atoms and not with the mass, to throw humanity upon its own personal responsibility, to make each one a priest for himself before the Lord. Until this is accomplished, the present phase of spiritual revelation will not cease. We do not discourage associative movement for temporary purposes; it is needed to eliminate power, and to produce the fruitage of purpose. When this is effected, association must break up. This being the purpose of Spiritualism, we do not acknowledge any incoherence in the movement, any mistake in carrying out the purpose. Those who have attained to the higher or second stage of existence, have laid their plans in conformity with what they know of human nature. Fear not, nor be discouraged, nor pronounce failure on the disintegration of every movement that has effected the work of the day. The prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," is for ever being answered. In the work of each day, each true and faithful worker is receiving his daily bread.

Question.—What may be regarded as indubitable evidence that the phenomena, admittedly attributable to some force other than that of the conscious agency of the medium or "sitters," are produced by departed human beings?

Answer.—There is no crucial test by which you can arrive at the conclusion you seek, until you are in a position to exclude the action of your own individualised spirits. You yourselves, as spirits, possess all the powers of the disembodied; these are only phenomenal, and more potent, because they are freed from the encumbrances of matter. You are in germ the highest angel and the mightiest archangel moving around the throne of the great central Sun, and unconsciously you are expressing these potencies on everything with which you come in contact. Do you suppose that in the assemblage of spirits, embodied and disembodied, there is not an inevitable commixture of powers? The mightiest spirit embodied may transcend all the power of the disembodied present. Therefore, there is no crucial test at present but experience. As you remember that at each end of the telegraphic wire there must be intelligence to give and to receive, and as you study the limitations and influences of matter, you will begin to find a clue to the science of Spiritualism. You desire to go into the very Shechinah and grasp the Holy of Holies, before you have learned the way to mount the steps. Those steps are science. You have not learned the first letters of the alphabet of a true spiritual science. When you arrive at this, you will recognise the difference between the spiritual influence produced by the embodied, and the spiritual influence produced by the disembodied, or dematerialised spirit. You will recognise this only by experience. Your speaker, even without the aid of scientific training, is now able to recognise the entry, the departure, or the presence or interference of the various spirits which group around each person selected as the mouthpiece for the expression of spiritual thought. It would be impossible to communicate the power or the possibilities of this sense of discernment. It is a question of experience, and the sense will be sharpened only as you study spiritual potencies and powers. Why not come together in masses? Why not come together in the solemn assembly, and in the Pentecostal hour, and study each other, and learn the mystery of character and comprehend the nature of that sphere which each of you gives off in your daily and hourly intercourse? We can offer you no royal road to this knowledge, and were we able to do so, we would not deprive your souls of the strength that, as gladiators in the mighty arena of spiritual forces, you are called upon to exercise.

Question.—Is it possible for a spirit to bring a medium out of a cabinet and to pass him or her off as a materialised form without being conscious of the false impression that is thus conveyed to the circle?

Answer.—The spirits that are operative in producing the changes in ponderable matter are the masons, the carpenters, the bricklayers, the mechanics of the movement; they are not the philosophers; they are simply the workmen, and by the gross characteristics of their bodies they are nearer to matter and more capable of operating upon matter than the more sublimated spirits who should explain to you the philosophy of the movement. The spirit desiring to produce a certain phenomenon rarely questions the effect that it may have upon the minds of those present; it performs its special mission without any reference to the opinions that may be entertained thereon. It is thus possible that spirits may unintentionally delude, but we will not admit that any spirit wilfully deceives you without the presence of higher, mightier, and purer minds around who desire most earnestly to awaken you by phenomena to the philosophy of the movements produced. Hitherto you have not sought to comprehend that philosophy; you have been too well satisfied with the production of the phenomena; you must go over your footsteps again and not be too hasty to condemn that which does not assimilate with your peculiar views of what you call truth; you must take the phenomena piece by piece and examine them for yourselves. At present you scarcely appreciate the vast difficulty of the spirits working in the light at one end of the telegraph and mortals receiving the message at the other end in total darkness. When you can take part in these operations, and learn the conditions under which you may draw the line of demarcation between the human and the spiritual, you will see that there is far less intention of fraud and imposition than you now believe. Your spirit friends meet with you as those that are arrayed on the stage. You expect that the curtain shall go up and the drama be performed; and the spirits desire to satisfy you whether the conditions are there or not; thus they unintelligently in some instances, and unintentionally in all, often assist in producing phenomena of a confused and heterogeneous character. But be assured there is more of spiritual intention behind these strange movements than you have hitherto given credit for.

Question.—Why is there apparently a lull in the production of physical phenomena just at the time when scientific people are asking for demonstration of the facts?

Answer.—How did the phenomena arrive? They arrived when multitudes came together all over the world in eager, earnest groups, seeking them in a receptive attitude by the formation of circles, by patiently waiting, by deep, earnest study, not by cold, lifeless gatherings, not by the mere subscription of names, not by apathetically waiting for marvels or powers, but by the earnest, faithful heart put into the work, sitting day and night, waiting earnestly for the Pentecostal fires, like tongues of flame, to fall upon the heads of the seekers. Until they gather together in that earnest spirit your scientists who ask that the power shall come to them in their own fashion will fail. They must commence like little children; they must seek for the power and take it captive as they would the kingdom of Heaven. When they do this and form themselves into earnest groups for faithful investigation, the power will be in the midst of them.

Question.—Speaking generally, is the outlook satisfactory for a course of teaching which shall reserve the investigation of phenomena until minds and hearts are reached by the abstract soundness of the principles inculcated?

Answer.—As was enunciated last night, Spiritualism is a science and a religion. Those who are satisfied with the phenomena are Spiritists only. Those who listen to the message, who wait for the spirit voices, learn that God, who is a Spirit, can only be comprehended when man knows what spirit is; when a man has proved that spirit is the Alpha and the Omega, that matter is the phantasmagoric dance of atoms, that spirit alone is real and that the source of all spirit is the God before whom man bows his knee and worships, he has the first element of spiritual religion. When he can stand as yon white-haired prophet (Mr. S. C. Hall) has stood to-night and can say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," the Redeemer of knowledge from ignorance, the Redeemer of eternity from time, of immortality from mortality, he has the second element of religion. When man can say, "I am making my sphere. My acts, my deeds, my words, are building my house and weaving my garment; the kingdom of Heaven is within me and the kingdom of hell is there also, and I shall never find either unless I take it with me,"—when a man applies this to his daily life and practice, he has the third element of religion. All associations, all gatherings, all courses of teaching that make for this sublime religion are good. They are no failures. Even if they last but a day, fear not; they do their work, they sow a seed that shall never be plucked up, for it is the seed of immortal and Divine truth. Any course of teaching, even in the lowest whisper, of this redemptive doctrine is working for the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and can never be lost. Therefore we bid God speed to every such effort. God's blessing is on it whether we ask it or no. There are no failures before Him; the failures are only in human opinion. When you trust to the Infinite and do the work according to the best powers entrusted to you, you have done enough to give Him back with usury the ten talents that He has lent to you.

Question.—What is the best course for a writing medium to adopt if he desires to get rid of an unwelcome, lying, scribbling control who persists in interfering with an important communication which is being given by a good spirit?

Answer.—Is the questioner sure that it is a lying control that interferes? Is he certain that the good spirit whose mentality he believes is also the operator—is he certain that he is the operator? The higher the spirit and the more sublimated the mind, the more sublimated the spiritual body; consequently, the highest communications require the aid of medium spirits, and there are points in the action of every phenomenon when the force becomes dissipated, when the controlling power is lost by the breaking up of the conditions under which the phenomenon proceeds. When this is the case the medium spirit, or the operator who is attempting to express the mind of another, appears to be the mere idle, mocking interpolator that your question suggests. But in very many instances when the force fails and the mere mechanic at work is left to himself, he expresses his incoherence in what you deem to be an interference. There are claims of existence from the highest to the lowest, and the presence of some antagonistic or neutralising magnetism may at times interfere with or break up the conditions under which phenomena are produced. The good and the true is always around you; it never fails; the right hand of mortality is always grasped by the guardian angel of good, but the various operations by which the telegraph is conducted are so little understood that you often find a breaking up of the circuit interfering with the communication, and you attribute it either to fraud or malice. Dismiss this from your mind. Go out into the street and search for rogues and you will find villain stamped on every face you look into; search for the good and the true and you will find a friend at every street corner. You are too apt to colour your views with that which you receive from your own idiosyncrasies. Lift up your mind to supreme heights, and you will find that the supreme and nobler manifestations of spiritual science will dawn upon you.

Question.—It has been frequently observed that great calamities come in groups—that, for instance, if a great fire occurs, it is followed by others in rapid succession. Is there a spiritual cause for this, and, if so, what is it?

Answer.—Aye, there is a spiritual cause. You are now touching upon a phase of science that is tabooed, and that was ill-understood even in the days of antiquity. We speak of that which is contemptuously termed astrology. "The heavens are a book," says Isaiah. Who has read it? You physicists claim that every atom of matter influences every other in the universe, and yet from this universal sphere of inter-dependence you would exclude the magnificent groups of suns, the whirlpools of stars, the clusters of burning lights that throb and pulsate through the universe with one unbroken chain of life! Can you exclude your little dewdrop in space from the universal sum of this influence? Impossible. The universe is built upon geometrical and mathematical principles, and nothing can be plucked away or destroyed without marring the whole scheme. The visible universe is the shadow or expression of the invisible, and that which affects the casnet or temple in which I dwell must have a moral and spiritual correspondence within. Therefore it is that the mind is disposed to crime in certain contagious conditions of the atmosphere; that receptive minds are disposed to inventions in certain receptive conditions of the atmosphere. It is in this sense that there are certain inevitable conditions of collusion in the atoms of matter which tend to produce combustion, which tend to produce wars, and all the various accidents, as you term them. They are the procedures of inevitable law. When you understand that all the changes that are for ever transpiring in the magnificent march of the fiery hosts produce inevitable results upon earth, you will begin to comprehend that astronomy and astrology are kindred sciences, that astronomy consists of sums and figures, and that astrology puts life into them. The tendency to repeat certain events upon earth, to produce certain exhibitions of criminal or saintly purpose, is the result of a correspondential movement in the vast army of breathing worlds that are marching from one eternity to another. When man, by the sublimer powers of his soul, masters the meaning of the scheme, he will be at no loss to understand what conjunctions of the starry bodies will operate with malignant or benignant force upon the earth, and he will be enabled to prepare remedial measures against these so-called accidents. When occultism is thus made a science, and its dreams are verified, man will indeed become the master of the situation.

On Sunday evening next, under the auspices of the Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum, Mrs. Britten will deliver an address at St. Andrew's Hall, 14, Newman-street, Oxford-street, on the question, "What do we know concerning the origin and destiny of man?"

PROPHETIC DREAMS.

The difficulty of applying any theory of explanation to authenticated cases of this description must be admitted to be insuperable. The phenomena are not recollected images, for nothing in the remotest degree connected with them has as yet come within the cognisance of the seer. Nor are they chance creations of the brain, inasmuch as they hold undeniable relation with events about to occur. Nor are they objects to be reached by the most speculative magnetic theory, since the operation of such agents awaits—and then survives not an instant—the dissolution of the union between soul and body. One thing, at least, is sure—that the matter contains, within its many extraneous folds, that germ and principle of truth, which septs, from Lucian downwards—irritated and baffled by the falsehoods and absurdities of credulous narrators, and still more credulous hearers—flung away, without analysis, with the lumber in which it was enveloped. There is something harassing, both to sage and fool, in an unsatisfied doubt—an unguessable riddle. Blind old Homer is said to have died, broken-hearted, from inability to solve an enigma proposed to him by a fisherman!

It is enough, there are no commissioned wonder-workers now, and even that daily miracle, the conversion of the fleshly heart, is wrought in silence and secrecy; but is it just to conclude that because the Almighty Ruler has seen fit to close one channel of connection (that of direct miracles) between Himself and the material world, He has abolished also that intercourse which there seems reason to believe existed in the elder time, between the world of spirits and of men? As revelations of this description had not the same object as the Christian miracles—that of bearing testimony to the illimitable power of the God of justice and of mercy—(Abraham, in the parable of Dives, seems to hold their testimony less efficacious than that of recorded writings), their continuance was not essential to the unity of the new dispensation. The subject engaged much attention among the early Fathers of the Christian Church, and, if these agreed in nothing else respecting it, they were at least unanimous in attributing the wonder to a non-natural source. It has been wisely said that God's works are not to be brought to the tribunal of His natural laws, and that physical impossibilities have often been spiritual certainties. Let us now proceed to illustration:—

Mr. Drayson, a young undergraduate of Cambridge, had been reading, during the long vacation, at the quiet little town of Exmouth, where, as many readers will remember, the river Exe is crossed by a ferry communicating with the Starcross station on the Great Western railway. For this purpose, a boat remains in constant attendance, from dawn to dusk. One night, between twelve and one, the young man suddenly awoke with the impression of having been addressed by an imperative voice, saying, with such distinctness that the last word still rang upon his ear:—

"Go down to the ferry!"

Thinking it an ordinary dream, Mr. Drayson composed himself again to sleep, when a second time the command was repeated, with this addition:—

"The boatman waits!"

There was something in this second voice which it seemed to the young man's mind impossible to disregard. He did, however, combat the inclination, reasoning with himself for some minutes on what he tried to consider the absurdity of rising in the dead of night, at the bidding of an imaginary voice, to go to a ferry where no boat would be found (for the ferryman resided at Starcross), upon an errand of which he knew nothing. His efforts, however, to dismiss the idea were unsuccessful. Sleep, he felt, was impossible. At worst, it would but be a walk to the ferry and back, and none but himself need be aware of that little excursion. Finally, he sprang up, and, not to leave time for more self-arguments, dressed rapidly and set forth. Approaching the ferry, he heard, to his great astonishment, the boatman's hoarse voice hailing him impatiently through the darkness:—"Well, you've kep' me waiting long enough to-night, sir! Here I've been stopping for you nigh an hour!" The man had, it appeared, received his summons also, but did not attribute it to any unusual source. Finding no passenger on his own side, he concluded that he had been hailed by a passing boat, and directed to go over.

Arrived at Starcross, a further idea or impulse, which seemed to have its origin in the former, took possession of Mr. Drayson's mind. "Exeter!" "Exeter!" "Exeter!" began to reverberate, as it were, in his mental ear like a summoning bell. His impression now was that at Exeter would be fulfilled the purpose—whatever it might be—of his strange nocturnal mission. To Exeter he accordingly proceeded, reaching that city about dawn. Here, however, all impulse, or impression, abandoned him, and, wandering aimlessly about the streets, he began to blame himself for the readiness with which he had yielded to what was, perhaps, an idle fancy, finally resolving to return home by the next train. Meanwhile, the shops and houses began to shew signs of life, and, passing an hotel, the young man went in and ordered breakfast. The waiter was very slow in bringing the repast, but explained the delay on the plea that the Assizes, then proceeding, had filled the house to overflowing. Drayson took but little interest in the subject, but observing that the waiter regarded it as an event of considerable importance, good-humouredly encouraged him to continue the theme, and was not a little amused by the man's description of the cases already disposed of, together with his own views of those yet remaining to be tried. Upon the whole, the waiter's entertaining volubility ended by inspiring his listener with a portion of his own interest in the matter, and accordingly, instead of returning to Exmouth by the next train, he strolled about till the court opened, and then took his place among the spectators.

The case just commencing appeared to create unusual interest, the prisoner at the bar, a carpenter, being arraigned on a capital charge. The chain of evidence against him, though circumstantial, seemed complete, and a conviction inevitable. There was, in point of fact, no opening for a defence, unless the accused were in a position to prove the Crown witnesses mistaken in his identity, and establish an alibi. Asked what he had to say, he quietly replied:—

"It is impossible I could have committed this crime, because on the day and at the hour alleged by the witnesses I was sent for to mend the sash-line of a window at Mr. Gibson's house at Meadowbank." Here he paused for a moment, then continued: "There is but one person in the world who could prove that I was there, but I don't know who he is nor where to have him looked for; and even he might have forgotten it all by this time. No, stay. I know he would remember me, for a particular reason. But, there! it can't be helped. The Lord's will be done!" concluded the poor fellow, appearing to resign himself to his fate.

All this time young Drayson had been listening with profound attention to the proceedings, and, as the prisoner finished his sad and hopeless address, he started, and gazed earnestly at him. As his eyes dwelt on the gloomy, toil-worn face, a chain of circumstances—one by one, link by link, trivial at the time, but now bearing on the liberty, if not the very life, of a fellow-creature—came back to his remembrance.

Some months before, Drayson had gone to pay a morning visit to a friend at Meadowbank. The latter was from home, but, anxious to see him, Drayson resolved to await his return, and went into his friend's library, in search of a book to beguile the time. Here, however, he had found a carpenter making some repairs about the window, and, in place of reading, he stood for some minutes watching the man, and conversing with him about his work. While doing so, something was said that he desired to remember, and took out his note-book to make a memorandum, but found he had lost his pencil. The carpenter, observing this, handed him his own—a short, brown, stumpy, article, with square sides—saying that "if he might make so bold, the gentleman was welcome to it."

All this flashed back to the young man's mind, as clearly as if it had occurred but the day before. Hastily turning to his note-book, he at once found the very entry he had made—date included—written in the thick but faint lines produced by the carpenter's pencil.

He instantly made known to the court his wish to be examined on the prisoner's behalf, and, being sworn, deposed to the above facts, clearly identifying the prisoner, as well as the pencil, which the man produced from his pocket. The jury were satisfied, and returned a verdict of acquittal.

It is difficult to meet a sufficiently-authenticated case of this description, otherwise than with the simple confession that God's ways are not as our ways, and that it may be His pleasure, as it is within His power, to suffer His ministering angels to speak in this mysterious tongue to the souls He has selected as the earthly instruments of His Divine will.

A PREMONITION OF DEATH.

The following case of apparently objectless premonition, or "death warning," occurred to a lady who is a friend of my mother, and with whom I am sufficiently well acquainted to express the highest opinion of her earnestness and truthfulness. I feel certain that the lady in question would be willing to afford opportunities for verification and authentication to any member of the Society for Psychical Research or other investigator who might be specially interested in the class of frequently-recurring phenomena to which the case belongs. I give the account in her own words, as noted soon after the occurrence by which the premonition was verified.

FATAL ACCIDENT: SINGULAR PREMONITION.

On the 18th of July last, I had the following dream, which was strangely and painfully fulfilled or realised on the 26th of the same month—eight days afterwards.

I dreamed I was walking on the edge of a steep cliff facing the sea. Dear Fred and a strange gentleman were a few steps in advance of me, when Fred suddenly slipped down the side of the cliff, and, as he fell, gazed with a look of the most intense earnestness and anguish as into my very soul. I remember afterwards turning to the stranger and asking him his name.

He replied: "My name is Henry Irvin." I said: "Do you mean Irving, the actor?" to which he answered: "No, not Irving the actor, though I am something after his style." I then said: "Now that I look at you, I see the same expression in your face that I have often noticed in the photographs of Irving exhibited in shop windows." After this I awoke, feeling terribly anxious about poor Fred, an anxiety which prevented me from again sleeping that night.

On going down to breakfast next morning, I asked John (Fred's eldest brother) where Fred then was. He replied that his brother was at Manchester. I said that I had had a most distressing dream about him, and that I should be so glad to see him again at home. (Fred, it may be as well to say, was travelling partner in the firm of the three brothers.) John observed that he was sure to hear that day from Fred; but my dream impressed me so forcibly that I made him promise that, on arriving at his office, he would telegraph to me should there be no letter. There was, however, a letter from Fred at the office; and I consequently received no telegram, and made my mind easy for that day. Each succeeding day I inquired where Fred was, and when he was coming home; John saying: "He is not at the seaside (near any cliff), so you need not worry; he is now at Leeds." A day or two after this, however, John received a letter from Fred, stating that he purposed going to Scarborough for a week's holiday. Upon this I begged John to write asking him to return home at once, and said that I should myself do so that very day; but something interfered and I did not so write.

On the morning of the 23rd, about five a.m., I was between sleeping and waking when some person (a man) seemed to pass the side of my bed, and to say in a loud voice, "You have not done with trouble yet." After hearing this I became quite conscious. When, shortly afterwards, I met John at breakfast, I told him this dream or vision also, saying, "I think the man's voice was that of your father," being in my own mind quite convinced that this was the case. John replied, "How you worry about the stupid dreams! That is how you went on about Fred some days ago when he was enjoying himself all the time. He wrote to me yesterday to send him ten pounds, saying that he was enjoying himself immensely, and that the weather was glorious."

On the 26th, the proprietor of the Grand Hotel, Scarborough, telegraphed to say that an accident had occurred (poor Fred was dead at the time); but John kept this sad news from me as long as he could. Another telegram then came to John's office to say that "all was over"; and John returned home in a terrible state of mind informing me that an accident had happened. I exclaimed: "I know it all; don't tell me any more; I have always warned him against riding strange horses." At this time I had not been informed as to the nature of the accident; but it was suggested that he might have fallen from the "lift" at the hotel, or that a chandelier might have fallen and hurt him. John and I then set off at once for Scarborough, where we were received by Willie, the second brother. At York, however, I had obtained a copy of the Leeds Mercury, and in it I read the following account:—

SCARBOROUGH.—SAD DEATH OF A GENTLEMAN VISITOR.

"An accident of a melancholy character, and which, unfortunately, has been attended with fatal results, occurred on Wednesday evening to a London gentleman named F. S. It appears that on the afternoon of that day, the deceased, along with a casual acquaintance named Deverell, who is staying at the Castle Hotel, went for a ride on horseback along the beautiful Forge Valley. When near Ayton, the deceased was somewhat in advance of his companion, and it is surmised that his horse shied at a white gate. Anyhow, he was thrown on the road, and the horse galloped away. His companion, on getting up to him, dismounted, and a passing carriage was utilised to convey Mr. S. to his hotel, where, notwithstanding the best medical aid was at hand, he expired, three hours after the unfortunate occurrence, it is supposed from concussion of the brain."

After the inquest, Fred's companion in the fatal ride called upon us and accompanied us to the spot where the accident occurred. This gentleman sat opposite to me in the carriage, and the first time I really looked him in the face I perceived in it the same expression I had observed in the stranger I saw in my dream. Upon this I inquired, "Is your name Henry?" to which question he replied in the affirmative. I then told him about my dream, mentioning that the man I saw had said that his name was Irvin—not Irving, though he was something "after his style." He then said: "That is most extraordinary; I am connected with the Volunteers, and give recitations at Wimbledon and elsewhere. Sometimes we give private theatricals, when I am always introduced as Henry Irving, jun."

These forewarnings are most strange and interesting; for though, as in the present case, the object is not evident and the misfortune is not prevented, they seem to afford evidence of a sympathy extended to us by those who are in other states of being, that certain things are foreknown, and that, in fact, "coming events cast their shadows before them." They seem to throw a light upon some of the mysterious problems of this lower world; and are, perhaps, specially worthy of note at a time like the present, when a flood of doubt is rolling in upon us and sweeping away the ancient landmarks. It may be well to carefully consider such cases when they are duly authenticated, eliminating from them what may appear dubious, but reverentially considering whether the facts embodied in them may not be a portion of God's revelation to us of the reality of a future existence.

(Appended to my original account of my dream are the signatures of John S. and Henry D. as well as my own.)

It may be interesting to add that, some time before the accident occurred, I happened to be in a certain picture-shop when I was addressed by a person who was to me a perfect stranger, and who never, so far as I am aware, had seen me before or made himself acquainted with my name or those of my sons. His name, as I afterwards ascertained, is Alsop, and he is known to many Spiritualists as a "medium." What he told me was that "all my thoughts would be engaged with William and Frederick." I was then under some anxiety in reference to the former. I asked Mr. Alsop whether he thought that some accident would happen, to which he replied that he could not tell, adding that "there was much trouble in store for me; but that God would give me strength to go through it all." I have since questioned Mr. Alsop as to this incident; but the only explanation he can give is that he was impressed to say what he did by a powerful influence which came upon him when I entered his place. I mentioned the incident at the time to Willie and poor Fred, but they only laughed and made fun

WONDERINGS.

Thou hast gone and left me, darling; canst thou hear the words I say?
Or is speaking all unneeded where thou now hast found thy way?
Is my heart spread out before thee? are its thoughts as plain as speech?
Or is love all unavailing to thy spirit's home to reach?

Canst thou see the joy and gladness which are hid behind my tears,
When I think thy journey over, over all thy doubts and fears?
Canst thou hear my heart beat to thee, firmly, truly, as of yore?
Does God's love to me dwell in thee as it used to do before?

Can this world be all too lowly for thy newly ravished eyes?
Has thy nature changed, my darling, or has Heaven made thee wiser?

Dost thou turn away in sorrow, now thou readest me aright,
From the heart whose sin and weakness once were hidden from thy sight?

Are the holy dead around thee, whom we loved together here?

Does no thought of those who mourn thee, dim thy new-born gladness there?

Can thy love to me have faded, that was once so strong and free?

No! my feeble heart still claims it, by the love it bears to thee!

With my tears I will not grieve thee, but my joy shall make thine more!

Shall I grudge that thou before me shouldst have reached the further shore?

God be with us still, mine own one—thou above and me below,—
And the heaven that is around us I with thee shall one day know. E.B.

PROFESSOR BARRETT gave a lecture on "Thought-reading, True and False" on the evening of the 4th inst., at the London Institution. Of course in what Mr. Barrett said there was little that would be new to our readers; but to his audience the subject was evidently an attractive one, and the place was densely crowded. Mr. Barrett described the experiments which had been made in so called THOUGHT-READING, in so clear and forcible a manner as to secure the deeply interested attention of the large assembly.

THEOSOPHICAL TEACHINGS.

More about the "Shell."

In view of what I suspect to be the growing impatience of many of your readers, I am very unwillingly compelled to prolong this controversy. I have followed Mr. Noel's many articles with the attention and respect due to all that he writes; yet it seems to me that what I have still to encounter are rather misapprehensions, than arguments raising definite issues between us. And these misapprehensions are not only of what I meant, but sometimes of what I said. I may have to refer to several instances of this. Thus in regard to the "shell," Mr. Noel says, "The simple question is—Can bodies think? Yes, says 'C.C.M.'" Yet I never did say so: I never suggested it: I never supposed it; and it is, I believe, altogether wide of anything taught in the doctrines we are considering. To follow Mr. Noel's criticism passage by passage with the view of vindicating my own exposition would be a tedious process, through which, probably, none of your readers, if not Mr. Noel himself, would accompany me. But the objections shewing wherein former statements are most open to misconception, I will attempt to meet them by some further elucidation, rather than by controversial insistence on any form of words. Mr. Noel has referred to "Fragments," No. V., in the November Theosophist, and thinks that the writer has there shifted his ground with regard to the "shells." "We now hear of the members of a dual consciousness, one of which is the shell." Now I cannot do a better service to the idea I wish to render intelligible than to copy most of the passage in question as a text for further comment.

"The permanent entity is that which lives through the whole series of lives. . . . Broadly speaking, it will in due time—though at some inconceivably distant future as measured by years—recover a recollection of all those lives, which will seem as days in the past to us. But the astral dross, cast off at each passage into the World of Effects, has a more or less conscious existence of its own, which is quite separate from that of the spiritual entity from which it has just been disunited. The intensity of this consciousness varies very greatly; from absolute zero in the case of a person whose life has been so supremely good and spiritual that he has engendered no low affinities, to full consciousness in the case of entire absorption by the astral principles of all the expiring life's recollections and affinities. The destiny of the astral reliquiae in either case has been the subject of abundant discussion of late, but the point to which attention may be specially called now is the mystery of dual consciousness, on the comprehension of which the comprehension of the actual course of events must depend. Occult pupils are taught to realise the possibility of dual consciousness by practically developing it during life, exercising the inner clairvoyant faculties on one set of observations or ideas, and the physical senses, with their appropriate intellectual faculties, on another set of observations and ideas at the same time; but to ordinary people the double perceptions rarely come by nature; not, at all events, with any such intensity as to render their character apparent. On the other hand, the possibility of dual consciousness in life is not beyond the range of ordinary imagination; and by dwelling on the notion it is not difficult to realise the way in which one human individual, as we know him in life, may divide up into two conscious individuals at death, neither of which is in any way a new invention, while each is distinctly conscious (so far as its consciousness is distinct at all) of identity with the late physically living entity."

Now I will ask the reader to connect this account of the shell consciousness with the notion I have already put before him of the shell as a subtly material organism, similar to, though not the same as, the physical body. Mr. Noel has throughout treated the subject as if this psychical body and its consciousness were inseparable ideas; and when he finds expressions attributing consciousness to the shell, he assumes us to mean either that consciousness is inherent in the shell without the presence of any integrating principle, or Ego (the fallacy of all materialism), or if not this, that the shell is, after all, only the manifestation of the true individual, though phenomenal, consciousness, and will therefore pass away when that consciousness is withdrawn, or at any rate be utterly incapable under any conditions of "simulating" the personality which has ceased to animate and direct it. But we are to conceive the shell in exact analogy to the physical body; and as the latter is the organism or functional expression of the physical life, so the former is, when moved to activity, the medium by which the phenomena of the psychical life are elicited and manifested. The true question, the answer to which is the answer to the whole of Mr. Noel's arguments on this head, is—Can the psychic organism be moved or excited to functional activity otherwise than by the presence and energy of the Ego which constructed it? Now throughout these teachings, a two-fold condition of the shell has been considered, and we have only to understand this to see that there is no "shifting" and no inconsistency whatever in the accounts, but a perfectly intelligible exposition. We are repeatedly told that in the vast majority of cases there is no immediate and total withdrawal of the Ego into a subjective, or quasi-subjective, state, at physical death, the intervals varying according to the moral and spiritual progress of the individual. In the meantime the shell is animated by the Ego, and its consciousness is the (lower) consciousness of the Ego, just because this consciousness is the affinity to the habits of which the shell is the material organ. The spiritual disengagement of the Ego is not complete, though it is proceeding more or less slowly, while it is still under the influence of the coarser habits of thought and feeling which have become organic; hence its dual consciousness. Its spiritual tendencies abstract it, withdrawing more and more of the total consciousness into that relatively subjective expression with which the shell has no concern—a higher organism we must conceive it—while what remains in the earth-sphere still pulsates in the shell. To understand this condition, the conception of the dual consciousness is essential; but it is not the doctrine of the shell regarded as the mere astral corpse of the individual. That is its state when the consciousness of it is at the "absolute zero in the case of a person whose life has been so supremely good and spiritual that he has engendered no low affinities," and in the other and more frequent case when the battle of the higher and lower dispositions has been fought out, and nothing remains in consciousness to which the shell can give appropriate expression.

What then remains? Why, a body. But what sort of a body? Follow the analogy. What is a physical corpse? An organism, inanimate indeed, but of which the parts and functional structure are still for some time so complete and so disciplined to their offices, that a galvanic shock can reproduce the phenomena of their living action. Being composed of grosser elements, and subserving grosser purposes, its disintegration is relatively rapid. But now I will ask the reader to refer back to my description, defective as it is, in "LIGHT" of November 18th, of the shell as a psychic organism, remembering that we have positive and irrefragable evidence of its existence in the phenomena of spontaneity, and then to conceive what must be the comparative permanence, consistency, and susceptibility to appropriate excitement from without of such a "corpse." It has absolutely no integral consciousness, and, therefore, I call whatever phenomena of life are elicited from it by the psychic attractions of living persons simulated phenomena, and I maintain that this is entirely consistent with the Adept teachings, and these with each other. Take the following passage from the September Theosophist of last year—Letters on Esoteric Theosophy, No. 1:—"The confusion in the case of the shells arises from the fact that just as a certain perfume lingers for long around 'the vase in which roses have once been distilled,' so there is a reflection of the late personality inhering in its shell. There is, as nearly as possible, no consciousness while the shell is left alone, but drawn within the current of mediumistic attraction, the ethereal man is temporarily inflated by vitality drawn from the medium, and a spurious semblance of an individuality—which may very likely profess itself that of the man to which it once belonged—is thus created." It is so difficult to say when the shell is actually quite "dead" that the writer cautiously says "next to no consciousness." And it must further be borne in mind that the shell which is not quite dead is by so much the more likely to drift into magnetic currents—the inconceivably subtle attractions of psychic influence—and, therefore, that case is put more prominently forward in these teachings. Hence, also, one of the warnings against the Spiritualistic practice of inciting and revivifying a consciousness which retards the progress and elevation of the deceased. For though the loving memory of a friend belongs surely to his higher life, we are not satisfied with this, but insist on "tests of identity," which must usually mean the re-awakening of the objective associations—many of them trivial or egotistical—of the personal life on earth. We cannot start such a train of ideas without also stimulating an interest in them—the very interest which is keeping down the spirit, that is diverting the consciousness to objects which nature herself has declared over and done with for it.

To the shell as an astral corpse, I cannot understand any metaphysical objection. To this corpse as an organism of psychic modes, once constructed by the living Ego, no greater difficulty belongs than to the conception of a dead physical organism. The possibility of bringing it into contact or rapport with the inner senses of a medium depends on laws and subtleties of nature which we Occultists are endeavouring to learn; and which you, philosophers and Spiritualists, may fairly doubt and question, but cannot rationally deny. And that such rapport would result in, or rather be, the eliciting of phenomena of apparent consciousness, seems to follow from the very conception of a psychic organism. But all depends on our ability to conceive such an organism in analogy with the physical body, and thus as separable from the integrating and self-conscious Ego. Mr. Noel here seems not very clear. For he first says, "though physical habits may exist in the complex notion we name a body, mental and spiritual habits do not;" but then after recognising the modification of character by will, he adds, "And it is quite true that all this comes back on us from outside." That gives us the notion of a body of some sort. But Mr. Noel "does not conceive it probable that we can ever get rid of all this, at least of the essence, inner meaning, and moulding power of all this." But it is not the "moulding power" that "comes back on us from outside," as the spontaneous tendencies, the thoughts, feelings, desires, imposed on consciousness by a reactive basis quite other than the originating energy of the Ego, of which itself is the result. If it is true, as Occultism asserts, that our thoughts are the modification by spiritual energy of a highly rarified element, then we can easily conceive how the association and exquisitely subtle concatenation of these thought-forms may become an organic basis of spontaneity, which yet is not quite "wrought into the very substance of our own selves," as Mr. Noel thinks. For herein lies the might of spirit, that it can repel this spontaneity, and constructing an expression of its deeper life in a more interior, yet still objective organism,* can "shuffle off" the old "shell." According to our old way of thinking (or no thinking), which is still that of nine people out of ten, there was an immediate leap from "matter," just as we know it, to pure spirit. Spirit, however, though the source of all manifestation, is subjective, and in itself immanent. Spiritualism and Occultism (and, indeed, modern science, with its hypothesis of the luminiferous ether), agree in conceiving a subtler matter; and Spiritualists, as Epes Sargent points out, have been called "grossly materialistic" for simply postulating (as did nearly all the Platonic idealists) other bodies or "vehicles" of individual spirit than the physical one.† But they probably agree with Mr. Noel in supposing the spiritual body to be created (formed) by involuntary, rather than by voluntary, energy. Nor do I say that this is not the case (so far as our present voluntary energy is concerned) as regards the connate dispositions already organised at our birth. But what our psychical body is at our maturity, and afterwards at our physical death, that, for the most part, is what our voluntary energies in this life have made it.

Against the shell as really conceived by me Mr. Noel invokes "a sense of humour." Well, I cannot argue against that; I can only say that it would be rather of the quality which "vanquished Berkeley by a grin," and refutes idealism by a stamp of the foot or a thump upon the table. The list of "the funniest doctrines" which have once exercised a "general sense of humour," and which have come to be recognised as true, or as approximate to truth, is rather extensive. Possibly in the vibrations of the "astral light" might still be detected echoes of the laughter which resounded over "educated" Europe when the notion of the inhabited Antipodes was first propounded!

Conformably to the principle I have followed in this paper, of rather making Mr. Noel's objections the occasion for what I hope is a clearer statement than pulling the objections to pieces in detail—if I could—I may ask leave to similarly deal with the other related topics. So that if these ideas possess any interest at all for the readers of "LIGHT," its space will not be wasted in mere and endless controversy, but be bestowed upon an earnest and sincere attempt to make them somewhat intelligible.

But I cannot conclude now without expressing some regret that Mr. Noel should have denounced the "monstrous and materialistic theories" of a book which he has not read, in prompt contempt of my simple and surely reasonable protest against applying those terms to ideas which we have not studied and perfectly comprehended. For several kind and generous expressions as regards myself I am very grateful; and I wish that my appreciation of the ability and power displayed by my opponent could be equally pleasing to him.

C. C. M.

* The ancients recognised several "vehicles," or bodies of different degrees of attenuation suited to, and expressive of, the different states of the spirit, the ajna ayodhya being the highest of these vehicles. Of this, and perhaps of all psychic "bodies," there would be no static manifestation, but only dynamical (in the moment of objective energy).

† I am, of course, not suggesting that Mr. Noel has reproached them on this account, though I still think him quite wrong in supposing that Epes Sargent or any intelligent Spiritualist, ever confused the spiritual body with the spirit.

EXPERIMENTS WITH NERVE-FORCE.

The Journal du Magnétisme (Paris) has re-published in its pages the essay of Dr. Baréty, of Nice, in which he details the experiments which he submits to the leading scientific Académies of the Continent. His essay has for title "The Physical Properties of a Particular Force of the Human Body, Radiating Nervic Force, commonly known as Animal Magnetism." We have in previous numbers referred to Dr. Baréty and his useful experiments, by which he demonstrates that a force is emitted by human beings, notably from the eyes, hands, and lungs. He has demonstrated that some individuals emit more of this force than others, and that some receive or re-act to it more than others; among the former are those who are known as magnetisers, and among the latter are those whom magnetisers call sensitives.

Dr. Baréty has found that he has the power of emitting or radiating this force, and he has had some decided sensitives under his professional care, upon whom he has been permitted to make the experiments which he publishes.

Among the objects experimented upon by the re-active aid of his sensitives, Dr. Baréty enumerates various metals, shells, &c., which accumulate the force, whether from the eyes, the fingers, or the lungs, and re-emit it under conditions which he specifies. His experiments show that it can pass through various substances—folded papers, and fabrics of various kinds, cushions, doors, walls, &c.;—such substances also accumulating and re-emitting it. He finds that mirrors, tables, thread, twine, needles, thimbles, plants, clothing, &c., are conductors of it.

Water, he finds, accumulates it, but does not allow it to pass through; it passes through a dry glass tumbler to the sensitive's hand or other part under experiment; but if water—no matter how little—is poured into the tumbler, the force accumulates in the water and does not pass.

The substances enumerated have the property of accumulating the neuric rays for a variable time, and of re-emitting them; the conditions of which re-emission are still under investigation. Dr. Baréty has found that neuric properties, communicated to inanimate objects, can be withdrawn by the person from whom the neuric rays emanated applying the palm of his hand to such objects.

The body of a person who does not possess, in a positive radiating degree, this neuric force, may be a good conductor of the rays; for example, Dr. Baréty placed between himself and his sensitive a third person, who was one of this neutral kind, and directed him to point at the sensitive's hand; no effect was produced until Dr. Baréty breathed upon the free hand of the neutral person, when the sensitive immediately exhibited re-action. There was the same result when two neutral persons, each holding a hand of the other, were interposed.

There exists, he says, in the neuric rays from the lungs, a property capable of exciting effects differing from those obtained from rays emitted by the eyes or fingers. This he has proved by the rays from his lungs bringing on re-action when directed upon the sensitive through a closed door, a wall of brick, a wall of stone, a block of glass, &c.; they have acted similarly when reflected in the same manner as luminous rays, from a mirror. Magnetisers, he says, waken their subjects by blowing in their faces or eyes, and Dr. Baréty says that he does the same; but such neuric properties of the breath as he particularises have never, he says, been established until now.

Dr. Baréty says that the intensity of the neuric rays can be augmented by adding to the number of radiating fingers or eyes. He has ascertained this by many experiments, some of which he relates, and he infers that neuric batteries might be formed, analogous to electric batteries, of a variable number of elements.

The intensity of the radiating neuric force remaining the same in a given operator, its effects upon the sensitive subject will vary in degree according to the sensitive's impressibility.

The intensity of the neuric rays is also affected by the distance of subject from operator. In the subject who has principally served in Dr. Baréty's experiments, re-actions could be excited in the open air of a garden in two or three seconds, at a distance of four paces.

A similar observation applies to their velocity of motion. He caused a third person, neutral as to neuric force, who could excite no neuric phenomena, to place the end of a piece of twine, twenty yards long, in the sensitive's hand, which Dr. Baréty had previously breathed upon, himself to go the length of the twine, keeping hold of it. No effect upon the sensitive was produced. But upon Dr. Baréty breathing upon the neutral's free hand, he observed, watch in hand, that an effect was produced in thirty seconds. Repeating this experiment he found that he could even bring on the somnambule sleep. This experiment was varied with greater lengths of twine, and it was found that the neuric force, in the open air, passed along the twine, sometimes, at the rate of twenty-five yards in twenty seconds. The force passes well also along wands of all kinds, vegetable stems and branches; holding any of these at one end the force travels to the other; if held in the middle it travels to both ends.

CAN DECEASED FRIENDS VISIT US?

Swedenborgian (or New Church) periodicals are not, as a rule, very generous in their treatment of Spiritualism and Spiritualists; and it is therefore all the more pleasant to us to be able to give to the New Jerusalem Messenger, of New York, the credit of publishing the following letter:—

"EDITOR OF THE MESSENGER:—In your issue of October 11th, J. H. asks, 'Do recently deceased friends visit us?' He requires the answer to be given in the letter of Swedenborg's writings, for he warns us that he 'wants no man's inferences.' But Swedenborg's writings consist largely of statements of general principles and their analysis. The way being indicated, deductions are generally left to the reader. Legitimate inferences are therefore a necessary part of the study of his writings.

"The Lord's teachings are all enunciations of general principles illustrated by parables. He taught His disciples in parables, 'but without a parable spake He not unto them.' Here, too, is exercise for the mind, for the spiritual man, thought, deduction, application. Inference is a necessity of the case. Swedenborg lays down the principle, repeated often and again, that in the spiritual world sameness or similarity of state is the equivalent of presence or proximity in space. Guided by this rule, we can understand the transfiguration of Christ before, and His re-appearance to His disciples for a period of forty days following, His crucifixion. At the Ascension He simply passed from the spiritual sphere into the divine, which His disciples had no power, because they had no faculties, to discern. Thereafter He came to them, as He promised and as He also comes to us, by His Spirit, and by a more interior way.

"One of a family, linked together by strong ties of affection, dies. It is not a violent presumption that the state of all remains substantially the same, for an indefinite period after, as before, the event. The longing for communication is natural, indeed irresistible, and is presumptively mutual. Now no human mind ever yet comprehended death in the sense of destruction. It does comprehend life, growth, development, continued existence, but death, annihilation, nothingness never. The mind has no power to grasp the thought, and shrinks back from it in horror. Therefore to the mind the propositions of creating something out of nothing, or of something being reduced to nothing, are alike unintelligible. Faith in life after death has its basis, and inheres in the constitution of the mind itself. Therefore at death the wonder to the mind is not that the departed spirit does in some way signify its presence, but that it does not do so more sensibly. This, however, is natural to our material modes of thought.

"Swedenborg's rule is proved by facts of common experience, properly interpreted; or the testimony of multitudes of people, otherwise credible, must be set aside. What are called 'testimonies' at 'experience meetings,' or indeed any religious assembly where personal experiences are related, are in point. Their universal tenor is to the effect that in some mysterious way the soul becomes conscious of being uplifted, a burden removed, a joyous consciousness communicated. This is called 'getting religion.' It is possibly an influx from a strong, congenial, spiritual sphere.

"The Spiritualists offer a great variety of evidence of spirit communication and physical demonstration of their presence. It will not be forgotten that the Lord met the requirements of 'doubting Thomas,' and satisfied even him of His identity by a physical manifestation. Now, whatever may be thought of the conclusions reached by all these people, there can be no doubt as to the absolute sincerity of their belief in the reality of the manifestation experienced or witnessed by them. Would not a broader view of the whole question find they are both right as to the manifestation? Are not both illustrations of Swedenborg's rule, differing only in quality or degree?

"I believe there are experiences in the lives of most people, not often related, but such as to convince them that departed friends have been with them. What may be called the common, almost universal, expectancy of such things is proof akin to that which hunger furnishes of the existence of food; as the fins of a fish, the feathers of a fowl, prove that there are elements proper for their employment—the one to float, the other to fly.

"We were a family of four. Our little boy died. It would be impossible to convince us that he has not been with us very often, but once certainly. The proof is in the nature of the holes in the hands of the Saviour, which satisfied even Thomas."

PROPOSED CONCERT AND BALL.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The proposed concert and ball will take place on the 31st inst., at Claremont Hall, as before. The tickets will be 1s. 6d. single; 2s. 6d. double. There have been numerous inquiries respecting the ball, and there is every reason to believe it will be a very enjoyable one. The proceeds will be devoted to the aid of "LIGHT"; so the support of your readers will be duly appreciated. Next week the arrangements will be more complete and will be advertised.—I remain, yours faithfully,

THE LATE MRS. S. C. HALL.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—As one who enjoyed the privilege of Mrs. S. C. Hall's friendship for many years before she became what is termed "a Spiritualist," allow me to correct an error in Mr. Tupper's statement published in "LIGHT" of to-day. Mrs. S. C. Hall was always a believer in the truths of Revealed Religion, lamenting, with pity and Christian charity, the doubts and difficulties she herself had never known, whenever she encountered them in others. In those days—I am speaking of nearly forty years ago—I never conversed with her husband on the subject of religion as I often did with her, but, as an opinion, I must be permitted to say that I do not believe he was ever a materialist. I know that he is now a Christian Spiritualist.

Trusting that you will find space for this brief vindication of the memory of a dear friend, I am, Sir, yours obediently,
CAMILLA CROSLAND.

THE FESTIVE SEASON AT BELPER.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—As I see a great many accounts of what good church members have done for the poor at the festive season of Christmas, and I know the list of benefactions ought to be, and would be, swelled very considerably, if our Spiritualist friends were as prompt to report each other's doings as church organisations are, permit me to offer, through your columns, a record which ought to be considered as equally just and appropriate in point of time and place.

On Saturday, December 30th, a party of some 150 aged poor widows were entertained at Mr. W. P. Adhead's Hall, at Belper, with a good and bountiful tea, after which they were each presented with a loaf of bread and a piece of the seed cake not consumed at the meal. The expenses were all borne by the Brothers Adhead, Mr. Smedley, and a very few heretics of the Spiritualist persuasion. I had heard of the intention to get up such a meeting, and offered to be the first subscriber to the expenses. When I arrived at Belper on Saturday afternoon I found my subscription had been paid. I was politely requested to keep my money in my pocket, and to contribute instead what some of our friends contemptuously designate as "talk." This I did, and rejoiced to see the aged, worn faces of the assembled crowd, looking out pitifully from shabby old bonnets, accompanied by patched and threadbare garments, brightening up under said "talk" into smiles and tears, and finally, joining their poor withered hands, and old crutches, into a grand cheer of genuine happiness, as I concluded this same "talk." The scene altogether resembled a gleam of sunshine on a dark and clouded path, and was one which I would not have missed for the sake of avoiding all the bitter sneers launched against "professional talkers." Meantime, I found that good Mrs. Smedley, sweet Louie Adhead, Mrs. Whelan, Mrs. Hitchcock, and a number of other dear loving women, girls, and "boys," especially those of a larger growth, had been busy all day cutting bread and butter, getting planks for tables, and wearing themselves out generally to make the meeting very pleasant. With aprons on, or coat-sleeves tucked up, these un-Christian Spiritualists waited on their poor guests, and when they had cleared away—working like Trojans to do so—they sang them songs, made them speeches, and infused an element of joy and gladness over their poor downcast hearts, which will certainly last them till next year.

I heard that Mr. Wm. Adhead intended to regale some hundreds of poor street children with soup, and loaves to carry away, on New Year's Day. At night I listened to the beautiful bells of Belper "ring out the old, ring in the new," and I fancied their sweet liquid tones rang out to every kind hand there, "God bless you, God bless you!" I may have been mistaken. Perhaps they said to every hand that withheld its blessing from the poor, "Go and do likewise." I know not, but I am quite sure the joy bells of the better and brighter world rang out that blessing, and its echoes will not cease until they are clearly heard in each one's "welcome home!" On Sunday—the true New Year's Eve—my lectures were preceded by naming two precious little ones—consecrating them on earth and in Heaven by mortal and spiritual names, and heralding them into the glorious faith which teaches "the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, the immortality of the soul, personal responsibility, and eternal progression."

Hoping to live in that faith here and hereafter, I am, Mr. Editor, yours for the truth,

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—Mr. T. P. Barkas lectured to the friends at Weirs Court, on Sunday, December 31st., upon "Evidences of Design in Nature." The discourse was a remarkable exposition of those advanced principles concerning the problems of life and nature which are being discussed by the thinkers of the time. On Sunday last, on account of the friends being disappointed by the non-arrival of the expected speaker, an experience meeting was held, at which several persons gave interesting narratives of their views and experiences in connection with the movement.

GATESHEAD.—Our Gateshead friends are looking pretty healthy at present. The activity of their leading officials, and the energy of their young men, promise to make the society of some worth before many years are over. On the last Sunday of the Old Year, their president, Mr. H. Burton, gave to a goodly audience an excellent and appropriate address upon the season of the year, and the lessons to be learned from the retrospect and prospect presented on such an occasion for consideration. On the Tuesday evening following, a concert of a very successful character was held, the proceeds being devoted to the furnishing fund, which as yet is not quite free from debt. We are glad to say the hall was comfortably filled with an appreciative audience, who enjoyed very much the many excellent songs rendered by the vocalists, who gave their services on the occasion. Mr. R. Thompson presided at the pianoforte, opening with an admirable selection, which was highly appreciated. Mr. R. W. Thompson sang "The Village Blacksmith," and other songs, with great effect; Mr. C. Martin gave an admirable selection from "Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures"; Mr. F. Sheppard rendered a popular comic song with surprising effect. His sisters, the Misses Sheppard, sang with pleasing effect, the elder singing the "River Idle," with great sweetness, and the younger, "The Three Old Maids of Lea"; the Misses Martin performed a pianoforte duet with considerable ability, and the elder one favoured us in a pleasing manner with "In the Gloaming." Master Martin gave the "Darkies' Jubilee" very cleverly, and Mr. Martin sang a broad Tyneside ditty, "The Cachuca," in a fashion that convulsed the audience. Mr. H. Burton officiated as chairman, and did his best to keep the meeting in good spirits. We also had the pleasure of the presence of Mr. W. H. Lambelle, from South Shields, who made an excellent little speech, in seconding Mr. Dawson's proposition of thanks to the entertainers. About ten p.m., the younger portion of the company cleared the floor, and enjoyed themselves for a couple of hours in dancing. A refreshment stall was provided in the ante-room, by Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Shield. On Sunday last Mr. Henry Lacroix occupied the platform with his experiences of the movement in America and Europe. Afterwards he called several persons from the audience, and instructed them in the best methods they could employ to develop their mediumship as far as he could see and understand their speciality in that regard. Next Sunday Mr. Ashton, of Byker, will lecture.

NORTH SHIELDS.—Substantial progress is being made by our good friends at this place, their Sunday evening gatherings being generally larger. On Sunday evening, December 24th, the President of the Gateshead Society gave an admirable lecture on "The Immortality of Man." During the week they had a social gathering of a pleasant and agreeable description, and on the Sunday following an excellent New Year's address from Mr. Thomas Dawson, of Gateshead.

NORTHUMBRIA.

GLASGOW.

The annual meeting of the Glasgow Association of Spiritualists was held in the Hall, 164, Trongate, on Sunday last, the 7th inst. Mr. Findlay, in the absence of the President, occupied the chair. The treasurer's report shewed a satisfactory balance on hand. The following were elected office bearers for the current year:—Mr. James Walker, President; Mr. James McDowall, Vice-President; Mr. James Robertson, Hon. Sec.; Mr. Findlay, Treasurer. Committee: Messrs. Griffin, Broadly, Barker, and McKenzie.

TORQUAY.

We quote the following from the Devon County Standard:—"When associations composed of unprejudiced and learned men are formed in the country for the purpose of investigating Spiritualism, and when such associations admit that there are matters connected with Spiritualism which are not to be explained away by attributing them to trickery and 'hanky-panky,' it certainly looks as though Spiritualism were not altogether a gigantic humbug. In Exeter Spiritualism is being carefully and thoughtfully investigated by a great many intellectual people. Plymouth also has its numerous believers in spiritualistic manifestations; Dartmouth is the home of more than one Spiritualist; and Torquay possesses a 'medium' or two. We do not know whether any of our readers would care to investigate for themselves these alleged means of communication between the present and the unseen world, but should they feel inclined to do so we might be able to indicate the course to be adopted by them in order to attain this object."

THE CONDUCT OF PUBLIC PHYSICAL SEANCES.

Circular issued by the Central Association of Spiritualists, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

Few Spiritualists can have failed to note, with regret, the deterioration which has of late years taken place in the conditions under which physical phenomena have been sought in public séances.

These conditions—so favourable to fraud on the part of dishonest mediums, and so calculated to excite suspicion in the minds of observers—have led to the most disastrous results. We are not speaking without full warrant when we say that there is hardly a public medium for physical manifestations in this country against whom, at one time or other, charges of imposture have not been brought. We fear that in some cases no reasonable doubt can be entertained that fraud of the grossest kind was really perpetrated; while in other cases there is reason to believe that—whatever may have been the appearance to inexperienced spectators—there was no conscious deception on the part of the medium.

But in either case the name of Spiritualism has been brought into discredit, and we are forcibly driven to the conclusion that other methods of procedure must be amended. We must demonstrate our abhorrence of imposture by disavowing and discouraging all conditions which do not plainly shut out even the suspicion of its possibility.

Obviously these remarks can have little reference to family circles, which are naturally held sacred by those who regard them as affording opportunities for veritable "communion with the dead." But it is open to grave question whether—even in the case of family circles—inquirers should ever be permitted to make their first acquaintance with Spiritual phenomena by introduction to séances held for physical manifestations in the dark, or where a cabinet is used for the seclusion of the medium.

We are chiefly concerned, however, with what are known as public or promiscuous séances for physical manifestations. These have been of late years generally marked by the following characteristics:—(1) The séance has been conducted in imperfect light, or in total darkness. (2) The medium has been isolated from the circle, by being placed either in a cabinet or behind a curtain. (3) The sitters have been, either wholly or in part, unacquainted with the subject and with each other. (4) There has not infrequently been a manifest want of harmony, consequent upon differences of opinion as to the nature and value of the tests employed.

These conditions, usually found in combination, effectually preclude careful and dispassionate investigation; open wide an avenue to fraud; suggest suspicion of its presence even where it does not exist; and in many cases, we fear, expose the medium to very injurious influences.

Such conditions should be allowed to prevail no longer. "Mixed" circles should be as little mixed as possible—mere wonder-seekers, and men whose moral atmosphere is known to be impure, being carefully excluded. Above all, darkness should give way to light. In the early days of Spiritualism public dark circles were the exception, and there is no need for them now. There is abundant evidence that, with mediums of the present day, satisfactory phenomena, including even "form" manifestations, can be obtained without isolation—the medium, where a cabinet is used, being placed near, but outside of it, and in full view of the sitters. But even if this were not so, it is neither wise nor honourable to expose mediums to the risks which have been shown to attend séances held under the conditions that have of late been prevalent; and it were far better that we should have no public manifestations of physical phenomena than that they should be sought under circumstances which, to say the least, inevitably conduce to suspicion.

In view of all these considerations, believing that fraud is not of the essence of this confessedly obscure subject, but rather an accident dependent on faulty conditions of research; feeling that Spiritualists have the remedy for the evil in their own hands, and that without its conscientious application they cannot hope to maintain a fair reputation before the world; we earnestly recommend—That in all public circles held for physical phenomena, the medium be so placed, and in such light, as to be continuously under observation by each member of the circle.

8. On such cases I am not competent to offer an opinion: nor should I value any opinion that did not proceed from a scientific expert who was acquainted familiarly with the special case on which he was asked to pronounce judgment. For here we approach a very definite source of error. Cancer is a perfectly defined disease, and any practised eye can tell with surety under the microscope whether a particular formation is cancerous or not. But uneducated eyes cannot, and a lay opinion is valueless. Now medical science pronounces the true cancer, when in an active state, to be, to all intents and purposes, incurable. If, therefore, a well-defined case of cancer, vouched for as such by competent opinion, were really cured psychopathically, that would be a tremendous fact. But observe, it must be clear that the growth is really cancerous, and nothing but an expert opinion on the formation of the cells which compose it can determine that point.

9. So that when it is said that cancers have been cured, the first question is, Were they cancers at all? This applies, in a degree, to all diseases; but the cancer is a crucial case. Before I can say that such and such a disease is cured, I must be able to say that it existed. And more, I must also be able to say that the means used effected the cure; that is, that the ordinary restorative processes of nature, so beneficent in their operation when left to themselves, did not effect by their action what the Psychopath claims as his work. I must know both whether the alleged disease existed, and secondly, whether the alleged treatment cured it; and thirdly, whether the patient might not have conceivably got well from other causes.

10. These are obvious sources of error which must be eliminated before any trustworthy opinion can be given on a particular case. And even when these points are cleared up, we ought to know, further, whether any previous treatment has been adopted; and if so, when, and under what circumstances; with what results, if any; and how long it has been abandoned. For it is clear that A's treatment may really produce the cure that B claims as his own, or that A and B combined may have nothing to do with what is a mere restorative effort of nature. It is considerations such as these that make it hard to get at the exact truth in any given case of alleged healing. And the difficulty is enormously increased by the atmosphere of emotional enthusiasm by which such cases are surrounded. It is held that careful investigation implies doubt, and want of faith is sin.

11. There is, however, no reasonable doubt that the gift of healing or alleviating disease, and so of lightening the terrible load of human suffering, is a real fact. Its results cannot but be beneficent. Though I am scientifically curious as to the means, and a little disposed to be sceptical about some cases, I am not the less thankful for the results that are produced, whether by imagination or will, mesmeric or magnetic power, or by spiritual agency in any form. That a proportion of cases are real cures none can doubt, though there may be various opinions as to the methods. All, however, is not due to mere imagination. That there is a real and absolute virtue communicated to a mesmerised article is proved by such cases as that recorded by Mr. Atkinson,* when a mesmerised glove that had been used by an ailing patient conveyed a distinct effect to Mr. Atkinson. He "had to remove the unhealthy influence or contagion" before it could be charged afresh with healing power. Moreover, a glove purposely sent unmesmerised was invariably detected. There is, therefore, evidence that both curative and vitiated magnetism can be traced by their effects; and Mr. Atkinson is entitled to say that his processes produced the effects recorded, and that such effects were not due to other causes, or to mere natural effort.

12. Serjeant Cox, whose mind was fertile in theories, considered that the cure is effected by directing the attention of the patient to the ailing part.† Passes, when used, serve, in his opinion, to do this, and so increase the flow of nerve-force or vital-force, or whatever it be called, to the affected part. He would have maintained (I suppose) that the anointing with oil, and concentrated attention in prayer, had the same effect. As a result of this stimulated flow of vital-force, the impaired action of the functions is roused to renewed activity. The restorative processes of nature are set in action, and thus he would account, inter alia, for the cure of Miss Martineau's malignant ulcer. Whatever grain of truth there may be in this, like many of the late Serjeant's all-round speculative theories, it does not cover the facts.

13. I have hitherto considered almost exclusively such cases as can be referred to the action of the spirit of man or to natural causes. There are, however, many recorded cases which range themselves under a different category, and seem to postulate the action of a governing and controlling spirit from without. Such is that well-authenticated case of the cure of Mrs. Skelton.‡ There the spirit that habitually controls a medium wrought what certainly is a remarkable cure. Many such cases are on record. Others there are, too, which (like the Bethshan cases) assume a slightly different, and more distinctly religious, complexion. Such are those of which Mrs. Oliphant gives a specimen in her Life of Edward Irving.§ The "Arise, and stand upright!" of the young mechanic, with its instantaneous effect, had within it a witness to the action of a power not his own. In Biblical phraseology, "He was filled with the Holy Ghost." Still more extraordinary and impressive was the cure of Miss Fancourt.¶ Such are many of the cures recorded of Dr. Newton. "The Modern Bethesda" is full of cases which no deduction for possible exaggeration can entirely get rid of, and which are either true in substance, or wicked and detestable falsehoods.

14. Here, again, we come upon a factor, the power of faith, to which we find it hard to assign an exact value. In all cases such as those which we are now considering it seems that faith is a necessary prerequisite, as it was in Christ's miracles of mercy. "O, woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt." "He did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief." What is this mysterious quality, and how does it operate? The answer to these questions is, so far as I am concerned, one of "the secret things that belong unto the Lord our God"; but I cannot deny the incalculable potency of what I can no more understand than a child can fathom the action of any of the forces of nature. I only know that in some cases results seem to be attained by its power that, in my present state of ignorance, appear miraculous, but which are not less real because I am unable to explain them. It seems to me, however, dimly probable that there is a connection traceable between the power of faith and this same imagination that is so potent. The act of faith may, and possibly does, exalt and stimulate the imagination and set its power in action.

15. I do not know to which of the many committees of the Society for Psychical Research it would naturally fall to investigate this interesting subject. It may be that before these lines see the light, Bethshan will have been visited by some of its indefatigable members. But whether there or elsewhere, that which may rightly claim to be a purely beneficent work—possibly the only unmixed good that Spiritualism can boast of—should have its merited attention. And, unless I am very wrong, the present state of medical science is more favourable to such an investigation than at any previous time with which I am acquainted. For doctors are less wedded to pill and potion; they drench us less with nauseous drugs; and they are disposed—only disposed, or perhaps, not so entirely indisposed—to give nature a chance, and to rely on her recuperative processes, while they direct a greater measure of attention to hygienic conditions of health. For all which one desires to be duly thankful, and to ask now that Psychopathy may have a chance.

SPIRITUALISM AT HOME.

Mr. Morell Theobald has favoured us with a copy of a paper read by him, on the 11th inst., before the Literary Society, at the Rev. Morlais Jones' church, at Lewisham. We should have liked to publish the paper in extenso, but our space enables us to give only an abridged report, which is valuable, however, as containing interesting facts, such as are being sought for still by many outside the movement; and, coming as they do from a man of experience and calm judgment and veracity, we commend them to the consideration of our readers.

"Twenty years ago," said Mr. Theobald, "my stepmother and I put our hands upon a small three-legged table, standing in the middle of the room. After a few minutes, the table began to oscillate. Subsequently it moved along the room to the door, and knocked repeatedly and violently against it, when somebody present opened it. The table then moved across the hall to the foot of the stairs like a thing of life: next by a circular movement, which we had to follow, it ascended stair after stair until it reached the top flight. With our fingers still lightly on the top, it descended in a similar manner, until it regained its first resting-place, in our dining-room. There was what we recognised as a new force; but that was all. Subsequent experiments with the table evoked intelligence, so that by oscillation or rapping we could, by repeating the alphabet, get letters indicated which when written down formed a continuous sentence, frequently involving no little difficulty to us in separating into words. I will now skip over some years, during which time, having satisfied myself of the reality of the phenomena, and getting as yet very little else after the first wonderment, I allowed the matter to sleep."

Mr. Theobald goes on to relate how, passing through much sorrow, and losing three children, one after the other, the spiritual rapport was again established, as is so frequently the case when the need appears sorest. But we will give his own words.

"And as we sat lonely and watched, there came a sound we had well-nigh forgotten: it was only like a bodkin tapping on the table! We recognised the old spirit-raps, and had patience with them until they grew in number and variety, and until each little one had his own distinctive rap. As we chatted at meals their raps chimed in affirmatively or negatively to what we said.

"On my way home one evening I had been reading Dr. Carpenter's theory of explanation, and as I sat down to the tea table, I told my wife and children what the doctor's 'dominant ideas' were. We were then almost startled by our unseen group joining in the conversation by raps. Taking up the cue, I said to the invisible band, 'You seem interested, but can you prove Dr. Carpenter to be wrong?' Three distinct raps gave their affirmative reply. I now suggested that we should all lean heavily upon the table, which we did from all sides, and one of the boys sat upon it! when lo, as easily as possible, the table was lifted off the ground to about the height of nine inches, first on one side and then on the other, and so kept in position (this heavy dining-table) for some minutes. Our conversation continued then for some time intelligently, by means of raps.

"About this time it was no unusual thing when I stood up to carve to have the table suddenly moved completely away from my reach, and on my asking it to come back for it to do so, and then pin me tightly to the wall. Vulgar? very! but it was an immense amusement to our children as they were told that our little group used our dining-room as their play room! All these phases of the phenomena, you will remember, mixed in, naturally and unsought, with daily life! On another occasion the locks of the dining-table leaf were unfastened by invisible hands, and the leaf lifted up and down continuously until my wife put her hand upon the top of the lively leaf, when it was gently lifted up high under her hands and tilted on to the floor, and so left upright by the side of the table—all this in full light and presence of all."

Mr. Theobald speaks then of other forms of mediumship and of the teachings of Spiritualism which he received through them. The phenomenon of direct vis communication he thus refers to:—

"It was while sitting with the family around the table and with Mr. and Mrs. Everitt we had our first communion by means of the direct spirit voice. We had commenced the sitting by reading and prayer, when we put out the light and sang in darkness. While singing the room was suffused (I am not exaggerating) with most delicious perfumes,—different kinds succeeding one another. The interesting part to us was that one of my children could then see the spirit forms and what they were doing. He said, 'Pa! there's a spirit with different coloured waters—Oh! she is throwing some on us; now another colour,' and so on; and as he spoke of different colours came different scents. These scents were perceptible on articles in the room on the following day. Soon after came star-like lights, floating over the table. These could reply to questions as we put them, by opening and shutting or darting about.

"Having thus become comfortable (if I may so speak) in the dark we heard a tremulous indescribable approach. It ceased by the head of the table, took up a small tube, as we ascertained by being touched by it each in turn, and then spoke. With this began my first acquaintance with the spirit of John Watt, engineer formerly, and a most intelligent spirit now. With him I have had, not two or three, but scores of conversations, some in the presence of scientific men whose names you would know. On this occasion I was too surprised to say much. I asked John Watt how he manufactured the voice out of nothing (for to me it was a voice out of darkness) and received his laughing reply! But still I was silently puzzling it out, and he saw it though I said not a word to any one; for on leaving he threw down the tube in front of me, and when we lit up the lamp I found also, just before me on the table, a piece of direct writing replying to my silent queries."

Mr. Theobald then gives one or two other conversations which took place in the presence of the Everitts. On one occasion it was interesting from little voices of the children, one after another, speaking, which they did by John Watt's help. After this sitting he looked as usual on the previously marked paper for writing, but ascertained that there was none, put the paper in the speaking tube, turned out the lights, and left the dining room for the drawing-room close by. Soon the raps came on the drawing-room table, while the friends were sitting about "or playing on all fours with baby on the hearth rug." By the raps they were told that the invisibles had put some direct writing in the other room. On going they found the piece of paper as they had left it in the tube, but with this message now on it: "Unity, peace, love, and harmony dwell here. We, a loving band, surround you. May the peace of God the All-Father be with you evermore." This they were told was written by their spirit friends after the company had all left the room, and there was no other explanation of which they could conceive.

Mr. Theobald concluded a highly interesting paper by claiming (1) that a new force had been found to exist, which we call psychic; (2) that this force was governed by intelligence which was not that of the persons present in the flesh, but of the spirits of those who were once living in our midst; and that (3) of this identity proofs are constantly forthcoming.

The discussion which followed was begun by Mr. Ames, who said he lost no opportunity of opposing Spiritualism wherever it was brought forward, and he read from copious notes previously prepared, which, of course, failed to touch the facts adduced. The next speaker's remarks afforded a specimen of the materialistic sneering with which the so-called religious people receive any exposition on this subject, but with all his sneers against the material nature of the phenomena and their uselessness, he in the same breath asked for others equally material and quite as foolish. Several speakers, however, were fairer in their criticism, and shewed a docile interest. The only reply really given to the unanswerable facts adduced by Mr. Theobald, put into plain English, would be "You are either a fool or unworthy of credit." This is the usual one, now that "the devil" has ceased to be relied upon: but it will "have its day and cease to be." Facts carefully recorded are still wanted, and these can be had in any number. Get facts admitted, and the eni bono question will take care of itself.

STRAY THOUGHTS ON CURRENT TOPICS.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Let me congratulate you on having given to your readers in the first issue of "LIGHT" in the year 1883 such excellent subject matter. I sincerely hope that the year so auspiciously begun will gain brightness with age, and I pray that before it is numbered with the past we, the Spiritualists of the land, may be honoured for our faith, and admired for our consistency and courage. I am strongly of opinion that the past has been a time of sifting, and trial of strengths and virtues, and though many have been called, but few indeed are chosen.

"Our Better Moments," by Herbert Edward Wallace, Esq., is an excellent little poem, and indicates that genius (or susceptibility to angelic teaching) is a family gift. The articles on "Theosophic Teachings," "Materialisations," and "Prophetic Dreams," are remarkable, and well worth perusing, but Mr. Martin F. Tupper's "Spiritualistic Reminiscences" are, in my opinion, by far the most interesting records of preternatural phenomena that have appeared in your pages for many a day. Then, too, the charming manner of your correspondent pleases the mind, and lulls to rest the critical and combative faculties; and though we may draw conclusions entirely opposite to those suggested by Mr. Tupper, we feel more inclined to offer other and convincing proofs of spirit-presence than to abuse him for want of spiritual discernment.

Last evening, just before "LIGHT" was placed in my hands, I was scanning the pages of one of my favourite authors, and had made a marginal note against this observation of Cicero's:—"The force of reason in disputation is to be sought after rather than authority; since the authority of the teacher is often a disadvantage to those who are willing to learn; as they refuse to use their own judgment, and rely implicitly on him whom they make choice of for a preceptor."

Having read the interesting narrative of Mr. Tupper, and reflected a few moments on the effect of such wonderful experiences on his mind, I once more turned to Cicero, and was struck with the appropriateness of the remark which I have just quoted to Mr. Tupper's case. And perhaps I may be allowed to observe that thousands of Materialists and religionists are in exactly the frame of mind Mr. Tupper appears to be in. They are over-awed by authority. The Materialists, misinterpreting the teachings of Tyndall, say there is no God, nor future life. The religionists, misinterpreting Divine or angelic teachings, say that spiritualistic phenomena are only too true, but of the devil, devilish. Both Sadducee and Pharisee are under the blighting influence of authority; "they refuse to use their own judgment," and decline to accept the conclusions which reason imperatively demands should be made. I have, during the last six years, personally observed this infirmity of mind in scores of well-meaning intelligent men and women, and have much deplored it. I suppose people cannot well help themselves. No doubt it is a fault of organisation, an excess of caution or timidity, which disqualifies its subject from investigating facts in nature which demand for their recognition and appreciation more than ordinary courage, patience, and self-sacrifice. And at this moment there comes to my mind an observation of Huxley's, in his lecture on William Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood; an observation for which I admire the man, and from my heart wish him the enlightenment which is ours. After speaking with pride of the heroes of the Commonwealth, and the statesmen and poets of Elizabeth's age, Elliott, Pym, Hampden, Milton, Burleigh, Strafford, Cromwell, Spencer, Shakespeare, and others, he adds, "I am of opinion that the memory of the great men of a nation is one of its most precious possessions." Yes! but how much more ennobling is the belief that we are daily subject to the influence of the personal presence of these men! Is it not ten thousand times more a cause for rejoicing that we have by our sides in our struggle against ignorance and prejudice the spirits of these great men, now made perfect by years of spiritual enlightenment? Revere their memory if you will, but give me the force and wisdom which springs from the interblending of kindred mentalities. And, continues Professor Huxley: "If William Harvey had been a dishonest man—I mean in the high sense of the word, a man who failed in the ideal of honesty—he would have believed what it was easiest to believe—that which he received on the authority of his predecessors. He would not have felt that his highest duty was to know, of his own knowledge, that that which he said he believed was true, and we should never have had those investigations, pursued through good report and evil report, which ended in discoveries so fraught with magnificent results for science and for man." What Spiritualist cannot see that if a man like Huxley could be brought to take an interest in our movement he would become as enthusiastic a disciple as he is a profound scientist? He evidently possesses a heart as well as a head, and this is sadly wanted in an age of "shells"! Surely, sir, it is as great a work to bring immortality to light, to demonstrate by scientific methods the deathlessness of man, as it was to prove the circulation of the blood? And those who have toiled against oppressors, and resisted authority with as unflinching a determination as was displayed by Harvey himself, are deserving of some consideration at the hands of men like Huxley and Tyndall. Depend upon it, Spiritualists who have worked in this cause in singleness of heart and purity of aim will, before many years have passed, receive the grateful appreciation of their repentant countrymen.

I wonder if it ever occurred to Professor Huxley to give serious attention to the works of his greater countryman, Sir Humphrey Davy? If so, it would be interesting to discover what are his opinions on the views propounded in "The Proteus." Sir Humphrey is singularly in accord with mesmeric knowledge on the physiological aspect of Spiritualism.

Some time ago, when discussing the phenomena of Spiritualism with a medical gentleman, he declared his inability to comprehend how knocks were produced and articles of furniture moved without contact with human hands. Wishing to know what I might have to contend with, I asked, "Do you believe that the spirit of man (what we Spiritualists call the man himself) survives the shock of death?" "Certainly I do," was the reply. "Then you must be a spiritual being now residing in a tabernacle of flesh!" "Granted," was the reply. "What is your weight, doctor?" "About ten stone." Then I put this question, which, so far as I have been able to discover, is a question that cannot be answered outside of spiritual science—that is, outside of the knowledge we obtain within the borders of modern Spiritualism—"If, doctor, you are an ethereal being now, animating, for the time being, a material body weighing about one hundred and forty pounds, how can you move this weight (the weight of your own body) any easier than the spirit-body of say, Dr. William Harvey, could move a table weighing one hundred and forty pounds?" After a moment's reflection he made this reply: "Do you know I never looked upon the subject in this light before! I cannot answer you!"

Now, though physiologists, generally, are ignorant on this point, there are a few who, having made it a study, are prepared with something like a satisfactory answer to the question, How do we move ourselves? And the reply to this, in my belief, explains the modus operandi of most of the spiritual phenomena we are familiar with.

Sir Humphrey Davy writes as follows:—"The volumes of elastic fluid inspired and expired, making allowance for change of temperature, are the same, and if ponderable agents only were to be regarded, it would appear as if the only use of respiration were to free the blood from a certain quantity of carbonaceous matter. But it is probable this is only a secondary object, and that the change produced by respiration upon the blood is of a much more important kind. Oxygen in its elastic state has properties which are very characteristic; it gives out light by compression, which is not certainly known to be the case with any other elastic fluid, except those with which oxygen has entered without undergoing combustion; and from the fire it produces in certain processes, and from the manner in which it is separated by positive electricity in the gaseous state from its combinations, it is not easy to avoid the supposition that it contains, besides its ponderable elements, some very subtle matter, which is capable of assuming the form of heat and light. . . . I know there have been distinguished physiologists who have imagined that, by organisation, powers not naturally possessed by matter were developed, and that sensibility was a property belonging to some unknown combination of unknown ethereal elements. But such notions appear to me unphilosophical, and the mere substitution of unknown words for unknown things. I can never believe that any division, or refinement, or subtilisation, or juxtaposition, or arrangement of the particles of matter can give them sensibility, or that intelligence can result from combinations of insensate brute atoms. I can as easily imagine that the planets are moving by their own will or design, or that a cannon-ball is reasoning in making its parabolic curve."

Now what if we accept this physiological view as a correct one. Would it not explain much of the phenomena we are acquainted with? Electricity can be nothing but "subtle matter;" and no matter how it is produced, mesmeric science has assured us that the natural action of the human body (its own endowed methods of casting off effete material and assimilating to itself what is necessary to its preservation) does elaborate a fluid whereby the indwelling spirit, by means of nerves, muscles, and bones, controls the body physical. And whilst with most of us sufficient vital fluid is elaborated to ensure perfect health, it may be that some are capable of elaborating more than enough. If so, what is to prevent spirits, angels, and gods, utilising the fluid for various phases of mediumship? Pure minds and pure living connect us to gods; foul minds and filthy bodies to fiends. Verily! there are more things in Heaven (in spirit-life) than are dreamt of in the philosophy of Mr. Tupper.

If scepticism demand an analogy, I will give the following. By a natural process, not deemed wonderful because ice are familiar with it, ice (a material almost as hard as granite) may be converted into invisible steam, and from invisible steam back to ice again. This is transmuting ponderable matter into force, and force into ponderable matter again. Is this not identical with materialisations? The vital fluid is derived from matter, and by a natural process unknown to us, is crystallised, or solidified so as to be visible, as white and solid as a block of ice. And just as by the application of heat to ice we may see the substance disappear from view in the form of vapour, so have thousands of Spiritualists, myself amongst the number, seen a materialised body in a séance-room slowly dissipate like a stream of vapour of water until not a vestige remained to shew where an animated, intelligent human being had recently stood.

Sir, I am afraid I am encroaching on your valuable space. I have just written as thoughts came to me, and find I have not taken the direction originally intended. I wished to give Mr. Tupper some of my own experience in clairvoyance—experience which could leave no doubt as to who or what produces the phenomena called spiritualistic, but I have failed in my endeavour, and apologise for offering so poor an article for publication.

MR. AND MRS. WORTLEY, who have been for many years devoted to the cause of Spiritualism, gave a house-warming and dance at their new residence in Plaistow, on Thursday, the 11th inst. There were present several well-known Spiritualists and an exceedingly pleasant evening was spent.

MRS. HARDINGE BRITTEN IN LONDON.

Reception at St. Andrew's Hall.

On Friday evening, January 12th, the members and friends of the newly-established Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum gave a reception to Mrs. Hardinge Britten, at St. Andrew's Hall, Newman-street, Oxford-street. Mr. Sandys Britton, president of the Lyceum, occupied the chair, and explained the principles on which the Lyceum had been formed, and the purposes which it was intended to accomplish; after which Mr. Thomas Shorter, Sig. Damiani, Mr. J. Freeman, the Rev. Mr. Bengough, Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, and Mr. Richard Wortley, spoke in support of the following resolutions:—

"That this meeting of friends of the cause of Spiritualism rejoices in the opportunity afforded by the visit of Mrs. Hardinge Britten to London, to gratefully acknowledge her continued devotion to the practical work associated therewith, which, in America, England, and elsewhere, owes so much of its success to her commanding eloquence and generally powerful and zealous support; and to express the hope that so valuable a life may long be spared to the world."

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, the general principles and methods of the newly-organised Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum promise, if sustained and developed with energy and prudence, to promote alike the diffusion of sound views upon the duties of the life of this world, and the general recognition of the spiritual truth that the strictest regard for those duties is the fittest preparation for the next stage of existence; and we congratulate the association upon having secured the valuable inspirational support of Mr. J. J. Morse as lecturer."

"That, whether the human agency for the promulgation of the truths and teachings of Spiritualism be sought in the individual, in the family, or in societies—by trance, or other mental influences, or by any form of physical manifestation—it is incumbent upon us all, at all times, humbly and gratefully to acknowledge the essential value and importance of the intervention and co-operation of the world of spirits, in every effort to further human progress."

Mrs. Hardinge Britten and Mr. J. J. Morse responded to the resolutions; the addresses being followed by vocal and instrumental music contributed by the Misses Withall, Miss Katherine Poyntz, Mrs. Percy Britton, Mrs. Williams, Miss Heath, Mr. E. A. Tietkens, Mr. C. Alexander, and the Lyceum Choir; and Miss Allan also favoured the company with a recitation.

Sunday Service.

The second of the Sunday evening services inaugurated by the Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum, was held on Sunday evening last in St. Andrew's Hall, Newman-street, Oxford-street. There was, as on the previous occasion, a very large attendance. After the service, an address was delivered by Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten, on the subject, "What do we know concerning the origin and destiny of man?"

Mrs. Hardinge Britten, after a brief introduction on the importance of the topic, said that there are two sources whence knowledge respecting it is sought—religion and science. Religion represents the universe as a piece of mechanism created. God, it is said, created all things very good, but, at the same time, brought into existence a spirit of pure malignity, stronger to tempt and destroy than the All-Father to preserve for good. Hence man fell and involved the entire race in total depravity. Then there came the curse of the Flood, the restitution of the race, the inevitable succession of degradation; then the Divine Incarnation, and the vicarious Atonement—those who accepted being saved, and those who rejected suffering endless perdition. This is what ecclesiasticism says; but ecclesiasticism does not know it. Science has other teachings with regard to man and the planet on which he dwells. The planet is one of a line of fiery worlds, revolving round the central mass. These worlds sprang out of the arms of the sun, and returned to those arms as obedient satellites. We have grown and blossomed in the gardens of infinite light and glory, and we shall march up the steep of time until the matter of which our world is composed decays and dies. All planetary bodies consist of matter vitalised by force. Geology teaches that our earth was once like the flying spectres that flit across the midnight sky; she has become crystallised into an obedient satellite moving round the parent sun; she has become consolidated until her surface, rifted and rent by internal fires, forms vast chasms and abysses whence flames shoot up into the thick murky air, as yet unlighted by sun, or moon, or star. The spirit of the Great Builder brooded upon the face of the fiery sea, and called forth a new element—the flood. In the metamorphic rocks we trace the alternate struggle of those two world-builders—the fire and flood—until a new factor appears, an animated form, a living thing, a spirit of life, a creature that thinks. Even the gelatinous masses that float in the seas are endowed with thought. Every creature that procures its own subsistence, chooses its own locality, repeats its own existence, and provides for it, manifests the first element of thought—and thought is spirit, and spirit is the next world-builder. The sublime trinity upon which suns and systems are founded is matter, force, spirit. We pass onwards to the age of molluscs, and then to the times of monstrous reptiles; nature alternately expressing herself in the infinitely little and the infinitely large. We pass through many chambers, until we come to a sudden break of which we still preserve the mementoes in the carboniferous system. The ancient forests, and all the vast masses of tropical vegetation, were factors in purifying the air; all opening their leafy mouths to drink in the carbonic acid gas that must have filled the air and been fatal to the life of higher existence. Thus the atmosphere was prepared for the sun-beam and the star-beam until higher, and nobler, and fairer forms should come. The vast mass of vegetation is torn by upheavals, and buried in catacombs, but not lost. The creature is yet to come who shall break open those catacombs, trace the mystery of their formation, consume the mineral, and drag it forth into the open air to be converted into mimic suns. Everything is a prophecy. There shall yet be a mind that shall comprehend mathematics, and find it taught by the mathematician ant: geometry, and shall understand it by the geometrical bee; and other sciences that have been in like manner foretold by lower orders of beings. At length man appears, when the earth is ready for him. It is only because he is the last of forms—the microcosm in whom is all force, power, and thought—that there is any real difference between him and the poor mollusc. Gradually he ascends the heights of knowledge, by a process of evolution. We see no schoolmaster, no priest; but there is the eternal germ of intelligence within, and this is gradually unfolded. He cannot soar to the supreme heights where the eagle's wing cleaves the sky; but by the power of his spirit he can build himself a castle of hydrogen and silk, and soar away higher than ever an eagle's wing has gone; he cannot float on the heaving billows of the seas, like the Leviathans of the deep, but by the power of his spirit he can build himself a metal house and sink deeper than ever plummet line sounded, and explore the mystery of the pearl and coral kingdom beneath; he cannot track his way, like the swallow, across the pathless ocean, but he can take the little magnet and make it do the work for him, and reveal to him the mystery of Arctic and Antarctic regions, and put a girdle of knowledge from pole to pole. He can make the sun-beam paint his pictures, and the poor man's cottage may now possess reproductions of the costly works of art which in olden times were beyond his possession. He can gaze upon the starry heavens, and speculate upon their being the homes of the angels of light; but, then, by the aid of his spirit, he constructs a second eye through which he beholds whirlpools and clusters of stars, marvellous constellations with ten thousand worlds unknown to him before. He can turn back the tides and alter the course of rivers. He can avail himself of the noble printing press, and by the power of cheap literature, scatter it broadcast over the world, making humanity one grand bond of brotherhood. All power, all knowledge, is his, but he stands baffled by the mystery of his own soul, the very power that thinks and examines, the mighty masterful spirit that has explored the heavens, sounded the ocean, rolled back the tides, and turned night into day,—the real man. But at length the light seems to go out like a lamp untimely quenched, and the man is "dead." Why does he speak no more? Why does he not awake? What has come to him? He is dead. Is that the last of it? Shall there be no resurrection, no life beyond? Alas! science only answers, "The light has gone out, the fire is quenched, the man is departed, and that is the last of it." But we ask, especially we ask for those whose life has been a burden, those who have toiled like beasts of the field, for those who have groped in darkness, for the crippled and the maimed, the wretched and the forlorn,—we ask for them, is there no better land? not alone for the power and the glory, but for the beauty, the love, and the kindness? It is at this point that the Spiritualist comes bearing the standard of that other and better world. There comes a knocking at our doors, and though it is a tap no louder than the beating of a butterfly's wing, we open, and the immortals come in, and they proclaim that there is no more death. Spiritualists, you know not the great and sublime meaning and purpose of your dispensation. Science and religion are both at fault; they only tell us what they believe, not what they know. All we ask for is proof. Our desire is to continue this chain of knowledge, to pass the last milestone and enter the glorious temple of the science of spirit. We have cried, "Lord, let Thy Kingdom come," and at this point the gates are flung wide open, and we realise that the triumphant march of spiritual existence is continued throughout all eternity. We ask, What is death? Science says it is the quenching of the light, but does not tell us what is the hand that quenches. I ask why has the fire gone out? Why has the heart grown cold? Who has done it? I tell you that force has gone out of the body, and that is death. The spirit has gone out and carried the force with it. The disintegration of death is the withdrawal of that which makes the life; and if I can find the thought clothed upon by the force I account for the real man. Here it is that I find the force knocking on my tables, moving my chairs, projected in viewless waves upon the mesmerised subject while never a mesmeriser is in sight,—all those phenomena which you call derisively dancing tables and vibrating floors. If science sees matter in motion, it is bound to explain it, or it is disgraced, and those who move it shall take their place and prove the teachers of a spiritual science which the materialist cannot comprehend,—a science which tells us what is the destiny of man, which shews us the white feet of the immortals still treading the heights of progress, the dear hands of the beloved beckoning us forward, the same men, the same women, that left us but yesterday, with hearts burning and throbbing with a higher and a more glorious life, all living on, and living for ever! We marvel why this great, starving, seething Babylon does not crowd round the spirit circle and stand waiting at the portals of life and knowledge. But perhaps it is as well. The process of growth is slow. It took the Great Gardener millions of years to make a daisy. When we remember this we bend the knee and cry: "Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven." All is well with the Great Spirit. It is enough that we know our destiny. We know that there are moral penitentiaries and spiritual infirmaries in the land of life beyond for the unhappy ones at the lowest round of the ladder. We know that if a man dies he lives again. That is the teaching of our spiritual science. Force is the spiritual body. The viewless spiritual essence of thought and intelligence is not force. We see that force departing from the physical body, and we find it returning to rap upon our tables. We take the ground, then, that all creation is a divine trinity—matter, force, spirit; that the totality or sum of this is the Unknown, the Unknowable, which our spirits bend before as Father; that the form that has departed from us has left an angel behind; that the air is thick with these people; that "over there" justice shall be done, and everything righted. We do not speak of a cunningly devised doctrine, but of that which we do know in the voice of twice told ten thousand returning spirits. You believed Columbus when he brought back the key that unlocked the New World, because he brought the swarthy inhabitants of the distant land with him. So should you believe us when we return with legions of the spirit country beyond the grave, with all that you have known, and loved, and trusted, all declaring that the destiny of man is to live for ever.

On Sunday evening next, the service will be conducted by Mr. J. J. Morse.

PROPHETIC DREAMS.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The narrative contributed by Mr. H. Spicer in your last number is one of the most remarkable of its class which has ever been published. Presuming it to be, as it professes, an account of actual occurrences with real names and localities, its value would be immensely increased if the exact date was given, so that an investigator could refer to the records and reports of the said assizes at Exeter. Possibly your correspondent can furnish this, but if not, it would be well worth a search, which could easily be done without any serious amount of labour.—I am, yours faithfully, January 14th, 1883.

A STUDENT.

A SIGN OF THE "TIMES."—In its obituary notice of the Earl of Stamford and Warrington, the Times says: "Those who believe in omens will be struck by the curious coincidence that three weeks ago, during Divine service in the church at Dunham, the escutcheon fell from the monument to the late Earl of Warrington, whose title is now extinct, and was shattered to pieces." The second title died with the late Earl, whose death was thus presaged.

PIÈCES JUSTIFICATIVES

OF THE NEED OF A SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

For some years past I have had in my possession a body of evidence from private families bearing upon the different subjects which the Society for Psychical Research was founded to investigate. This evidence has hitherto been unpublished, and some of it must still remain so, as it was given with that distinct understanding. Even in many of the cases that I am at liberty to publish, suppression of names and places has been strictly enjoined. To the general public the value of the evidence is thus somewhat impaired, but to those who have confidence in my integrity I do not think the evidence should be any the less valuable on this account. So far as collateral inquiry could throw any light on the statements or the credibility of the witnesses, I have endeavoured to leave no stone unturned, and no case will be published that has not, in my own mind, reached a certain "figure of merit."

Testimony on behalf of phenomena transcending the common experience of mankind requires to be both unexceptionable and abundant. The sanity and moral character of the individual, the corroborative evidence of eye-witnesses, and the consistency of the various narratives, are the chief points to be determined in ascertaining the trustworthiness of any evidence for improbable events. Some mental allowance, in the way of addition or subtraction, usually the latter, must be made for the prepossessions or bias of each witness. The "personal equation" to our judgment, being as real a quantity as the "personal equation" to our eyesight; how much must be allowed for this no two readers will agree. A near approach to the right value in any given case would probably be found by selecting fifty devout readers of "LIGHT" and fifty devout readers of the Saturday Review, ascertaining the algebraic sum of the various plus and minus quantities put down by each reader, and dividing this sum by 100.

I cannot undertake to reply to the criticism which some of these narratives may evoke; but at the same time fair, intelligent criticism, whether friendly or hostile, is most desirable. In the light of such criticism let us carefully read again the original narrative, and ultimately and indelibly stamp it with the figure of merit that it deserves. For the sake of uniformity shall we say that 100 represents, in our opinion, absolutely unexceptionable evidence in any given case and 0 absolutely worthless evidence?

I am not permitted to give the name, nor even the correct initials, of the writer of the following remarkable narrative. But I am personally acquainted with him, and he is well known and much respected by all who have spoken to me about him; in particular by a Nonconformist clergyman of high reputation, and who happens also to be a personal friend of my own. It was at this friend's house I had a long interview with the writer, who was deeply affected with the unhappy consequences of the sittings six years previously. As the result of my inquiries, observation, and cross-questioning, no doubt whatever was left in my own mind of the entire trustworthiness of the narrator, who, I may add, was, until recently, a merchant in the City. The singularly prosaic, unimaginative quality of my informant's mind would have rendered his invention of the accompanying narrative almost a greater psychological wonder than the actual occurrence of the facts he describes. I give merely his letters bearing on the case; they were received by me at the close of the year 1876.

CASE I.

INEXPLICABLE PHYSICAL PHENOMENA.

MY DEAR SIR,—I enclose the notes of my experiences which I promised you. They were written from memoranda made at the time, and are accurately correct in all respects.—Believe me, yours truly,

W. D.

Some eight years ago I had a few experimental sittings in my own house with some friends, obtaining the usual results, table-turning, lifting, raps, &c. This decided me upon trying to thoroughly investigate the matter, and I had a number of sittings with friends, and also with professional mediums. These were held in various places and under a variety of conditions, the results being as follow:—

I was firmly convinced that the results obtained were apart from any direct action of the medium, who had no control whatever over the nature of the manifestations, or the electrical or other conditions required to produce them. I was not, however, convinced of the supernatural character of the manifestations, and felt that it was impossible to thoroughly establish any conviction as to the action of the medium, unless I obtained similar results in my own circle, without the presence of any professional medium, and under conditions rendering imposture impossible. Such an opportunity offered itself six years ago [that would be 1870].

I was staying at the seaside (Lowestoft) with my wife, a young lady, and a gentleman, an old and intimate friend. All these, especially my wife, were unbelievers who ridiculed the whole thing. We decided, however, upon trying what results we could obtain.

We sat in a drawing-room, on the first floor, with the door locked and the key in my pocket. We turned down the gas, but there was a full moon shining full upon the windows, and the whole room was light enough for us to see one another, and, in fact, everything that was around, and in the room. The table was an oblong, heavy walnut table. I will call my friend F. and the young lady A.

First Evening.

The usual manifestations took place. The table moved about the room. A match-box was brought from the other end of the room. Communication was held by raps, I calling out the alphabet, and many questions were answered. F. was declared to be a medium. The mediumship of others present declared doubtful. The only message given, except replies to questions put, was "I am in love!"

Second Evening.

The above manifestations were repeated, but the answers were fuller and more coherent. Lights were visible floating about the room especially over the heads of my wife and F. F.'s name was spelt. My wife's name was spelt, and she was declared to be a medium. F. complained much of being touched, his hair pulled, his clothes dragged, &c., and during the whole of our sittings this was constantly the case. He said he felt "cold hands" on him. Incidentally I may observe that during all these manifestations, and afterwards, except when our circle was forcibly broken, we never ceased to hold hands tightly, not merely laying them on the table, as is often the case.

A. was touched on the face and hands. F. asks for a book to be brought, which was instantly done, a book from another part of the room being thrown on to the table before him. I ask for further proof. F.'s chair is suddenly dragged from under him, his foot laid hold of, and he is thrown down on the floor, still holding my wife's hand, but without the slightest noise or injury

On turning up the gas, we find him in a trance, the book hanging in an impossible position (so far as gravitation goes) upon his knee. His watch and a ring (which latter was on the finger of the hand my wife still held) were on a sofa at the other end of the room, a large one. A small key fastened upon the swivel of his watch-chain had disappeared. After a few minutes he recovered, I having lifted him on to a sofa. He thought he had been asleep, felt quite well, and was unconscious of what had taken place or that he had been on the floor. When we sat again a message came, "I love F." On asking who it was, the reply was, "Katie." This so annoyed him that we discontinued sitting. Lights were frequently appearing during the evening, and at one time a broad collar of flame was seen round my wife's neck.

Third Evening.

I placed a paper speaking-tube on the table, but "they" refused to use it. My wife asks for a book. A French work was brought to her from under a pile of other books in the room. She happens to be very fond of French. She asks to have F.'s watch-key, lost the night before, returned. It was at once thrown on to the table before her. A. is touched a good deal. The tube is floated about the room, and then thrown down on the table. In consequence of the annoyances, pinches, &c., F. asks to sit out. He goes into a recess of a bay window, within sight of us all, sitting in a wicker chair which creaks loudly at the slightest motion, and begins to smoke. We then continued. My wife is violently shaken and agitated. A figure appears, a woman in dark clothes, gliding gently from behind me. She passes A., and takes hold of F.'s chair (left by the table), moves it out of the way, and, gliding round the table, approaches my wife, who, on feeling the hands of the figure upon her, screams, and I turn up the gas. We all then saw the figure distinctly, and we can also swear that F. remained in the chair looking out of the window. He did not see the figure. A rustling noise accompanied its progress.

F. rejoined the circle. By my request he asked for flowers for the ladies. Immediately two bunches of cut hot-house flowers, double stocks, &c. (it being October), were placed in front of the ladies. F. sat with his feet round the legs of his chair to prevent its being dragged away, and wore Wellington boots. He called out "they are taking my coat off." He was thrown down, my wife holding his hand tightly. His coat was off, his boots were on a sofa ten yards away, his handkerchief tied in a knot, and in another place.

We sit again, and I ask for something from home, but am refused.

F. asks for something from home, becomes violently agitated, is thrown into a trance, and a photograph of a young lady is on the table in front of him. My wife takes it up, and on his recovery, which took some fifteen minutes or so, shews it to him. He puts it into his pocket, bursts into tears, and says, "I would not have had that happen for anything."

[The photograph was the only existing copy of a portrait of a young lady he was once engaged to.* It was in an album, in a drawer, with two locks over it, in his house in the West End of London. On our return to town, it had disappeared, and his wife, being quite ignorant of our having had sittings, told us that at that very hour a fearful crash occurred in his bedroom, and brought every one in the house up to inquire the cause.]

My wife asked him to shew her the photograph; when to his dismay it had disappeared from his pocket. A number of other minor manifestations occurred of which I took no notice, and all through the sittings whenever anything happened F. became violently agitated. We decided not to sit again, but he was so upset the next day at losing the photograph that my wife suggested sitting once more to try and recover it.

Fourth Evening.

My head was violently struck, as if by a sofa-pillow thrown, or some soft substance. An object passed over our heads and crossed the table, feeling soft, like feathers. F. asks for fruit and flowers; more flowers are brought, and apples, the only fruit of the season which we had not in the house.

A. asks for something of hers. Her pocket-book is brought from another table.

My wife asks for something. F. is thrown down instantly, and on the table is the photograph lost the night before.

Instead of recovering quickly, F. has alternate fits of unconsciousness and raving delirium, which last for five hours. He is then sensible, but very weak. The next day he begged my wife to destroy the photograph, which she burned in our presence. F. has a mild attack of brain fever, and from that day has never been the same man. He is periodically visited in the night, annoyed by noises, apparitions, tricks, &c., and would be a lunatic but that my wife and I have extraordinary power over him at such times, and take care to be with him a good deal.

* If I remember aright Mr. D. told me it was the death of the young lady that ruptured the engagement.—W.F.B.

On our return to London, my house was subject to noises, knockings, &c., constantly, and is so still at times. My wife has seen figures, and the tricks constantly played upon her were most annoying.

Often I have seen an article of jewellery disappear as soon as placed upon the table, and be found afterwards in most unaccountable places. We were touched, sprinkled with water in the night, and it was only when we gave up the entire subject that the annoyances ceased. Even lately a singular noise has followed me to Bournemouth and Hastings, and to a friend's house at Camden Town. F.'s nervous system is shattered.

During these sittings there was no possibility of imposture, and the people concerned were thoroughly reliable and incapable of it. I have omitted a great deal of the detail of our sittings, giving merely the main facts.

In a further communication, dated September 29th, Mr. D. says:—

"My wife has continued to be annoyed at times, and is now, by noises and appearances; and she tells me that prayer is the only means of lessening the annoyance. I am only occasionally troubled myself, but lately a very singular noise has persecuted me constantly, following me to Hastings, afterwards to Bournemouth, and to the house of some friends. I have quite convinced myself that reading, talking, or even thinking upon the subject in some way gives the influence far greater power. It is now six years since we had our last sitting, and still my friend, who was so seriously affected at the time, suffers at intervals most acutely. In his case the peculiar manifestations seem to return frequently with almost their former power, and the least allusion to the subject affects his brain and nerves. The influence which is exerted over him by my wife and myself is almost incredible. An old friend of mine, Dr. R., who had studied such cases, told me some time ago that his reason would depend upon his being near us when these attacks came on, and I believe that such is the case. The unpleasant results in our case, and the experience of other friends, have convinced me that the influence is a dangerous one, and to be avoided."

In a final letter, dated December 2nd, Mr. D. states, in answer to my further inquiries:—

"F. is thoroughly reliable, and though a singularly sensitive man, is straightforward, honest, moral, and quite incapable of trickery or deceit. A. is a young girl, timid, not clever, and I would answer for both of them. We were staying in apartments. The only other people in the house were A.'s father and mother in the dining-rooms, old friends, and they were quite ignorant of what took place above. I myself locked the door, pocketing the key on each occasion. . . . I took F. to Dr. R., an old friend, and a very eminent physician, who said his nerves were shattered, and that he would never thoroughly recover, whilst his retaining his senses depended upon us. Not the least remarkable thing is the extraordinary influence exerted over F. by both my wife and myself, especially the former. When his attacks come on he cannot sleep at night, and the only cure for them is sleep. If he lies down on a sofa it is sufficient for my wife to sit beside him to send him to sleep at once. . . . Probably mesmerism might do him good. It would not do for you to see him, however. For five years the subject of Spiritualism has not been mentioned to him. Any casual allusion to it, by a stranger even, causes him violent agitation, and brings on these attacks. . . . My wife also has often told me on going home, 'You were talking upon the forbidden subject at such an hour to-day,' which was true, although she could have had no means of knowing except by her nervous sensations. . . . I have avoided referring to many minor physical manifestations that occurred, and also to our sensations during the sittings, an effect being produced as of a powerful electric current circulating all the while. I do not wonder at any one doubting the facts; but if you could have witnessed the effect of the manifestations on F., and have felt yourself the singular sensations produced by them, you would have seen the physical impossibility of deception so far as any human creature was concerned."

Cases such as the foregoing, shew that where a certain vidus exists, psychical influences can be as potent and dangerous as the contagion of small-pox or scarlatina. Scientific inquiry into these phenomena will be tedious and may be hopeless, but I do not think it has anything to fear. On the other hand, there is a large amount of evidence to shew that Spiritualism in sport may become obsession in earnest—attaching whatever meaning we like to these terms.

A PERSONAL OR IMPERSONAL GOD?

I desire to make some comment on an utterance of "M. A." (Oxon.) in a recent number of "LIGHT." I hold that writer in the highest consideration for the fairness, the candour, and the lucidity of his intellect. His calmness is judicial, and his moral nature is quite as excellent as his intellectual. Therefore it is that I was both surprised and disappointed at his attitude of apparent indifference on the great and momentous question of "A Personal or Impersonal God." It is the greatest of all the questions that can haunt or agitate the human soul.

"M. A." (Oxon.) appears to me quite at sea on this question. He makes what seems to me a portentous blunder in regard to the very meaning of the word "personal." He asks, "Is the human body the highest conceivable shrine of spirit?" This question at once shews that his mind is labouring under a strange confusion. He views the word "person" as implying or involving a bodily configuration. This is, if I may say so, a rather vulgar use of that word—as when we say, "Had you any money on your person?"—making that word synonymous with "body." Now, in speaking of God as a Person, we leave that question in entire abeyance. It is all too mysterious for our comprehension. Such knowledge is too wonderful and excellent for us, we cannot attain unto it. God must be able to communicate with matter, and originate force to impel it and to sustain it, for matter is inert in its own essence; but how or in what shape or form it enters into His structure we cannot imagine. But, as I said before, this question must be wholly left. The question of personality is distinct from that. That term is here used in its scientific or metaphysical sense, which is wholly mental. When we assert that God is a Person we mean that He is an Ego—that He has a will—a conscience—and, by the nature of the case, that He has an unique existence which entirely differentiates Him from His creation, but which creation reflects His glory and majesty and shadows forth His moral qualities.

Again, when we say that God is Impersonal we mean that He is not an Ego, that He has no will—no moral judgment—no preference of one thing or one quality more than another—that He, or rather It—has no self-consciousness—is, in fact, not aware of His own existence. In one word, an impersonal mind is an impossible conception. We have no experience, and there is no produceable instance, of an impersonal mind. Personality is at once a most mysterious yet a most familiar and intelligible idea. Each one of us has only to turn his gaze inwards, and then he will know what a "person" means. You are yourself and nobody else. You have a will and a conscience of your own, which fences you off from every other human being; you are conscious of your own existence as an unity—in a word you are an Ego. Now a God who has none of these attributes is inferior to ourselves. He cannot be a Mind, a Will, or a Conscience—in truth He is no God at all. Personality is the first and last word of metaphysics, of morals, and of mind.

If there be a God, He must be a Person. There is no alternative between admitting the Divine Personality and blank Atheism.

G. D. HAUGHTON.

[I am obliged to Mr. Haughton. It seems to me that I was undoubtedly wrong, and that he is probably right.—M. A. (Oxon.)]

THE DOMESTIC GHOST.

There are occasionally phenomena which, with every appearance of being ascribable to natural causes, defy the most careful scientific scrutiny—a class of incidents which, belonging to houses rather than to their occupants, attain proportions too great to admit of our assigning them to the operation of any natural law to which conjecture has yet pointed its unstable finger.

It is almost unnecessary to observe that, if a perfectly spotless reputation in the matter of legendary ghosts be required, the haunted homes of England may be reckoned by the score. Very many of these have figured in the graphic pages of Mrs. Crowe, Mr. Owen, and others, and varying conclusions—with which it is not my province to interfere—have been drawn from these stirring narratives. Very many more have been wisely left to their own local fame, as deficient in the credentials needful for their admission within the pale of printed history. Of the residue I may be permitted to record a few, possessing the double characteristic of recent occurrence and direct authentication. Such was a certain little ray or spectre of light which, for many years, haunted the mansion in which the late Thomas Andrew Knight, the correspondent and associate of Sir Humphrey Davy, was born.

The appearance of this lustrous little visitor greatly disturbed the inmates of the house, who were not reassured by witnessing the repeated discomfiture of Mr. Knight's persevering attempts to discover its origin. He himself, becoming piqued in the pursuit, gave incessant chase to the mystery with all the perseverance of a true philosopher. It seemed that this domesticated ignis fatuus was accustomed to appear in a bedchamber on the second floor, and dance about the apartment, or remain motionless, without being apparently influenced by anything the spectators might do. In many different positions, Mr. Knight surveyed it accurately, without being able to detect any angle by which light could possibly be conveyed to that point. Few men were better qualified than he to investigate natural phenomena, and especially that class which ought to have included the luminous visitor I have described.

The lady to whom I am indebted for the next example Mrs. Cholmeley Dering, was the sister of the gallant Colonel De Lacy Yea, slain before Sebastopol. I give the narrative almost in her own words:—

On the 14th May, 1865, she was on a visit to some friends who inhabited a large mansion near Weymouth. The house was very old, and had peculiarities of construction which—to make the story clear—must be explained. The great drawing-room upstairs was a singularly shaped apartment, having the door in one corner, and opposite to a large window opening on the balcony. On the left of this door was another, opening into a very small apartment, formerly used as an oratory. In this, a window, divided in the centre by a stone mullion, looked down at a great elevation upon a flagged courtyard. From the oratory were no means of exit save through the drawing-room. The door of the drawing-room opened on to a small landing, having the old winding stone staircase on the right, and, opposite, a wide corridor on which open all the bedrooms. A young relative of Mrs. Dering's, now Mrs. Cameron—who was also a guest in the house—being somewhat indisposed, had been reclining all the morning on the sofa in the drawing-room, and it was late in the afternoon when Mrs. Dering, going to the room, met her relative quitting it. A few words passed, when Mrs. Dering's eye was caught by the figure of a man—tall and grey-haired—slowly passing along the drawing-room towards the door of the oratory.

"I inquired," continued Mrs. Dering, in relating the story, "who was the stranger that had been with Charlotte in the room. She denied, with much surprise, that any one had entered. Conceiving, however, that she must have been mistaken, I remained, after she had left me, where I was, fully expecting that the man I had so distinctly seen would come out. At last, losing patience, I entered the room. No one was visible. My first idea was that he was a robber, who proposed to conceal himself somewhere about the rooms, and I consequently resolved to watch him. Observing no place of concealment in the drawing-room, I went at once to the oratory, and, cautiously unclosing the door, looked in—half expecting to find myself grasped by the discovered marauder. No one was there! I then re-examined the drawing-room, without avail, and going out on the landing, but still watching the door, I called to one of the young ladies of the house, and asked her, laughingly, if she had ever seen a ghost in the house!

"'Never,' was her reply. 'But you know that there is one!'

"I had never heard so, but I now declared that I had certainly seen it, and but a few minutes since.

"My friend laughed, and said: 'You don't mean to say you have seen the old man?'

"'What old man?'

"'Our ghost.'

"I described his appearance, and my friend, apparently much struck, proposed a still more rigid search, which we made, but with no better result than before. I am not what is called a believer in ghosts. I never before saw anything I could not account for; but this I did see, and, looking straight into a well-lighted room, I cannot conceive that I was the subject of any optical delusion. The face of the figure was averted, but so natural and palpable was the apparition that the last thing that occurred to me was that it might be 'a dream of the feverish brain.' That evening a party dined at the Hall. I was taken down to dinner by the rector of the parish, who, in the course of conversation, happened to remark on the antiquity of certain family seats in that part of Dorset, adding, with a smile, that more than one of these boasted the distinction of a domestic phantom.

"'Even under this roof,'—he continued; but checked himself.

"'A tall, grey-haired man, with a low-crowned hat, who visits the oratory?' I asked.

"'You have seen it!' rejoined my neighbour, and changed the conversation.

"I subsequently became acquainted with a strange history connected with this old mansion. In Hutchin's History of Dorset, or rather in an earlier edition of that work, now exceedingly rare, it was recorded that the mansion was, in 1660, possessed by a Mr. Rickard, who, on his death-bed, requested his wife to send for the reverend rector of the parish, Mr. Bound, and to leave him alone with him. His desire performed, the dying man directed his friend's attention to the foot of the bed, and inquired: 'Do you hear what that old man is saying?' Mr. Bound could only look at him with amazement, but was requested to take pen and paper and write what he was about to hear. Mr. Rickard, then, with the manner of one following the dictation of another seated on the bed, proceeded as follows:—

"'In the year 1665, 90,000 persons will perish in London, of one disease. In the succeeding year, there will occur such a fire in London that the lead on Paul's roof will pour down like rain. On the 11th June, 1685, a person will land west of Weymouth who shall cause great bloodshed and calamity, and involve many leading families of the West in trouble and ruin. And in proof of this, though you are now thought to be in a dying state, you shall to-morrow be well enough to leave your bed, and walk on your terraces. While there, you will receive three unlooked-for visits, one from a person in Jersey, one from a gentleman from Ireland, and one from your own son, whom you believe to be abroad, and had not hoped to see again.'

"On the following day the sick man was really so much better that he was able to walk on his terrace as foretold. An old friend arrived from Ireland. Another landed at Weymouth from a Jersey vessel; and finally, young Rickard, who had travelled day and night to reach his father before he died, drove hastily to the door. This extraordinary statement was signed by Mr. Rickard, and the Rev. Cuthbert Bound, and verified before two of the county magistrates—Colonel Giles Strangways (an ancestor of the Earl of Ilchester) and Colonel Coker—and was communicated to the historian by the Rev. R. Bingham, from a friend in whose family a copy of the original deposition has been carefully preserved."

The following incident was related to my sister by one of two young ladies who, with their parents, were residing in a large old mansion near Payerne, on the road from Lausanne to Berne.

Payerne was once the residence of Queen Bertha of Burgundy, whose remains yet rest in the vaults of the church she founded, and the little town played no undistinguished part in the old Catholic times. The two young ladies, daughters of the proprietor, occupied a very large chamber, their beds being placed at either end. On a certain night, in 1861, both being awake and engaged in conversation, the room being very light from the moon, the elder sister suddenly beheld a figure gliding through the apartment.

It was apparently that of a monk, with the cowl thrown back, exposing one of the most fearful countenances imagination can conceive. It absolutely froze the girl's blood with horror. Unable even to utter a cry, her fascinated gaze followed the motions of the terrible visitor as he seemed to stride in the direction of her sister's bed. The latter, appearing to become suddenly conscious of the spectral presence, rose on her elbow—then, uttering a loud shriek, gathered the bed-clothes over her head. The phantom seemed to spring upon the bed, but in that act disappeared. The spell of his presence thus broken, the elder sister jumped from her bed, and running to her companion, clasped her in her arms, sinking on her knees at the bedside. Such was the degree of horror experienced by both that they actually retained this position for four hours, without daring to trust their tongues with what they had witnessed. At length, as the slow day-light crept into the chamber, the elder forced her lips to ask, "Why did you scream?"

"Did you see him?" was the rejoinder, the speaker adding that, having closed her eyes for a moment, she opened them on a figure in a monk's frock, with a countenance like (she used a German expression denoting the Father of Evil) and thereupon shrank back shuddering into the bed. Investigation shewed that this apartment had always been known by former occupants as the "Monk's Room," and that a tradition existed that a diabolical murder committed by a monk had, at one period, affixed a stigma upon the mansion which time had nearly washed away.

It may not be unworthy of remark that the scene of domestic disturbances is most frequently laid in some old dwelling, often not entirely clear of ghostly imputations, even before some special event attracts to it special attention. In Germany and Switzerland, where wood is largely used in building, creaks, thumps, and concussions of every description are, particularly in edifices beginning to suffer from the infirmities incident to longevity, as plentiful as wasps in peach-time. A curious example occurred, some years since, at Vienna, where the then British representative—Lord A. Loftus—rented a noble old palace, L.

One fine suite of rooms had been for several years disused, and, although his lordship had been rather emphatically recommended to allow them to remain so, the exigencies of a large establishment compelled their re-occupation. In a short time the German domestics began, one by one, to quit his lordship's service. Very soon, a certain amount of uneasiness commenced to reveal itself in the British element. It was known that extraordinary sounds were prevalent, day and night, in the newly-opened suite, and that such a panic existed among those who inhabited it that no domestic ever voluntarily entered the doors alone. Lord A. Loftus' own study was situated in the haunted suite, and he very quickly satisfied himself that the amount of disturbance had by no means been exaggerated. The night-hush would be suddenly broken by dull, dead blows, such as caused the whole house to vibrate from roof to cellar, dealt upon the wall; noises above like the flinging together heavy articles of furniture; noises below like the rumbling of laden wains. Once, so fearful a crash occurred that Lord A. actually leaped from his chair, imagining that the house was coming down. In writing of these facts to his friends, he declared that the noise could be compared to nothing but the sudden collapse of the roof and walls. Yet nothing was disturbed, nor did even a grain of dust succeed the shock. Lord A. averred that he had passed whole nights moving about the mansion, pistol in hand, unable to believe such very material sounds to be other than the work of some designing person, and resolved to detect him. It was, in the end, found necessary to close the haunted suite, as scarcely a servant could be induced to enter it. Comparative tranquillity succeeded; but as a haunted reputation, like the dry rot, is usually ineradicable by anything short of the destruction of the building, the noble lord was not sorry when an opportunity occurred for effecting an honourable retreat. This L. Palace is perhaps the oldest in Vienna, and is very substantially built, the red pine being largely used in the framework and interior fittings of the mansion. When it is added that the mysterious sounds almost always recurred at night, and at those periods of it at which atmospheric changes are most sensibly felt, those who have dwelt in old houses may perhaps recall experiences of a kindred sort, though scarcely so strongly accented as those which disturbed the diplomatic musings of Lord A. Loftus.

It is not, however, to memorable mansions alone that these things occur. A friend and correspondent writes to me from Sardinia as follows:—

"What I have to relate has happened in a house by no means adapted to the presumed taste of restless spirits. It is no feudal castle, no dilapidated, many-chambered baronial hall, nor is any bloody tragedy, to my knowledge, interwoven with its history. It was, in fact, quite a new house, not long completed when I entered into possession. There are three rooms in front—the north (my bedroom), middle, and east room—and two others at the back. The ground floor was divided into stores, and there is a room and kitchen above. Each door, beside the usual lock, has a double bolt—at top and bottom. I had not long occupied the house when I began to hear unaccountable sounds—footsteps crossing the closed rooms, doors opening and shutting, &c., &c. At first the old housekeeper, then my other inmate, would remark in the mornings: 'Signor Padrone, lei era forse infaccendato jeri notte, si è caricato tardi' (Master, you were working hard last night, to have gone to bed so late!) At length, however, it became a familiar household affair, and little notice was taken of it, except on occasion of some particular performance. One night, after retiring to my bedroom, I was startled by an authoritative rap-tap-tap at the door opening into the middle room.

"Chi è? (Who is there?)

"No answer, but an emphatic repetition of the summons.

"'Brigands!' was the suspicion that crossed my mind. 'O rispondi, o non apro.' (Reply, or I do not admit you.)

"A heavy footstep crossed the middle room, and visited the two others, both the doors, which I had left bolted, opening and re-closing in turn. Convinced now that robbers had invaded my dwelling, I seized my revolver and rushed out. On the stairs I met the old housekeeper, armed with a large carving-knife. She had heard the doors opened, footsteps following, and voices and movements, as of several persons, below, and, true to her training (the old dame had sailed with her husband in a privateer), had hurried to lend assistance. All, however, was now again as still as death, every door secured exactly as they had been left. A few days later a young military officer, commanding the detachment stationed near, who had lately lost his wife, and was for a few days my guest, observed one morning, 'You were very busy all last night.'

"He had heard me, as he thought, arranging papers, opening and closing drawers, &c., to such an extent as to prevent his sleeping. I told him I had retired to bed immediately, when he quietly replied: 'Forse mia povera moglie venuta a visitarmi.' (Perhaps my poor wife came to visit me.)

"The old woman at length suggested to me that these disturbances might be occasioned by the house not having received the customary benediction, and, to remedy this, took advantage of my temporary absence to have that ceremony performed. She had, in addition to her little piratical excursions (for I doubt the privateer was not much else) taken part in the Zanina revolution, in which the celebrated Ali Pacha lost his life. She had been schooled in firmness and resolution, and was certainly no bigot. The intervention of the priest was, I have reason to believe, suggested by her simply as a means of getting rid of our nocturnal disturbances. Whether the result was due to its efficacy or not I cannot tell. It is a fact, however, that we had no further trouble with our ghost."

"SHELLS."

At the risk of appearing irrepressible, I shall ask the editor to allow me to add this word of illustration to what I have said as to the impossibility and absurdity of divorcing what Theosophists call "the fourth and fifth" from what they call "the sixth and seventh principles" in human nature, or, in simpler terminology, the lower animal self from the higher spiritual self—at least in the manner they propose—by setting them apart, each with a separate existence of its own. A vigorous, determined, energetic man, who will fight his way perseveringly through all obstacles has also the characteristic defects of his good qualities, while the easy-going, amiable man has the characteristic defects of his. But are not these too inextricably implied in one another to admit of the good qualities being set on one side, and the bad qualities left to roam about by themselves on the other? The whole man may, indeed, be so transformed that the badness of his qualities—which is simply defect, as the profoundest philosophers have seen—may disappear, all that is valuable in all his peculiarities being absorbed and assimilated by the higher man he has become; but then, when this becomes true, there is no "shell" left—there are no defects left behind just as they were to "give tests of identity," and pretend to be the man himself! The man may, indeed, have infected others with his defects, but these others are not "shells"; they are persons.

But how are my anger, my pride, my ambition, my lasciviousness, my impatience, going to exist without me, or even bottled up by themselves in a different compartment of me, in one of the simultaneous members of a double consciousness? These involve the highest faculties of my spirit—though in a condition of limitation and distortion; they are, moreover, necessary to the self-formation of that spirit through withheld experience and self-suppression; by developing, and then suppressing them, is character moulded. To say that they can be detached from me and exist by themselves, is surely an assertion that savours of lunacy.

I may be unduly angry in my disappointment at the frustration of a most noble, beneficent, and self-sacrificing scheme. How does an Adept or Theosophist, then, propose to detach this anger, and give it a self-centred life of its own apart from what is excellent and spiritual in me? Surely this is very childish! How ever could my consciousness be separated from me, seeing it implies the exercise of most of my other faculties? My love of beauty is by no means an evil, but, if you take the Platonic view, quite a spiritual thing, only in this case intemperate, misdirected. And how is my consciousness going to remain when my love of beauty and other higher faculties essential to consciousness are taken away?

Therefore, it must be evident that the bad, or foolish, habits of a man are assuredly incapable of forming to themselves a body belonging to them, exclusively, which body may be dropped, and remain behind as an astral corpse, when the habits themselves are renounced. Moreover, the tests of identity given do not involve merely the bad or foolish characteristics of the beings who give them, but seem far more general and mixed in character. Such an Ahrimanic, purely diabolical "shell" is a difficult conception indeed! especially as badness and folly are not integrating powers. It is, of course, easy to say there are a myriad species of this shell. But even if an automaton so successfully simulating intelligence were at all conceivable, which I deny, the whole man, with his mixed nature good and bad, is concerned in producing the ethereal body, and it must go along with him, though of course, according to the predominance of good or bad within him, will its character be, the perfectly good man alone attaining to the angelic, or celestial body. No astral corpse, however, is likely to be left behind for the reasons already given. On the contrary, the psychical will more probably be changed into the pneumatical body. Apparently even the physical body of our Lord was so changed.

LETTER FROM MR. D. D. HOME.

We make the following extracts from a letter addressed by Mr. D. D. Home to the editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal:—

"My long silence must not be attributed to a want of interest in you or the noble mission to which you have so generously devoted your life. My health alone prevents my taking an active part in the struggle for truth versus error. In all probability my day's work is finished and I wait for the shadow that precedes the never-fading light, in the home where envy, malice, and untruth are unknown."

"I still hope to compile the third volume of my 'Incidents,' and I know it will be interesting from the correspondence I will give from those who have played an important part in modern Spiritualism."

"It is a consoling and pleasant thought in reviewing the past of my eventful life to know that I have endeared many noble and truth-loving hearts to my mission as well as to myself."

"We were in St. Petersburg the past winter, and it gave me pleasure to meet with my old friends of 1858, all giving me the heartiest of welcomes. As a rule these keep aloof from the modern movement, inasmuch as the abuses so rife elsewhere have brought discredit to the cause."

"If an outline sketch, chosen from the many which in all probability will never be known occurring in my life, can give pleasure to your readers, I will give it for the beginning of a New Year which I trust may bring less of malice, hatred, and unjust persecution than has been manifested the past few years to men who, like yourself, fight manfully to protect a great truth, and demand that justice be rendered. I have followed with deep interest the touching incidents where the influence of spiritual agency, or the objects of their solicitude, were alike unknown to me, and these incidents being oft recurring, and always correct, render any other explanation than a living, active, and intelligent power, impossible."

"The winter of 1868 I was in Glasgow, giving 'recitations from the poets.' In making a call, my friends observed that I had a 'weary look,' and they pressed me to remain and they would have an early dinner to suit my convenience, as I dined early to have my voice in trim for the evening's work. I was about to accept their hospitality when a distinct impression came, saying: 'Return to your hotel; you can bring consolation and comfort to one who requires both.'

"At 2 p.m. I reached the hotel, and on entering the 'coffee room,' 'John,' a talkative, old-fashioned Scotch waiter, carefully closing the door, and cautiously approaching me, with 'mystery' written on his honest face, said:

"'Sir, there's been a leddy here speering for ye.'

"He hesitated, as if to study the effect of such an announcement, and seemed surprised when I said:

"'Well, John, who was the lady, and what did she say?'

"'Ech, sir,' says John, 'she was an elderly, and na a young leddy, an she was verra friendly like. She jest said: 'Is Mr. Home in?' An I said: 'No, mem; but as he recites the night he's sure to tak his dinner at three punctual, and yons his table ready. Waul ye believe, sir, that the friendly leddy jest said: 'It's verra weel, jest put a cover for me; I'll hae my dinner ne him, though he does na ken me.'

"At three the lady came and from the moment we met she has proved herself a true and good friend. The introduction was simply, 'Mr. Home, I came this morning from Edinburgh for the sole purpose of appealing to you, to render me and my beloved husband, who is aged and in all probability will soon pass away, a great service. My husband, as you will find when you see him, is endowed with the most learned and brightest of intellects, but to my unutterable sorrow he is an avowed atheist.' [I must here add that Dr. D. has occupied for more than forty years one of the highest positions in the Medical Department of India, and he was a relative of Sir James Simpson.] Mrs. D. continued, and told me that her husband had consented to see me if I would visit him, and as my engagement terminated in Glasgow I went to Edinburgh the following day. Not only was the grand intellect fully convinced by overwhelming evidence of spirit identity, and by the, at that period, constantly recurring physical phenomena, but almost his last words were to his wife: 'You will tell Dan that I thank God and bless the day he came to us, for comfort and peace has been given to my last hours.'

"Your dear friend and brother for the truth and nothing but the truth,"

"Nice, France, November 15th, 1882."

PROPOSED CONCERT AND BALL.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to draw the attention of your readers to the forthcoming concert and ball in aid of the "LIGHT" Distribution Fund? An advertisement, with full particulars, will be found in another page. Next week we shall be able to publish the names of those ladies and gentlemen who have very kindly consented to sing.—I remain, yours faithfully,

FRANK EVERITT.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

QUEBEC HALL.

The usual Sunday evening services are still being continued in this hall. Mr. MacDonnell lectured last Sunday on "The Doctrines of the Churches at variance with the Teachings of their supposed Founder." The room supplied a number of questioners and speakers, and the lecturer had to stand the fire of half-a-dozen for a full hour. So long as he holds firm to his position—Christ only for Christians, and individual common sense as umpire, he "need not be afraid of ten thousand set against" him. The attendance was good, but not so full as usual, owing, no doubt, to an excellent counter-attraction.—Commented.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—On Wednesday evening, January 10th, the annual meeting of the Newcastle Spiritual Evidence Society, was held in the large hall at Weir's Court, Mr. Jno. Mould in the chair. Considerable interest was manifested in this meeting, inasmuch as for some considerable time a strong spirit of opposition has been shown to the method adopted by those who for some years have held the reins of government over the Society. Mr. Mould, on taking the chair, proceeded to criticize a printed circular which he held in his hand, and which had been presented to Mr. H. A. Kersey by a large body of the members, requesting him to allow himself to be nominated as president of the Society for the ensuing year, with the object of raising it from the present state of chaos and discord, and once more gathering together the scattered energies, which have been dissipated during the last few years of disruption. The secretary then read the report for the year, which shewed that the Society was still indebted to the treasurer something over £30. Two items of the report brought forth a strong discussion. One stated that a "party" was seeking power at the present annual meeting, whose desire and influence would tend to make the Society a centre of atheism. On the motion of one of the members this item was expunged from the report by an overwhelming majority as altogether false. The other item, stating that certain inexperienced individuals had interfered in the management of the séances to their detriment, was also expunged from the report by a large majority. Prior to the election of the executive, the anticipation of defeat led to the majority of those of the old executive who had been nominated retiring from the chances of a contest. The result is that the new executive are a complete change, and comprise several of the old and well-tried workers, who for some time have been driven from an active share in the movement. Mr. H. A. Kersey was elected president; Mr. Thompson, vice-president; Mr. Kay, Mr. Frost, and Mr. Wilson (some time ago expelled from the committee) as secretaries; Mr. Gillespie, librarian; and Messrs. Colman, Wilson, Bristol, Bell, Burton, Thompson, and Smedley were chosen on the Committee. The result was received with general satisfaction by those present; and Mr. Kersey, we are glad to say, met with general congratulation upon his victory, in the hope that his efforts to reform the Society, and to restore it to its former position, will be crowned with success.

GATESHEAD.—On Sunday evening last Mr. Ashton, of Byker, gave the members of the Gateshead Society a very eloquent and able address, in which he expressed his views in regard to the influence of the movement upon the Church. Mr. Burton occupied the chair.

HEITON.—On Sunday evening Mr. W. H. Robinson, of Newcastle, gave an admirable lecture to a large company upon "Spiritualism and Hebrew Legislation." Mr. Glenor filled the chair.

NORTHUMBRIA.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J.H.—Next week.

J.D.—Necessarily stands over for our next issue.

E.K.—If you will kindly send us your name and address in confidence we shall be glad to publish the interesting narrative which you have enclosed in your note. We shall also be obliged if you will communicate to us the address of the writer.

AN ASTROLOGICAL SWINDLER.—A man giving the name of John Hartwell was charged at Birmingham on Monday with obtaining money by false pretences. Over two hundred letters, which he had recently received were found upon the prisoner, many of them containing money. He had advertised "news from the invisible world," and evidently found it profitable. We must share the surprise of the Bench that so many fools could be found in the kingdom as was shewn by the letters.

THE GHOST OF MYLES JOYCE.—It is reported that the "ghost" of Myles Joyce, who was recently executed for being an accomplice in the Maamtrasna murders, has been seen in the vicinity of Galway Gaol, where he was hanged. On Saturday last a soldier of the 12th Regiment was tried by court-martial, and sentenced to two months' imprisonment, for having left his post while on duty outside the gaol, he alleging that he saw the ghost of Myles Joyce. It is needless to add that "his story was disbelieved."

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning, Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. SOCIAL POSITION.—H.H.H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H.S.H. the Prince of Solms; H.S.H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H.S.H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Light, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism and also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER, AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

The narrative contributed to the last number of "LIGHT" by Professor Barrett shews that there are two sides to Spiritualism, and conveys an impressive warning against a too hasty meddling with a comparatively unknown subject. No instructed student of psychical phenomena doubts that unbalanced minds may be upset by dwelling on strange and new experiences, any more than it is to be doubted that exciting religious experiences have overthrown many an intellect that possibly wavered before the tide of enthusiasm swept it away. The risk of obsession, too, is one that only the uninstructed will despise. The undeveloped spirits who hang round the threshold of the door set ajar are sometimes—but by no means always—inconvenient and troublesome guests. I have been troubled by such; but I have also learned from them many a lesson of great value. We are apt to magnify the malignity, or vicious intents, or devilry of these unprogressed spirits. They are not necessarily evil, or even mischievous, because their opportunities for development (thanks to some of our foolish habits, or laws, or prejudices) have during their life on earth been small. If evidence of this be asked for, it may be found in the fact that so little apparent harm results to the frequenters of promiscuous séances. I do not know what is the nature of the nidus of which Professor Barrett speaks, which renders some psychical influences poisonous as "the contagion of small-pox or scarlatina." But I should expect to find it rather in the chance gatherings of a promiscuous séance than in the seclusion of such a family circle as he describes. Yet my experience does not furnish me with more than a few, a very few, cases of harm resulting from such sittings. And I do know many cases in which supreme satisfaction and earnest conviction, a reformed life, and the germs of a renovated faith have been the outcome of such experiences as can be had in that easy way. The proportion on the side of good is enormous.

Moreover, the question should be contemplated from the point of view of duty and from the side of the communicating spirits. I have had long personal experience of spirits who habitually came and asked for prayer; I have heard of such cases from others, as I have also read them in books. It is, indeed, no infrequent experience. Such spirits have repeatedly expressed themselves as benefited by prayer, and by association with spirits on a higher plane of progression than themselves. They are elevated and blessed by such intercourse. Who shall say that this is not a sufficient reward for any little trouble we may take, or annoyance that we may suffer from the presence of these undeveloped spirits? I believe that spirits who can be called evil, malignant, or devilish are few: the ignorant, the frolicsome, the earthly, whose treasure is here still, are many. But we can help them, and they will not hurt us. It is well to recognise the dangers that necessarily attach to the study of this subject. But these are no more to be deterrent, in the light of duty, than the possibility of infection is to deter the physician from visiting his patient. But in this case the question of duty is what presses. Curiosity or idle meddling is another thing.

So that this impressive, and, as I think, much needed warning, must not be pushed too far. My interest in the narrative is the greater from the curious parallel that it presents to my own experiences of some ten years ago. Our circle was the scene of much that is paralleled by what Mr. D. records, as well as of much that transcends what he has written. The power was apparently as irresistible, the phenomena as strange, the influence over one of our number as erratic at first. But persistent and judicious experiment overcame the difficulties, and that which had seemed disorderly was reduced to system. Except where we, or conditions unknown to us, upset the regularity of the proceedings, or interfered with the unseen operators, all was evolved in orderly sequence until the work was complete, and the evidence of spirit-power ceased. It is, of course, absurd to write dogmatically about such a case as Mr. D.'s; but I should expect to find F. a nervous, sensitive, and perhaps, timid person, whose nature was not robust enough to withstand the series of shocks that every medium must go through in the course of development. This development in his case was probably interrupted at a critical period by the abandonment of the sittings; and he has remained, I take it, ever since, in a condition of partial development, in which he is a prey to inferior and unprogressed spirits—a victim to the nervous derangement which would be removed by complete development. It is melancholy to think that he and his friends have got from their abortive attempts to penetrate into a country where all is strange, unknown, and, therefore, more or less calculated to terrify, nothing but shattered health, and an abiding dread of that which (rightly understood) is an invaluable training for the soul; while we, on the contrary, from a somewhat similar experience—in which the ordeal was certainly not less severe—succeeded, by perseverance and patient continuance, in bearing away a settled conviction and a steady faith, a knowledge that no assaults can injure, and a hope that could have sprung (for us) in no other way.

But this is to be expected from the very nature of the investigation, and it is by no means to be deprecated that people should be warned of the risks that they may possibly incur. There is risk, and need of care, and patient thought, and prayerful attitude of spirit. The danger of obsession is real: the risk that frivolous and curious meddling with these matters entails is one that must be reckoned with; but the risk is by no means all. There is, as I have endeavoured to shew, another side to the question. But these experiences, essentially educational in their nature and intention, come most frequently unsought, bringing a blessing to one, to another apparently nothing but confusion and distress. They are not to be reproduced at will; and though the Society for Psychical Research may well hope to throw some light on the facts themselves, as well as on the laws which govern the influence of mind on mind, and possibly more than this, these spiritual experiences will, if I am not very wrong, remain a mystery to human science. No trace of law can be detected in them. We cannot reduce them to system, any more than we can regulate and tabulate the mysterious strivings of a human soul when it is intromitted into the spiritual state, and wrestles in prayer for aid against the tempters that beset it. To each, his own experience, singular and separate from all other. To each, his own peculiar training, of which he must make what is possible for him. But to the curious meddler, the man of unbalanced mind, the depraved, the sensual—and to some who, as man sees, are none of these—grave danger, and sometimes shipwreck. These, however, are the exceptions; the rule is otherwise.

I am told that the "Stars and the Earth," which I lately reviewed, and which is a book of high merit, is the work of Dr. Felix Eberty, of the University of Breslau. It is entered under his name in the British Museum Catalogue, and he is described as its author in a note prefixed by the editor of Macmillan's Magazine to his articles on "Good and Evil," contributed under his own name to that magazine by Dr. Eberty soon after his book first appeared, more than twenty years ago.

The following cases, which form a parallel to some recently mentioned by me as illustrative of the power of the imagination, are cited in Carpenter's "Mental Physiology" (Fourth Edition, p. 158), from Professor J. H. Bennett's "Mesmeric Mania of 1851":—

"A clergyman told me that some time ago suspicions were entertained in his parish of a woman who was supposed to have poisoned her newly-born infant. The coffin was exhumed, and the Procurator-fiscal, who attended with the medical men to examine the body, declared that he already perceived the odour of decomposition, which made him feel faint, and in consequence he withdrew. But on opening the coffin, it was found to be empty; and it was afterwards ascertained that no child had been born and consequently no murder committed.

"The second case is yet more remarkable. A butcher was brought into the shop of Mr. Macfarlan, the druggist, from the market-place opposite, labouring under a terrible accident (sic). The man, on trying to hook up a heavy piece of meat above his head, slipped, and the sharp hook penetrated his arm, so that he himself was suspended. On being examined, he was pale, almost pulseless, and expressed himself as suffering acute agony. The arm could not be moved without causing excessive pain, and in cutting off the sleeve, he frequently cried out; yet when the arm was exposed, it was found to be quite uninjured, the hook having only traversed the sleeve of his coat."

I am indebted to Mrs. Penny for the subjoined narrative, which is sufficiently varied in its main feature from the ordinary story of an apparition at the moment of death, to have an added interest of its own:—

"Two cousins of mine, middle-aged people of remarkably sound good sense, sat one winter day by the fire, about 4.30 p.m., talking of small household affairs. There was a little girl in the same room, and no one else in the house, their one servant being busy in a yard some little way apart from it. One of the sisters said to the other, 'But you know we cannot do that next week'—and before she could finish her sentence, a third and strange voice interposed with, 'Why not?' in the quiet tone of a person conversing with them.

"The little child looked scared, and ran to look behind a table to see if any one was hiding; the sisters, much startled, to door and shuttered windows, to see if any one was in the house or just outside it: but not a creature was near.

"Shortly afterwards they heard of the death of a cousin about the time of that surprising query,—a relation of whom they had seen little, and for whom they cared too little even to think of him often.

"The name of my cousins is Brown, and this happened at Bridgnorth. I sent them this report of what I remembered their telling me, vierz years ago, and had it verified, before forwarding it to you."

A PERSONAL OR IMPERSONAL GOD?

Feeling grateful for Mr. Haughton's few and admirably clear words about a "personal" God, I wish to express my deep sense of obligation. In these days any fixed point of belief is, by believers, so seldom separated from obscurities of thought that I think the world much indebted to those who can effect such clearance. For want of a fitting equivalent to the word "Ego," the word person seems to me to have served to cover the most irrational confusions of thought; and these have landed some minds in an abyss of high sounding verbiage, where not only all clear ideas must have been lost, but the peace resulting from a distinct object of worship also. To worship or obey an impersonal God would be about as possible as to worship and obey magnetism or electricity. It is only of late that currency has been given to the very important conception that all life and power throughout the universe is Divine power under manifold modifying conditions (which widely differs from the belief of the Pantheist that every being is Divine)—but as a personal, i.e., a consciously willing and creating God, claims obedience from creatures cognisant of His love and power, and such claims are irksome to modern philosophers, the perverse and rootless deduction from that truth has been made, that because life and its love and power are diffused in all beings, therefore there can be no one Being who diffused it; and that consequently God is, as Mr. Haughton shews, inferior to man—a permeating essence, and not the Father of Spirits, and Maker of Heaven and Earth.

If one or two atomic molecules of skin under the sole of a man's foot could philosophise, they might naturally adopt the same theory as to man, and feeling warm and comfortable might pronounce him to be no individual being, but warmth or circulation of the blood.

I am very much obliged to Mr. Haughton. "Blank Atheism" has so many interesting new names that it is well they should now and then be translated into plain old English.

To my mind, as, doubtless, to many others, the letter of Mr. G. D. Haughton in your last issue merely illustrates the utter inadequacy of language to express the Infinite—to define what (in the original significance of the word) we may understand, but cannot comprehend. For me it is equally impossible to regard the supreme Intelligence of the material and of the spiritual worlds as a person or individual, or as an impersonal principle. The idea of any "bodily configuration"—even that of the whole material universe—is necessarily inadequate and deficient in reverence, because it implies a limitation. But I apprehend that the Infinite Being, God, is not altogether apart from, is not wholly outside of, any existent being or thing. He is in all, but all are not in Him. The highest Spirit may say: "I and my Father are one"; the lowest has yet to realise the Fatherhood of God and His all-embracing immensity. At every step upwards in aspiration and knowledge must we not still repeat "nescio!" till He "hath made the whole complete"?

DESMOND G. FITZGERALD.

I am unwilling to encroach on your valuable space by entering on the never-ending controversy of the nature of Deity, but there was one remark in the article of your correspondent, G. D. Haughton, which seems to me to require further explanation to elucidate his meaning. I refer to the phrase, "God must be able to communicate with matter, and to originate force to impel and sustain it, for matter is inert in its own essence."

Now, without further entering into the question of the "structure" of Deity, I may venture to inquire what your correspondent understands by the essence of matter, and how that essence can be inert. Are not all atoms of so-called matter the effect of the correlation of two great forces forming, as it were, one? Is not force itself but the outward expression of the interior essence? How, then, can effect be independent of cause, so as to require the origination of that cause to impel and sustain it?

In "Notes by the Way," March 26th, 1881, was published a case of an apparition at the time of death. W. L., in America, suddenly taken ill, appeared to his father and mother in England at or about the time when he died, "showing much anxiety to get to England and see his mother." I am anxious to verify that story at first hand for the benefit of the Society for Psychical Research. Will the correspondent who sent it, and whose letter is mislaid, kindly enable me to do so?—M. #### SPIRITUALISM AT HOME.

By F. J. Theobald.

About ten years ago some friends, whom I will call Mr. and Mrs. K., came to spend a few weeks in the pretty suburban village where I then resided. They were much interested in Spiritualism, and we held several sances together. My friends were accompanied by their adopted daughter, whom I will call "Annie," and who had become a trance medium. Her power had developed naturally, i.e., without any effort; in fact, rather against, than in accordance with, her own will; for she, having been brought up in the sphere of rigid orthodoxy, had lingering scruples as to the propriety, wisdom, or right of yielding to these hitherto latent and unknown powers. It was only by gentle persuasion that we could induce her not to resist the influence, when we met en sance to wait for the spirit, and in all due reverence and prayerfulness to accept what should be given to us.

Annie had no knowledge of the various phases of mediumship or thought familiar in the spiritualist circles. She knew nothing of the laws of correspondence or of symbolism, by means of which so much that is given by spirit teaching can alone be interpreted. Thus, the little account of the poor spirit calling herself "Betsy," which crops up most unexpectedly at several successive sances, is of the deepest interest, the symbolic teachings conveyed in her simple words being full of instruction. With but slight alterations, and occasional explanations, I now give some few extracts from my Spiritual Diary of the experiences of those few weeks.

I find our first sance took place at my friends' lodgings. Mr. and Mrs. K., Annie, and myself were (as with but few exceptions) the only persons present.

May 3rd, 1871.

In a short time Annie was entranced. Her countenance was expressive of deep sorrow, and there was a peculiar sound in her throat, like choking. As soon as the spirit had gained sufficient control, we entered into conversation with her; for it proved to be the spirit of a very poor ignorant woman. In answer to our questions we learned that her name was "Betsy." She had been in the spirit land about five years, and was very unhappy. She dwelt much on the cruelty of her husband, and of the miserable surroundings of her earth-life. We asked the cause of her death.

"Oh, it was dreadful! I was choked!"

"Do not bright spirits come to help you?"

"Yes, but they are too bright, I cannot look at them."

"What sort of a home do you live in?"

"Very miserable. Only one room. I have no door, and only one window."

She expressed great hatred against her husband, saying she never could forgive him. We told her that, in all probability, it was on account of these revengeful feelings she was kept from rising; that if she would but pray to be enabled to conquer them, and endeavour to forgive her husband, she would soon progress towards a happier state. She promised to try to follow our advice, and then left, unwillingly.

May 4th.

Mr. K. went up to London to-day, to attend some sances, leaving it uncertain as to when he should be back. I determined, in case he did return in time on the 5th, that I would go to their rooms in the evening and have a "sitting;" but I did not mention my intention to any one.

On the morning of the 5th, Mr. K. went—an entire stranger—to Messrs. Herne and Williams, and had a most satisfactory sance with them. John King, the spirit, spoke, and addressing him by his name (which no one in the room knew) said: "Well, Mr. K., how is Miss Theobald?" Mr. K., in surprise, said, "Do you know Miss Theobald?" "Of course I do," replied the spirit. "We could not do without F. J. T. She's going to have a sance to-night. I'll come, and speak, if I can."

On account of this intimation from John King, Mr. K. returned early in the afternoon, called in to see me on his way home, and telling me these details, asked me if John King was correct! Now, had this piece of information been given through "John Watt" (i.e., the spirit who has for years manifested by direct voice through our kind friend, Mrs. Everitt's, mediumship), I should have felt less surprise; it would not have been the only time he has shown himself familiar with my untalked-of plans. But as I never have attended any sance where John King speaks, and have never met any of the mediums through whose power he is able to communicate, it is a matter of surprise and wonder that he should have thus proved himself so wise respecting my unspoken thoughts!

About seven o'clock in the evening we assembled en sance. First came long, and as it proved, most characteristic messages, given through my writing mediumship, purporting to be from close relatives of the K.'s. Suddenly a fresh influence came, and "John King" wrote a few words, but said he could not do much with me; he would try to speak through Annie. . . . Annie was soon entranced, and "John King" announced his presence in a jolly, rollicking way, but still saying, "I must be gentle here, this medium is very refined." We asked where the medium's spirit was. "Up there," he answered, pointing upwards and chuckling mischievously. "She don't like it much! Too much philosophy for her! The old lady she is talking to is too wise!" From his description we concluded that Annie was conversing with Mr. K.'s mother, who had been writing through me, and whose characteristic shewn therein, and recognised thereby, by her son, was a love of discussion upon any deep philosophical subject. . . . All at once came the choking sound in the medium's throat, and John King, turning sharply round, addressed some spirit, saying, "Go away! you shan't come here!" We asked "Who is it, John?" Turning round, again he spoke to the spirit, and after a pause, said, "She says her name is Betsy." "Ask her what she wants to say to us?" we said. (Another pause.) Then spoke John, "She wishes me to tell you she's 'agiven her husband; you know she means forgiven, but she's very ignorant, and said 'agiven. She says she's prayed, and prayed, and prayed, all day, and then she 'agave him. And now she has two windows instead of one."

John promised to "give her (Betsy) a look now and then, and do his best to help her."

We had a long conversation with John, during which he frequently congratulated himself upon his possession of the medium, and chuckled in an amused way over her unwilling absence from her body. We begged him not to exhaust Annie, and John assured us he would not tire her, adding, "You know, those poor things like Betsy, drave upon her too much. Now I'm strong and jolly! bless you, I shan't hurt her." . . . When Annie awoke she had no recollection of where her spirit had been, but felt perfectly well; not at all exhausted, as she did after any sad spirit like Betsy had been.

May 7th.

We had a sance with several friends besides ourselves. . . . "John King" came with difficulty. He told us "Betsy had progressed so well that she sent us word she had a door now!" John added, "She always had the door; but until she had her two windows she could not see it!" . . .

Evidently these messages from Betsy bear a symbolical signification, as well as a literal one, windows signifying light and knowledge, the door meaning progress to a higher condition.

May 10th.

We had this evening one good proof that the answers given to our questions by the spirits, were not the result of thought-reading. Mr. K. and Annie came to spend the evening with me; Mr. and Mrs. H. joined us. Mrs. K. was unable to be with us, because of illness. Annie was entranced, and after several controls, with whom we had much interesting conversation, an Indian spirit came. I (thinking of Mrs. K., who was alone in their lodgings) asked the spirit, "What is Mrs. K. doing?" "She's sitting there reading," he replied, pointing to the part of the room where Mr. K. was sitting. For the instant I was completely puzzled, but soon found that the spirit was referring to Mr. K.'s spirit-mother, and not his wife. He told us she was studying a book "Alpha." This corroborated a message which had been written through my mediumship, early in the evening when Mrs. K., senior, told her son that she was "getting ready to discuss with him." . . . Once during the evening the Indian spirit suddenly ceased speaking. We asked many questions, but no notice was taken. Suddenly he made some remark. I asked, "Why have you not replied to our questions?" "What questions?" he asked. "I've heard none! I've been away looking for John King. I wanted to ask him about those photographs" (referring to a previous subject). He sent a message to you something about a 'Betsy who is a great deal happier, because of a door!' . . . (This was the last we heard of poor "Betsy.")

May 11th.

This evening we were alone—i.e., Mr. and Mrs. K., Annie, and F. J. T.

As soon as Annie was entranced a spirit, who said he was a "navvy," spoke in a broad country dialect.

We asked him to describe any spirits who were present.

"I see three women," he said, and went on to describe the neat, characteristic Quaker costume peculiar to the family of both Mr. and Mrs. K. . . . He then turned round to me, saying, "There's a ——" Then he stopped, apparently listening to something. After a minute or so he continued, in a very subdued tone of voice: "I'm told I'm to say, 'lady.' There's a lady by you." We could not help laughing, and I said that we might be sure such conventional terms or distinctions were dispensed with in the spirit-world, that I never thought of my guardian spirit-mother as a "lady," but only as a bright, beautiful female spirit.

"I meant no offence," he said. "They are all women to me. I didn't know no better!"

I had a most interesting conversation with mamma, the spirit evidently listening for the reply given by her to my questions, and then repeating it to me. I asked her why she could not herself control Annie, and thus speak more directly. She told us that during the early stages of trance mediumship the less advanced spirits could gain control more easily than the higher spirits. When mamma had left, Mr. K. asked his mother if she could not give some message to him. The spirit, turning round, seemed to be listening attentively, but with a most bewildered expression of countenance.

"Speak plainer! Speak louder!" he kept saying. "I can't understand you."

At last he turned towards us, and in a most disheartened tone of voice, exclaimed:—

"Such a long message, and I can't tell you half! She uses such hard words for me. I don't know much. She can write through you" (pointing to me), "but she can't speak nohow through me! 'Compound,' 'mediumship,' 'rationalistic,' and a lot of words like that; but I can't remember all."

Speaking among ourselves of the spirit in control, we observed that he was evidently a low spirit, meaning undeveloped or ignorant. Suddenly he said, in an injured tone, "I'm not a low spirit; I'm a good sort of fellow. I used to go to chapel and to read my Bible when I was in your world."

We asked, "Do you find all that you were taught by your minister true?"

"No," he replied quickly, "not all, for he said some would be lost, and that is not true, for we are all taught. I go to school; I'm learning well. I'm not low."

During the following week, Mr. and Mrs. Everitt came, and most kindly agreed to have a séance with us. All who have had the privilege of being with this singularly gifted medium will understand the great boon it was to my friends to have this opportunity of witnessing the most beautiful manifestations which occur in her presence. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Pearce and my brother (Mr. Morell Theobald) joined us, at Mr. K.'s rooms, so that we formed a circle of ten.

I find entered into my diary that we had the usual raps, movement of the table without human contact, deliciously scented breezes, and brilliant spirit lights, flashing about the room. Then we all heard, first the distant, then the gradually approaching rumbling sound which heralds the approach of "John Watt." So strong was the power that every article of furniture in the room was in a strong tremor.

At last John raised the tube off the table, flourished it about the room, rapping several of us with it on our heads ("to gain power," he said), and then spoke clearly and loudly to us. A very dear friend had recently passed away from our midst. Thinking of him, I said to John Watt, "Have you seen our dear friend, John?"

"I've not seen him yet," he replied, "but I have heard he is here."

"Who told you?" I asked.

"A brother spirit said to me, 'Brother L. has got over the river,' but he is still sleeping. I've not seen him yet."

We had, as we do invariably in Mrs. Everitt's presence, some most delightful converse, upon different spiritual subjects.

When the time came for us to break up the circle, in order that friends present might not lose their trains to get home, John Watt bade us a courteous adieu, threw down the tube, and left.

This was as pleasant a finale as we could have to these few successive séances "at home," in which my friends were as much interested as I was myself.

MEDIUMSHIP FOR PAINTING.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have had a rather interesting séance with my old and esteemed friend Mr. J. C. Wright, of Liverpool, a record of which may not be without value to your readers. On Sunday evening, the 7th inst., after having delivered an eloquent oration at New Mills, he accompanied me home to be my guest for the night. While sitting round the fire, after supper, our friend Mr. Wright dropped off into a trance. Among several controls who took possession of him was one who gave the name of James Barry, and who stated that he lived and died in Cork, and was by profession a painter, and concluded by offering to produce me a small painting, under the following conditions: that I should furnish paints (water colours), two paint brushes, one small and the other larger, and a piece of cardboard about eight inches by six or seven. We were to sit in a very dim light, and the medium's face was to be covered over with a cloth, and tied in a knot at the back of the head.

Having provided a box of paints and brushes, and laid them and the cardboard on the table, we sat on Wednesday night, the 10th inst., at 7.30, in a very subdued light. We had barely taken our seats when the medium was entranced. My daughter, who is seventeen years of age and a strong physical medium, sat on the left of Mr. Wright; my wife being opposite and facing the medium, and myself being on the right. I had previously bound a thick cloth over the eyes of the medium, enveloping his head and face entirely down to his upper lip, drawing it tight under his nostrils, thus shutting out all possibility of his seeing by means of his natural eyesight. He took the brushes one by one from the case, examined them, and choosing two for his purpose, immediately set to work selecting the various paints with seeming facility. In a few minutes the ground-work of the picture was complete; a huge rocky bluff put in on the left, and what seemed sea stretching to the right and far away into the distance, until sea and sky blended into one. At this point the medium threw down the brush, lay back in his chair, and seemed thoroughly exhausted. In a minute or two the control said, "I am afraid, John, this will have to complete my first attempt; the medium has been sitting too much this afternoon, and there is a great loss of power." He had given two sittings to private friends, one after dinner and the other immediately before we sat for the painting. The control continued, "Yes, I can now fully appreciate the difficulties I have to overcome; I must be able to grasp the whole of the medium's mind. My main difficulty is want of lucidity. I could not have accomplished this much in any other circle but the one in which the medium has developed. But sit again in half-an-hour."

The medium came out of trance, and we sat chatting until the expiration of the half-hour, when we again took our places round the table, the medium blindfolded as before. The control at once took possession of the medium, took up the brush, and essayed his task again; but the medium seemed very much distressed, shook his head, and the control said that the conditions were not improved—in fact, they were rather worse. I begged him to try and give the painting a little more form if possible. The medium lay back in his chair for a few minutes. At last he roused up, stretched himself, and the control exclaimed: "Dear me! we are all dead; magnetise the medium." I made a few passes. The control raised his hand in signal for me to cease, and said: "I want you all to fix your gaze on the picture; it will assist materially the lucidity which is necessary, and I will try and outline it." He then took the brush, and after mixing the colours he touched up the sky and rocks and sea rapidly, and threw down the brush again, saying, "There! I have done what I can at this time; it is our first attempt. I have one or two difficulties to overcome; we shall again attempt the task at some future opportunity, when we hope to have more complete success."

So ended our séance. The painting is far from being a work of art. In fact it is but very imperfectly finished. The scene, however, is before you; the huge rocky bluff washed by an angry sea which stretches far away to the sky line; on the summit of the bluff, in a heap, are large, almost perpendicular rocks; further inland are indications of an old castle in ruins; while along the blue sky are drifting masses of white and grey clouds. And though the picture is far from what I could wish, there is ample promise for the future. However, as it is, there is abundant proof to my mind of avenues of perception and sight outside, apart and independent of, the natural organs of vision. Another fact seems evident from the remarks of the control, viz., that lucidity on the part of the medium may be supplied by, or drawn from, the minds of the sitters present. How this is effected is a mystery which, I fear, will rest with us till death shall clear our perceptions. Two solutions present themselves, however, to my mind. Either the control, or the spirit friends assisting him, can look through my open vision on to the picture as it is being manipulated by the medium, or they are enabled to look into my mind as into a looking-glass and see the picture in its various stages of progress. However, this is only a guess, and like most guesses, may be very wide of the truth.

I trust Mr. Wright may have an opportunity soon to give me still further proofs of the wonderful elasticity and adaptability of his mediumship, when you may hear from me further.

I enclose a strip of the cloth used in covering Mr. Wright's eyes.—Yours very truly,

JOHN LITHGOW.

SOMNAMBULIC INTROVISION, CLAIRVOYANCE, &c.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The following contains, apart from its general interest as a history of a cure by vital magnetism, some particulars which, I think, will interest all students of psychical science. I condense it from the records of a case communicated by M. Durville to the Journal du Magnétisme of October.—Yours truly,

J.D.

Madame Durieu, aged twenty-five, of a nervous temperament, and mild but excitable disposition, had been an invalid for six years. She had been under the treatment of various physicians, almost all giving a different diagnosis of her malady. She had been treated for debility, for spinal weakness, for weakness of the lungs, for consumption, for nervous disorder, for hysteria, for neurosis; in every case in vain or with aggravation. She was brought to me for magnetic treatment as a last resource.

I made the following record of the case:—A general prostration of strength, congestion of upper portion of lungs, bronchial irritation, pains and strange sensations in the region of the heart, torpid digestion, trouble of the head and confusion of thought, sleeplessness, excessive sensitiveness, pain and weariness and hurried respiration in walking.

I began my treatment of magnetisation by slow, gentle, more or less distant passes, from head to feet, for half an hour at a sitting. At the third daily operation she passed into the somnambulant sleep, in which she saw her interior condition, and described the minute bloodvessels on the surface of the apex of the heart as congested almost to the degree of extravasation. I would not have her look at this too long.

The next day her somnambulant sleep was complete, with good lucidity. She saw that the movements of the heart were embarrassed from the congestion. In addition to the careful magnetisation I gave her a small glass of magnetised water to drink. I asked her to note the effect of it. She said, "I see that it goes to the heart; it warms and vivifies it; the heart seems enlivened by it as with a beautiful flame; it comes from the water in the stomach; oh, it is so beautiful!" &c.

A few days after, on passing into the sleep, she saw all her interior organs as those of another person, and gave particular instructions as to the magnetisations, so as to avoid complicating the condition, and to bring all the organs into orderly action.

At the next magnetisation she became still more lucid, and predicted the disappearance of her most painful symptoms. She said she saw the magnetism attracted to the suffering organs, especially the heart, which derived the force from it necessary for the rectification of its disordered state.

Unhappily, while advancing so well, she was one day overwhelmed by an exciting emotion, arising from some family trouble; this brought back many of her painful sensations. But by tranquil magnetisations and the use of magnetised water, externally as well as internally, we regained our lost ground.

Now family affairs required that she should prepare to go in a few days to Lausanne (Switzerland). In the somnambulant sleep she saw that I could continue the magnetisation at distance. In order to test this I arranged with her husband that at a precise hour in the evening I would, from my home, magnetise her in their hotel apartment. At the hour fixed I directed my will towards her with the intention of bringing on the sleep; at first I acted strongly, then gently; then I addressed certain mental questions to her. At the end of fifteen minutes I willed her to awake, making the corresponding passes as if present before her. At my next visit the husband told me that at the time agreed upon she spoke of me, seemed vexed, and presently fell upon a couch in the magnetic sleep. I had previously placed the husband in magnetic rapport with her. When he spoke to her she expressed vexation with me for magnetising her without giving her notice, said that she saw me and my thoughts, and apparently gave answers to questions put to her by some one in the room whom he did not see; he handed these answers to me in writing, and they were in conformity with the questions I had put at distance.

Her vexation with me remained, although she continued to amend. She wished me to magnetise her at distance when she arrived at Lausanne, but I was not to will her into the sleep. She said that magnetism had saved her life, and that it would radically cure her.

Pain in the right shoulder and weakness of the spine were still present; for these I magnetised with warm breathings followed by downward passes. While so operating, her hand became hot. She said, in the sleep, that she saw a dark vapour pass down the arm and off from the finger-tips; her hand was hot to the touch. From this emanation I was careful to free myself, lest it might affect other patients; and I recommended the husband, who was present, to keep at a little distance.

I magnetised her at distance while she was at Lausanne, a fortnight, and while she was there I, being in Paris, made three experiments in mental questioning, and obtained answers through another somnambulant, whom I caused to mentally travel thither. These experiments were very satisfactory. I made another experiment when she returned to Paris, but still at distance, to satisfy some inquirers; but they spoiled it through their not being content with being only observers. In such experiments observers should observe passively.

I magnetised Madame Durieu from day to day until the end of the seventh week of the treatment, when I ceased, because her health was perfect, and it keeps so.

DREAMS.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I see you are giving something about dreams. Let me relate one to you which occurred three years ago. A friend of mine whom I have seen this morning, dreamed that he was walking along a lane; that there was a shed upon an embankment, and some nettles growing at the foot of the wall of the shed; that there was a dog burrowing amongst the nettles; that he went to see what it was doing there, and found it to be a rabbit hole, and he went into the shed and made a hole inside in a line with the hole outside, and found three rabbits in it. After taking them out he killed them, and left them until he came to tell me, and ask me if I thought it right to take them away. This ended the dream.

The next day he was taking a walk, not thinking anything about the dream; and he was going past the said shed and found the dog as dreamed, and the idea struck him that he would go into the shed and see if there was a hole through the foundations of the wall; and he dug a hole and found three rabbits as dreamed, and after killing them he left them, thinking perhaps he had done wrong, and he thought he would ask me about the matter; and strange to say I was going out for a walk and met him, so the dream was fulfilled.

I consider this something strange, as the rabbits could not, and if they had the power they would not, have impressed him with the dream, to take their life; but I should like the opinion of others upon the matter.

Since that time my friend has with myself been impressed, and we could tell you some strange things we have done by attending to these impressions. I myself have gone sixty and seventy miles by advice of supernatural intelligences and have never been deceived yet. Your journal must be of great service to learned men, but I and my friend are illiterate.—Yours truly

North Ferriby,
January 16th, 1883.

PROGRESS IN FRANCE.—Dr. Dumont lately read a paper upon "Vital Magnetism," before the Société de Médecin, of Nancy, and demonstrated his propositions by the re-active aid of four sensitives. This is a remarkable indication of progress, for had merely a proposition to do so been made only a few years ago it would have raised a storm. Satisfaction at the change was increased on learning that the Society requested Dr. Dumont to prepare his communication and demonstrations for publication, with other papers, in its annual report.—Journal du Magnétisme.

OF THE NEED OF A SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

The accompanying case of thought-transference merging into so-called "clairvoyance," reached me in 1877 from a literary gentleman living in the North of England. It must stand on its own merits, and each reader will attach that value to the narrative which he thinks it is worth. Like the one I gave in the last number of "LIGHT," it is simply an illustration of the need for further inquiry into these phenomena, and therefore of the value of a Society for Psychical Research.

CASE II.

THOUGHT-TRANSCERENCE AND CLAIRVOYANCE.

In November, 1874, I paid a visit to a lady named F., at her residence in London. I had heard that this lady while in a state of trance was possessed of certain occult power, and my visit was made for the purpose of ascertaining what truth (if any) there was in this statement. When the appointment was made my surname and the name of the town from which I came were given to the lady, as I was a stranger to her.

I purposely dressed myself in a blue pen-jacket, dark trousers and low crowned hat, and also had a huge "muffler" round my neck, giving myself the appearance of a sea-faring man, or it might have been guessed that I was a gold digger who had returned from Australia. The town from which I came had a population of some 200,000, so that the information vouchsafed to Miss F., viz., my surname and the town to which I belonged, could have given her no clue to my identity.

On calling to keep my appointment I was received by Miss F., a middle-aged lady, apparently about forty years of age, medium height, slight in build, pitted with traces of small-pox, and possessing a highly nervous organisation.

She sat in a chair and I sat opposite with one of my hands in hers. After sitting about a minute, she had slight nervous shakings, and passed apparently into a comatose state. She then began to talk to me, much as a person speaks while asleep, with the pretension that I was spoken to by a spirit called Annie. For some five minutes I was amused, as what I was told was very much the same sort of thing that "fortune tellers" are in the habit of uttering to people who visit them, viz., a few guesses and much nonsense. At last she said, "What is this I see? It is like a bookseller's shop, and it is not a bookseller's shop." I remained quite silent and she went on for a minute more with some unintelligible jabber. Then she nudged again, about the bookseller's shop and not a bookseller's shop, and began to describe the place she saw. Her description was sufficiently clear to let me know that she was describing my place of business. She then came back to her original description—"It is like a bookseller's shop and it is not a bookseller's shop. What is it? Ah, it's a newspaper office, isn't it?" Involuntarily a murmur of assent was given by me. She then said, "You are the manager of the—(a newspaper) office." I assented. During the course of my sitting with Miss F. she told me much that was known to no other person than myself, my intentions in life, the nature of my relations with sundry persons, the names of some of them being given. She also described the house in which I lived and its surroundings and seemed to trace the whole of my life by describing, so that I recognised them, most of the houses I had lived in since I was a child. She described accurately the appearance of my wife, and also her state of health.

After speaking of my household with a familiarity and accuracy which surprised me, she said, "Ah, you are thinking of buying a piece of land at the back of your house." Said I, "Should you advise me?" She answered, "Yes." Curiously enough, at that time I had just opened negotiations for the purpose of purchasing a piece of land situate immediately behind my house, and the negotiations resulted in my becoming the owner of it. There was much more in my interview with Miss F. which impressed me as relating to matters personal, but the whole of it, except in one instance, could be accounted for on the theory that some persons, in an abnormal condition, possess the power of reading the mind of another person. The instance to which I refer was, however, so striking, and was given with such minute detail, as to render this explanation of the phenomena unacceptable to me. I shall, therefore, describe it. When near the end of the séance, Miss F. (or rather, the supposed spirit Annie) said, "Will you carry a message from me to your friend A.?" She had previously spoken much to me of this friend, described him accurately, mentioned the circumstance of a death having occurred in his family, and the proceedings that were being taken to make certain changes in the ownership of property, consequent on the death mentioned. I replied that I would take the message. She then said, "There is an old secretaire which stands in the hall. If A. searches, he will find among some old papers a document which will be of great service to him in arranging the property. It is not essential. He could manage without it. But it will help him very much."

I did not fulfil my promise, because my friend A., I knew, would have considered me a fool for bringing him information respecting his affairs from a "medium," and I thought also that perhaps he might think my mentioning matters strictly connected with his private affairs somewhat of a liberty. Some seven or eight weeks afterwards a mutual friend of A. and myself, whom I shall call B., was dining with me. B. had been much mixed up in arranging the family affairs mentioned. After dinner B. (who is a gentleman of considerable acquirements and a materialist in philosophy) and myself were indulging in metaphysical discussion. I told him that perhaps he could inform me if such a message (mentioning the one I had promised to give A.) had any probable foundation in fact. B. then said this was one of the most extraordinary things he had ever known. A., in winding-up the affairs in his hands, had had considerable difficulty with certain properties; but about a fortnight previously (that is some six weeks after my interview with Miss F.), in an old cabinet which I had correctly enough indicated to him, amongst other papers just such a document as I had described had been found, and its discovery had been serviceable in the way which I had stated. No theory of "mind-reading" in my opinion accounts for this.

So impressed was my friend B. with my narrative that he himself paid a visit to Miss F., but, as he afterwards told me, without being in any way convinced of the reality of her pretensions. Indeed, he said, had it not been for the statement I had made to him, he would have come to the conclusion that she was an impostor.

I may add that during the sitting Miss F. made many erroneous statements, and many also which, though probable, I had no means of verifying.

This and another striking narrative, which I received from Mr. Thomas Bell, of Middlesborough, induced me to visit Miss F., whose name will be recognised by most of the readers of "LIGHT," but the most complete failure followed the two or three interviews I had with her. This, however, was merely my misfortune, and in no way invalidates the testimony of other witnesses. W.F.B.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.—The Annual General Meeting of the members of the Central Association of Spiritualists, will be held on Tuesday next, at 6.30 p.m., at 38, Great Russell-street. It is very desirable that as many members as possible should attend, as the Report which will be presented by the Council will refer to matters on which it is important to have a full expression of the views of the members. The names of the new Council will also be submitted, but no voting papers will be necessary as the number of candidates does not, we hear, exceed the number to be elected.

THEOSOPHIC TEACHINGS.

Among the misconceptions about these doctrines which I should like to stamp out at once and for ever is the persistent impression that they deny immortality to a large proportion, if not to the immense majority, of the human race. Mr. Noel refers to the extract from the book of Khieu-te, in the last November Theosophist, in justification of that impression, without one word of allusion to the long and explicit explanation appended. It is there shown that the whole question relates to the distinction between personality and individuality, and to the conditions under which the former can be perpetuated in the higher consciousness of the latter. The explanation—which I assume Mr. Noel not to have read—is far too long to be copied here, but it sufficiently disposes of an imputation which cannot be repeated in any perfectly well-informed criticism.

Readers of Mr. Noel's articles, who have no original acquaintance with the doctrines he reviews, must have received an impression that nothing is interposed in the latter between the human phenomenal personality and a quite abstract universal Being. That, however, would be wholly to suppress the above distinction, throughout so strongly insisted upon, between personality and individuality. I did not, perhaps, myself keep it sufficiently in view in my article on "The Spiritual Ego." But I deny that I there identified the noumenon with a blank universal. I said that it was not the individual consciousness, the self that is known in consciousness. We may conceive the seventh principle—Spirit—as a formative Divine idea, and thus as a special and particular energy of the Universal, and as object in universal consciousness. But it is not a subject for consciousness till it becomes such as the sixth principle, the spiritual Ego. That is the individuality constructed by it. And this is where we are really at issue with Mr. Noel. In his view, mere personal consciousness is itself the guarantee of an immortal individuality. And that would be so if the synthetic unity of apperception, which all personality, and even all sentence, imply, were referable only to the direct energy of Divine Spirit. But the Astral Spirit also individualises by action on the material subject to it. As in the Divine, so in this: the individual is the mode of action, and the resulting modality of consciousness. It is urged that the Divine is in the Astral as its deeper life and being. Granted. All Occult philosophy asserts an exact correspondence and similitude between the macrocosm and the microcosm, the universal and the individual. And if we find in the individual a dual consciousness, spiritual and astral, we should infer the same division in the universal consciousness. But individualisation in the astral precedes individualisation in the Divine order. If we conceive the astral personalities as modes, localisations, as it were, of the astral universal consciousness, we see that they must be as transient in their nature as the sensation which for a moment or an hour fixes an animal consciousness at any point of its body. For, thus regarded, the synthetic unity of the "person" is no more than a particular act of attention by the universal. Withdraw that, and the conscious personality is no more. It is absorbed by, one with, the larger consciousness of which, as personal manifestation, it was a special and particular direction. For in the astral order, as in the Divine, the true self has all the time been, not the modal personality, but the universal. But here, again, we must not leap at once to the highest and most comprehensive universal in this order any more than in that above it, but find the unities within unities, or monads within monads, to which I expressly referred in a former article, though Mr. Noel writes as if I had omitted all recognition of them.* The first and subsequent identifications, on sublation of the individual mode, would thus not be with the true universal, but with its included and subordinate unities. It is by rising into this higher and more total consciousness that some attain to those transcendent faculties which to the individual seem miraculous, but which still belong only to the astral order, though to a more comprehensive consciousness in that order. That, I understand, is the meaning of Samadhi. And I quite admit that we should be cautious in attributing knowledge of Divine things to those who can give us, from such experience, even the truest and most magnificent expositions of what happens in the astral region. But I do not conceive that these teachers of ours, who so expressly recognise the dual consciousness in the microcosm, can be ignorant of its correspondence in the macrocosm.

Our difference with Mr. Noel, therefore, seems to be this.

* I may also refer to a more explicit, though still very brief, statement in my article entitled "Soul-Substance," in the Psychological Review of last November.

He makes the astral mode, or phenomenal personality, a mode of Divine Spirit. Not only does the latter come to individual consciousness in the former—that we both admit—but it is the very individual unity or being of the former and without it could be no consciousness at all. But how, I ask, can the Divine idea be conceived as subject till it has a manifestation of its own in consciousness—I do not mean a developed manifestation, but at least a germinal one? Conceive the astral personality as the matrix, and you have another beautiful application of natural laws and analogies in these teachings. The generation of the spiritual Ego—the true individual—is the result of two principles. But the matrix is there before its impregnation by the Divine Spirit. I must repeat that it is a question of consciousness. "Precisely," says Mr. Noel, "it is just that, but consciousness of what? Why, of the fact, of the truth, that the spirit, and all which the word connotes, all its attributes, Love, Righteousness, Insight, are the substance and truth of us, at the root of our being, as of all being." And then Mr. Noel rises, or falls, into a little invective. But what if I have not the consciousness of all these fine things as at the root of my being; nay, not even as principles to which I have any affinity whatever? Wait, says Mr. Noel, it is in process of evolution. The one Divine humanity works in all its members, and will atone all. Yes, I know,

"Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small; Though with patience He stands waiting, with exactness grinds He all."

But meanwhile, what conserves the personal consciousness of man, and yet could not, would not, or did not conserve the transient individual modes through which, according to the evolution theory, he has passed, or from which he has emerged? How is this more precious or more permanent than these, save in the capacity for direct, that is, conscious manifestation of spirit, and of the "Love, Righteousness, and Insight" thereof? Capacity for a spiritual, therefore an immortal consciousness. But we may remember the words, "Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken," &c., and "My spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh." That "out of these stones God can raise up children of Abraham," is a grand statement of the possibilities of evolution. But meanwhile, the stone yields to the friction of wave and rain drop. Man is more proximate to his atonement, but it is the atonement, not the capacity for it, that immortalises. Hard as it is to believe our own Scriptures when they conflict with our preconceptions, it may nevertheless be true that "the spirit returns to God who gave it," or in the language of these later teachings, that "the true spirit severs itself, and passes away elsewhere."

The "inconsistency" which Mr. Noel imagines "in the Occultist camp" is not there at all. Surely it is the strangest perversion of our meaning to infer that the person, as such, is immortal because we say that his true being is not his personality but the universal of which that is only a transient mode. If I say of a chair or table that its substance is matter, do I therefore say that the chair, or table, as such, is indestructible? And does the identity of every particular living organism, as such, consist in the manifold riches of nature and spirit? These, it is true, are immanent, but they belong to the substance and not to the mode. But when the mode becomes, as in a human being, so high an expression of the universal, such a synthesis of its powers, that all that is latent in that can be individualised, the Divine becomes a proximate degree of life, though till actually evolved it is not the very individual. We must conceive the Divine as immanent in the astral and elementary, and so it may be said to be as much in a plant, or in a beast, as in a man. But it is not the individuality of the plant quâ plant, or of the beast quâ beast; nor is it the human personality. To find in it before conscious realisation, before that quickening which has been called the "spiritual Ego," a ground of individual immortality would be utterly to misconceive and pervert it. Each degree of life before it is consciously evolved belongs not to that which is already explicit or individual, but to that which is already implicit or individual, but to that which is at once deeper and higher. It is necessary, but not enough, to conceive spirit as immanent: we must also regard it as transcendent, or "over-shadowing." For the evolution or liberation of the interior degree can only be effected by the presence and action of that degree as a power of conversion. Now I conceive the process of Divine regeneration to be exactly analogous to, nay, to be the very same as, that by which a higher organisation converts a lower, or the inorganic, to itself. Neither could this happen by the mere power of the higher principle unless it found itself in the lower (but not yet differentiated therein), nor could this principle, immanent in the lower, ever emerge to light and energy unless elicited—eroked as it were—by sympathetic compulsion from above. It is the angel who opens the prison door to Peter, the voice which cries "Lazarus, come forth!" This is the "Great Work" of the old alchemists, who did really, I believe, obtain gold and silver from the baser metals, but who also used their chemical terminology to denote the spiritual and transcendental process for those who could understand.* In one of his most powerful essays, Mr. James Martineau has also insisted strongly on this principle as essential to a true conception of evolution.

To Mr. Noel, consciousness is the ultimate all-comprehensive fact; and he would find an echo of his sentiments in the letter on "A Personal or Impersonal God?" by Mr. Haughton, in the last number of "LIGHT." To him, and I suppose to the latter gentleman also, the "Abyss" or "Unground," of Böhmie, Being, and "the One" of Plato† are mere abstractions of our poor little minds. Yet how resolve what is in that case a contradiction, that behind the manifestation of Self, Divine or human, in consciousness, must be the Self that is manifested? Even if we admit that the One Being must be perfectly self-conscious, that does not rid us of the fact that the Being is, and that its consciousness is but the reflection, the objective presentation of its subjective truth. Consciousness is not being, is not even energy; it is phenomenon only. And how does the attribution of consciousness make Order, Goodness, and Will, as principles, more intelligible to us? We do not explain them, it is true, by calling them principles; but we explain them, if possible, still less by calling them principles of which we are conscious. For my own part, I should feel more secure, more happy, in believing that "God is Love, yea, very Love," than in believing merely that He is a Person who loves. If you tell me it is His nature to love, then, I reply, it is that nature I adore, not a consciousness of it which is not mine. And I believe that that nature will respond to my adoration, and so responding will make the consciousness mine indeed. It has been well and profoundly said that we cannot know God, but only our God. And that is why God to the worshipper will be always personal. His personality is His relation to us.

Mr. Noel's latest postscript on the "shell" proceeds on a mistaken supposition. It is not at all to be regarded as a diabolical residuum. On the contrary, it is as faithful a representation of the whole man as such a form or body can be. And guided by the analogy of the physical shell which we undoubtedly do cast off, I do not believe Mr. Noel would have made so much difficulty about it, had he not started with the erroneous conception that in a state of animation it was described as a quite distinct individual. I venture to think he has not sufficiently appreciated the facts and possibilities of the dual consciousness, by which statements apparently to this effect are explained. And no doubt it is in this condition of partial, or semi-consciousness that the best "tests of identity" are given. But the possible and asserted fact remains that the mere psychic or astral corpse may receive temporary life from mediumistic rapport, and be moved to speech and action according to its wont.

In the foregoing I trust I have succeeded in removing some misconceptions; but I must again warn readers against fixing the responsibility of my expositions upon a system of which we as yet possess only the initial "Fragments."

Since writing the above, I have received from Mr. Arthur Lillie, the author of "Buddha and Early Buddhism," the following letter, which I have permission to publish. Mr. Noel having given a list of authorities in favour of Dr. Rhys Davids' view of the Buddhist "Skandhas," or "Khandas," a subject which rather perplexed myself, I asked Mr. Lillie for a succinct statement of the result of his own studies upon it, having placed Mr. Noel's article in "LIGHT" of December 23rd before him.

C. C. M.

With regard to the identity of the views of Dr. Rhys Davids on the Buddhist doctrine of Karma and the Skandhas with those of "Burnouf, St. Hilaire, Childers, Spence Hardy, &c.," I think he differs with them all. His theory of Karma is that the individual A is annihilated at death, and that the individual B takes up the fruit of A's good or bad deeds, and that B hands his on to C, and so on. I do not think any student of Buddhism can endorse this.

Childers writes thus: "When a man dies the Khandas of which he is constituted perish; but by the force of his Karma a new set of Khandas instantly starts into existence, and a new being appears in another world, who though possessing different Khandas and a different form, is in reality identical with the man who has just passed away." Childers states also that "The inhabitants of the four Formless Brahma Heavens do not possess the first Khandas (form) at all."* As in the Ceylon Cosmology three heavens have to be traversed after the Bodhi, or emancipation, before these Formless Heavens are reached, this disposes of many popular essays about Nirvana. Scholars differ as to what the Five Skandhas really mean. Burnouf calls them the "intellectual attributes";† Schröter (Bhotenta Dictionary), the "five bodies"; Judson (Birman Dictionary), the "living animal." As opposing the teaching of Dr. Rhys Davids, the following passages may be consulted: Spence Hardy, Manual, p. 463; Colebrook, Essays, Vol. I, p. 397; Hodgson, pp. 44, 45; Beal, Romantic History, p. x.; Oldenberg, Buddha, p. 48.—Yours sincerely,

ARTHUR LILLIE.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

The first annual meeting of the members of this Society was held on the 19th inst., at their rooms, 14, Dean's-yard, Westminster, Professor W. F. Barrett presiding.

The Secretary read a brief report of the Council for the past year, giving an encouraging account of the short history of the Society so far. A second part of the Proceedings of the Society will shortly be published, which will contain the substance of the Reports laid before the General Meeting held in December last. Some exceedingly interesting series of experiments have also been made since that date.

The Society numbered 150 at the close of 1882, but there have been a considerable number of additions since the beginning of the present year.

A financial statement was presented shewing that £216 had been received in subscriptions and donations, of which about £200 had been expended in the work of the Society. The Report and statement will be circulated among the members.

Some modifications of the Constitution and Rules were passed by the meeting, and elections were made on the Council to fill the places of members retiring by rotation.

The governing body as at present constituted stands as follows:—

PRESIDENT.

HENRY SIDGWICK, Esq., Trinity College, Cambridge.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

Arthur J. Balfour, Esq., M.P., 4, Carlton Gardens, S.W.

W. F. Barrett, Esq., F.R.S.E., 18, Belgrave Square, Monkstown, Dublin.

John R. Hollond, Esq., M.P., 57, Lancaster Gate, London, W.

Richard H. Hutton, Esq., Englefield Green, Staines.

THE HIMALAYAN SLOPES.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In "Notes by the Way" of January 6th, I find the following words:—"There is something curiously, startlingly grotesque in the notion of these mysterious unknowns sitting aloft on a Himalayan slope, secure in the possession of absolute truth, which of itself and necessarily kills all the various forms of error that the world busies itself with, while Christian and Brahmin, Mahomedan, Jew, and the rest of us play our little farces, and fancy that we have a revelation from God and a moral code that is not worthless."

The satire conveyed in the beginning of this paragraph sufficiently proves the mental attitude of the writer towards the "unknowns" he thus ludicrously depicts—utter denial and disbelief, not, possibly, of the existence of the body of men to whom such extraordinary powers and attainments are attributed, but of their right to have such possessions assigned to them. But leaving on one side the simple proposition that there are certain advanced minds on this earth who have pierced through the clouds of error arising from ignorant fanaticism, and ascended into the light of absolute and "positive truth," and are, therefore, able to shew the way to others following after them, I would inquire of the writer of this paragraph if he thinks that in the "revelations" which the Christian, Brahmin, Mahomedan, and Jew, believe that they "have from God," all truth is exhausted? Will he not admit (for he has an enlightened mind) that the higher man spiritually ascends, and the more he learns, the broader truth becomes, the aspect it wore to him upon a lower plane appearing completely changed? He has, doubtless, proved this scores of times, even in the short span allotted to him, as all of us, more or less, have, for this is the age of progress—of iconoclasm; when, advancing into the broader light of the higher spiritual truths, we recognise that we have been worshippers of idols, the appearances truth wore to our less advanced minds; and we put aside our beloved idols, sometimes sorrowfully and with pain, but, nevertheless, they are put aside, because there no longer remains any reasonable ground for belief. Some of us who have been "converted" from the false dogmas into which we were educated—to which we clung, as it were, for very life—have experienced an utter agony of soul before we could relinquish the ideas and convictions which for years had been the sources of the highest spiritual happiness and comfort; our reason, in the strong light of incontrovertible truth, demanding relentlessly the relinquishment of those soft pillows of an ignorant childhood for the more reliable rest afforded by the immutable rock of absolute truth.

It is an everlasting comfort to know that man, if he lifts himself, can rise into the light of absolute and immutable truth: that error becomes an impossibility for him, and that he may attain the end of existence, whilst still upon the most material of all planes of life, for he then transcends matter, the merely physical animal life and all its illusions; he annihilates, in the supremacy of a Divine intelligence, for himself, time, space, and death, and knows himself immortal and eternal—Brahm. For this he needs no dogmas of man, but that pure, unflinching, unblemished light of divinity in humanity, which has shone athwart the dark cloud of the ages from the lives of the noble sons of God who have attained it, in the midst of whom the Divine Jesus stands out supreme, and of whom, without doubt, are these Sages of the East depicted as "sitting aloft on a Himalayan slope." All these shining lights of the past were "initiated adepts," and when we use those words we may bow our heads in deepest reverence.

The "revelations" which "Christian, Brahmin, Mahomedan, Jew, fancy they have from God," contain in their very heart and core truth that is immutable, but overlaid by so much of error that its eternal light is for the time quenched. It is only knowledge which can enable each man for himself to remove the clinging dross of error from his hidden diamond, and liberate the quenched rays lying latent in its heart. But this knowledge is not to be gained by reclining indolently and at ease, in a mental condition of dolce far niente, beneath the comfortable shadow of a crumbling wall of old church doctrines. The traveller must move on, and as he advances, behind him must inevitably sink into insignificance the objects which rivetted his mental gaze in the earlier hours of his journey, whilst objects now at hand assume their true proportions, and in the distance he perceives the goal he set forth on his journey to reach, and that it is entirely different from what, in his ignorance, he had supposed it to be. His former persuasions, from ignorance of the truth, are not to him, however, like the playing of a "little farce," but those most earnest steps of a toiling childhood of mental development in which his soul made equally as strenuous efforts to reach the truth as he now makes in the enlightened manhood of his spiritual growth. Is not this a more correct view of the real state of affairs than that depicted by the writer of the paragraph I have quoted above?

True religion can never be destroyed, but the falsities which overlay it must perish. It would take a man a lifetime, perhaps, to strip off one by one the grotesque garments which have been manufactured by men to drape around and hide the beautiful proportions of the pure truth; but no man becomes truly divine who does not engage in this work, at whatever cost to himself. He cannot penetrate the depths of his own interior being, and find and know the God within, whilst he retains, as holy, one of the old rags of doctrines which are called "religious beliefs," but which are, more properly speaking, "false persuasions." We have only to draw a comparison between ourselves and others to feel the force of these words. Looking into the doctrines of Churches, we find, for example, the dogma of the Atonement taught in its gross, literal, and material form, excessively repellant to our more enlightened and spiritual conceptions, for we have divested it of the old rags of an external rendering, and perceive its esoteric meanings. Had we lived a hundred years ago, it is probable we should not have been able to receive this esoteric meaning, but would have died, as hundreds of good people then did, still chained by the old false teaching of eternal damnation for all who did not embrace this "religious belief."

Life is progressive; the human race advances—it is its destiny; and knowledge must inevitably correct the errors of ignorance. Thus what we to-day believe to be true, to-morrow we may know is false. A hundred years hence the human race will stand upon higher eminences of knowledge, and many of the Christian, Brahminical, Mahomedan, and Jewish errors of to-day will have disappeared into the obscurity of the past.

All false dogmas are doomed to be deserted and left behind by each man as he becomes freed by the truth, for there is the one and the positive truth which is the heritage of man, which he may possess if he will. That truth will most certainly destroy all former errors of belief or persuasion. It was possessed by Jesus, who in the hidden meaning of His words indubitably pointed the way to the "Himalayan slopes," for He was of our "brethren the prophets"—i.e., an Initiated Adept of the Essene schools, and truly a Son of God.

THE DOMESTIC GHOST.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In Mr. Spicer's account of the ghost seen by Mrs. C. Dering, in your last number of "LIGHT," a wrong date (1865) is given, which takes from its interest. You will observe in the account given in Hutchins, that the ghost foretold great calamities affecting this country.

I heard the story from Mrs. C. Dering not later than 1853; I believe in the early part of that year, about a week after she had seen the apparition.

Some years after, in speaking of it to me, she said, "I wonder why the old man came to me," and I reminded her of the war that followed his appearance, and of the death of her brother, Colonel Yea, in the attack on the Redan.

I have extracted the story given in Hutchins, which differs in some details from Mr. Spicer's version.—Yours faithfully,

LUCIA C. STONE.

Walditch, Bridport, Dorset,
January 22nd.

"After the particular account of Mr. Sadler, as in works of this kind even marvellous relations are not unprecedented, which are inserted with a view, perhaps, of relieving the reader, the following prophecy, though it rests entirely on the credit of Cuthbert Bound, may be not improperly introduced.

"This gentleman being (the year after the Restoration) under some distemper of mind, kept his chamber, and had his servant, one Thomas Grey, of the same place (Warrwell) to attend him there; and I, Cuthbert Bound, minister of the parish, coming to visit him, found him sitting up in his bed, his wife and servant being with him. He caused his wife presently to depart, and the door to be shut, and made his man to come to one side of the bed, and myself on the other; and looking steadfastly towards the end of the room, asked whether we saw nobody, or heard any voice; we answered him that we neither saw nor heard anything, but persuaded him to lie down and take his rest; he bid us be quiet, for there was a man who had great things to tell him, and spoke so loud that he did wonder that we did not hear him, and presently ordered his man to fetch his pen, ink, and paper; and looking towards the place where the man stood, he began to write, and so wrote on, as if the man did still dictate to him, and every now and then would be asking whether it were so or not; and after he had ended the matter he read the paper distinctly twice over, and at the end asked whether he had written true, and then caused us to set our hands to the paper, saying he would not be gone till he saw that done; and when he had done it, he said, 'Now he is gone,' meaning the man he had told us of. What he related to us was as followeth:—

"That there would die in the city of London so many thousands, mentioning the number, which I have forgotten, and the time; that the city would be burnt down great part of it; and that he saw St. Paul's tumbled down as if beaten down with great guns.

"That we should have three sea-fights with the Dutch, and that there would appear three blazing stars, and that the last would be terrible to behold.

"That afterwards there would come three small ships to land to the west of Weymouth that would put all England into an uproar, but it would come to nothing; that in the year 1688 there would come to pass such a thing in this kingdom that all the world would take notice of; that after this there would come good times; and that I should live to see all these things come to pass, but that he and his man should die; and farther, that some wonderful thing would come to pass afterwards, which he was not to make known; that he should be able to go abroad the next day, and there would come three men to see him, one from Ireland, one from Jersey, and his brother Bingham, who did certainly come as he had told us; and I saw him walking early in the morning the next day in his ground.

"Upon the report of this, his man, Thomas Grey, and myself were sent for before the deputy-lieutenant of the county, and made affidavit of the truth of this before Colonel Strangeways, Colonel Coker, and many others yet alive, within three or four days after he told it me."

"This narrative was communicated by the Rev. Mr. Bingham, of Pinper, from a friend, who has a copy of it, which has been long preserved in his family, signed by the above-named Outlibert Bound."—History of Dorset. By John Hutchins, 1815, Vol. iv. p. 355.

NEURIC FORCE.

In an appendix to his Essay on Radiating Neuric Force, published in the Journal du Magnétisme, Dr. Baréty says that Dr. Planat, of Paris, who interests himself in investigating this force, has demonstrated its action upon an inanimate object without the reactive intervention of a human sensitive. Dr. Planat suspends horizontally, from the centre of an inverted bell-glass, by a film of unspun silk, a piece of thin brass wire with its ends beaten out to tinsel thinness. The neuric force, passing from the pointed fingers through the bell-glass, directed to either end of the wire, and moved laterally, puts it into motion. The bell-glass stands upon a graduated disc to enable the difference of the force in different individuals to be marked. Dr. Planat ingeniously contrived to fill the bell-glass with water and obtained the same result.

Dr. Leger, a French physician, constructed here in London, many years ago, a somewhat similar apparatus, which he called a magnetoscope. Mr. Rutter, of Brighton, also constructed one. Mr. Thomas Slater, formerly of Euston-road, now of Bayswater, made many apparatus similar to those of Leger, and having abundance of nerve-force easily demonstrated their use.

The late Mr. Wallington, a potent mesmeriser, assured me that a new knife, worn in his pocket for a short time, acquired the property of attracting needles.

The radiating neuric force varies much in individuals. It must be from having it abundantly that some are good magnetisers or mesmerisers. M. Adolphe Didier is well-known as a strong curative mesmeriser, and I have seen the needle of a compass strongly deflected by the force from his fingers pointing at it. A fact like this should interest all students of psychical phenomena. J. DIXON.

PREMONITIONS OF DEATH.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I cannot tell you how interested I feel in reading "LIGHT," which a gentleman kindly lends to me. An article, "Premonitions of Death," brings to my mind the death of my own dear sister, Elizabeth Wilkins, who lived in service at a Mr. Pedley's, at Highworth, Wilts. We had a brother James then dying of decline at Stratton St. Margaret's, four miles from Highworth. A week before he died Elizabeth came over to see him and take her farewell of him. When she was leaving me she grasped my hand very tight and said, "Try and meet James in Heaven, my dear girl; he is drawing very near eternity, but I have a strong presentiment I shall go first." I said, "How foolish you talk!" She said, "You may think so, but I feel it." She said, "Good-bye, meet us in Heaven." That was on the 29th March, 1855; and on April 4th my brother died, at nine o'clock in the morning. I wrote a note to Elizabeth, telling her of it. Seeing a woman who came from Highworth, I asked her to take it to my sister. She looked with great pity at me, as I was in a very weak state, just got on crutches after losing my leg. She kindly put her arm around me to keep me from falling, and then said, "My dear child, I am come to tell you your sister died last night at five o'clock. She took a cold; they advised her to go to bed, and they would send her up a cup of tea; and when the woman went to her she was dead." So you see, dear sir, she died on the 3rd April and my brother on the 4th; but before either of them died, I dreamed I sent the note by a mason to say my brother was dead, and in the morning I thought he brought it back to me and said, "She is gone." They were both buried in one grave.

A person living at Stratton St. Margaret's died of typhus fever. Her name was Jane Darter. She had a daughter at service six miles away. The day she died she began calling her girl in the morning and continued, "Elizabeth! Betsy!" all day. She was so weary, and at night she said, "If you won't come, I cannot call any longer;" and fell back dead. In the morning the poor girl came home to see if anything was the matter with her mother, for all the day before, go where she would, her mother kept calling, "Elizabeth! Betsy!" and at night she said, "If you won't come, I cannot call any longer." I was with the mother all that day, and I heard the girl tell her sad tale when she came. Being the fever, they did not send to tell the girl her mother was ill, which was a great grief to her. Please excuse me for troubling you with this, but I thought I should like to tell you.—From your humble servant,

ANNE BARNES.

Middle Cowley, near Oxford.

[The gentleman who lends "LIGHT" to Mrs. Barnes assures us that though she is a poor and uneducated person, he can speak in the highest terms of her intelligence, respectability, and veracity.—ED. "LIGHT."]

"A STRANGE PHENOMENON."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The following letter appeared in the Eastern Daily Press (Norwich) on January 13th.

STRANGE PHENOMENON.

To the Editor.

SIR,—Can some of your readers explain the following? Last evening I had been to see a sick friend, and left at ten o'clock. At about 10.30 I was passing a churchyard about two miles from the city, and noticed a light in the churchyard. As the gate was fastened, I scaled the wall and walked towards the light, when it moved on, waving slightly, as a flame would. The light was of a phosphorescent colour, and was about 5ft. in height and an irregular width of about 18in. It moved slowly across the graves with a sliding motion, in an easterly direction, towards the wind, which showed it was not an ignis fatuus. It disappeared near a yew fence. I am not afraid of ghosts, though I believe in them. I enclose my name and address, which I shall be happy to give, together with full particulars, to any curious reader.—I am, sir, yours truly,

BELIEVER.

January 11th, 1883.

Having read with interest the articles in "LIGHT" relating to supposed appearances of the ignis fatuus, I was glad to avail myself of the opportunity of obtaining particulars of a similar phenomenon from an eye witness, and at once sought an introduction with the following results:—

On Wednesday, January 10th, 1883, Mr. H. Herbert Wells, of Rose Lodge, Old Catton, a village about two miles from Norwich, was returning from a visit to a sick person, who resided quite on the other side of the city, and whose house he left at ten p.m. The night was dark, and a strong wind was blowing from the east. While passing Old Catton Church, at 10.30, he observed in the churchyard, by the tower, a luminous appearance, perfectly motionless, unaffected by the wind, and looking like a human figure wrapped in a blanket. Finding the gate fastened, Mr. Wells scaled the low wall which skirts the churchyard next the road, and approached the object. When about two yards distant it slowly moved away over the graves towards the north-east corner of the churchyard, where it disappeared by a yew fence, which forms the boundary on that side. The light was about the colour emitted by luminous paint, and was so transparent that the gravestones could be seen through it.

It is rather singular that on January 10th, 1882 (exactly twelve months before), Mr. Wells lost a very dear friend who had been like a mother to him. On the night of the same evening that she died, Mr. Wells was awake (one ought to have said the morning of the 11th as it was between one and two o'clock) by a light shining in his room and saw sitting in a chair, at the foot of the bed, his friend as she appeared in life. He spoke, but received no answer and the light died away, leaving the room in darkness. He assured me, upon my suggesting it, that it was a distinctly different experience from a dream.

This incident had escaped his memory, until upon relating the churchyard episode to one of the members of his family he was reminded of it. The friend was buried in the cemetery three or four miles from Catton.

Two or three other stories of interest, personal experiences which he related to me, I will not trouble you with now.

I have Mr. Wells's permission to use his name in full.

Yours obediently,

Distillery-street, Norwich.

GEO. A. KING.

CONCERT AND BALL.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to draw the attention of your readers, for the last time, to the announcement of the concert and ball to be held on the 31st inst.? The programme is not complete but promises to be a good one, as I have received very cordial support from several artists who have so readily promised their very valuable services.

There is every reason to believe that it will be a reunion of a very genial and hearty character, many very old friends having expressed their intention of being with us.

Trusting that it will also be a pecuniary success for the sake of your excellent paper,—I remain, yours faithfully,

FRANK EVERITT.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL.

14, NEWMAN-STREET, OXFORD-STREET, LONDON.

The third religious service of the series recently inaugurated by the Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum at this hall, was held on Sunday last, and was the occasion of the first appearance there of Mr. J. J. Morse as lecturer, the special subject being: "The Spiritual Platform: its Place and Work To-day." There was an encouragingly large and appreciative audience, and the question raised was treated in the comprehensive and masterful manner characteristic of Mr. Morse's control. Sufficient justification for the introduction of the subject was found in the necessity of reviewing occasionally our resources and methods, as Spiritualists, if we would wrestle successfully with the errors, and crimes, and troubles of the world, and courageously grapple with the advancing forces of materialism. Spiritualism is not a toy nor a plaything, but means hard work, and plenty of it, when regarded as the source of our assurance of immortality, of the universal relationship of souls, or intercommunion of spirits; and of the common inheritance, in greater or less degree of us all, of present inspiration; because those who accept such truths must be aggressive, and make of them a living, vitalising thing, and themselves reflect that the good reached to-day is but a stepping-stone for a further advance to-morrow. Whenever spirits operate—and they are very active—they need human agency. We have power indeed to raise ourselves, but if we trust them, a basis of co-operation is formed of immense value. Our platform should be distinctly spiritual, and enunciate fearlessly the highest conceptions of our faith. We shall thus earn a place as workers for good, and for the promotion of truth, honesty, and virtue—a combination of qualities constituting a force which is a remedy. The legal, the political, the religious, and the medical sections of society may assail us; we must not succumb, nor fail to cultivate the advantage of organisation. Spiritualism has much to say upon every branch of life here, and when its psychical teachings are better understood our madhouses will be closed, and the services to Humanity of our healing mediums will be generally recognised and extended. There is a gospel of individual responsibility; we must each bear the consequences of individual life. With the cultivation of the intellect comes intellectual freedom; the sweeter and better being is developed, and a moral position is eventually established which secures true happiness because based on righteous work. The spiritual platform has, truly enough, much to do in educating Spiritualists themselves, who have usually to unlearn and put aside many obstinate prepossessions before they can even approach sympathetically its searching teachings. But propaganda work is urgent too; while the individual must be cultivated, the outside world, in the mass, must be vigorously and intelligently approached. We are thus, or should be, both defensive and aggressive in action; but while earnestly clinging to proved truth, we are too comprehensive to be sectarian. When we thus boldly face our whole duty, encourage the hearts that burn and the souls that aspire, help the distressed, and raise the fallen, and remember that even apparent temporary failure in any direction of our efforts should but nerve us to fresh exertions, the recognition and the powerful co-operation of the spiritual hosts will be always available for our support.—The address was so full of practical suggestion and distinguished by such terse and effective language that any selection of its points must fail to convey a fair appreciation of its merits.

On Sunday next, the 28th inst., the burning question of Immortality will be specifically raised, and its miraculous or sequential character investigated.

BELPER.

On Sunday last Mrs. Britten delivered an address in the morning in Mr. W. P. Adshead's Lecture Room, on "The Soul of Things." The discourse was one of the best that Mrs. Britten has delivered in Belper, which is saying a very great deal. The audience was a thoroughly appreciative one, and doubtless seed was sown which will bear fruit in after time. In the evening Mrs. Britten occupied the platform in the small public hall, which was densely packed, scores being unable to obtain admission. It had been announced that the subject would be chosen by the audience. About forty subjects were sent up to the chairman from which he selected six, Mrs. Britten afterwards speaking about ten minutes on each subject. Taken altogether this may be regarded as the most satisfactory meeting ever held in Belper. At the close an invitation was brought from the Rev. W. Dawkins and Mr. E. Smedley that Mrs. Britten would address the Blue Ribbon Army then assembled in the large public hall. To this Mrs. Britten at once assented and spoke for about three quarters of an hour. On Monday evening Mrs. Britten again occupied the platform in the large public hall; subject, "Is Spiritualism of Divine Origin?" The lecturer took the affirmative, speaking for about three quarters of an hour, and then invited discussion or expressed her readiness to answer questions bearing upon the subject. A number of questions were sent up, some of which were quite irrelevant, but the whole of which were most felicitously dealt with to the evident satisfaction of a large audience. In consequence of the indisposition of Mr. W. P. Adshead, Mr. A. Smedley very kindly and ably presided over the three meetings.

EXETER.

The Sunday meetings at the Oddfellows' Hall are usually well attended, and each week new hearers and inquirers are forthcoming. After singing and prayer an address is delivered upon the subject of "Spiritualism in its various aspects," without the formality of taking a text or selecting a topic. At each meeting literature is given away, and all sincere inquirers are invited to remain to the more private meeting—a circle following the public service. Last Sunday about fifty thus remained, arranging themselves for communion with the spiritual powers. Several mediums are being developed, and each Sunday one or another is controlled to address the congregation. Last Sunday Mr. P. was the medium. In addition to this, circles are held during the week with varied results. We have a nice little library of standard works on Spiritualism, which are being used by inquirers. At Newton St. Cyres, five miles from the city, the cause is also making considerable headway. OMEGA.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—On Sunday evening, January 14th, the new executive took their position on the platform of the N.S.E.S. Mr. H. A. Kersey occupied the chair and, after a short address from Mr. Barker, the test medium, took the opportunity of making a statement to the goodly audience present. His sole reason, he said, for taking office was to carry out the desire of the members as expressed by the very numerous signed requisition presented to him, and as far as he was concerned he had resolved to give full and free scope to the thorough ventilation of opinion which was the undeniable right of every member without let or hindrance. He hoped, further, that they would do their utmost to clear off the debt, and as far as they were concerned, to keep the society clear in future. Mr. Kersey also stated that under the peculiar circumstances of his election, having been put there by the express desire of the members, he was prepared at any time, if they thought fit, to resign back to them the position should they consider that they had others, more suitable to their tastes, to fill the office. Hereupon the whole company gave a decided expression of their satisfaction, with reliance upon Mr. Kersey's efficiency for the position.—On Sunday evening last, Mr. W. Westgarth, of Sheriff Hill, lectured in a very acceptable manner upon the subject, "If man die, shall he live again?" At the conclusion of the address Mr. Kersey announced to the members that, during this last week they had been able to reduce the debt of £34 to £10, having received donations to the extent of £24. The announcement was received with enthusiastic applause.—[I desire to correct a "printer's error" of last week, which stated that Mr. Burton was elected as one of the new committee. It should have been Mr. Ashton. Mr. Burton is not a member of the N.S.E.S.; his early and persistent protests against the conduct of the defunct executive led, as it will be remembered, to his expulsion.]

GATESHEAD.—Last Sunday evening, a gentleman at present visiting Newcastle, lectured from the platform of the G.S.E.S. in a most telling manner upon "Immortality." The address was here and there richly illuminated by beautiful and effective descriptions of the most instructive nature, and effectually reached the hearts and heads of his audience. Mr. H. Burton occupied the chair.

DISTRICT MEETING.—On Sunday evening last, Mr. W. H. Robinson gave an able address before a good audience at Houghton-le-Spring, on "The Facts and Principles of Spiritualism." On the same evening Mr. J. G. Grey, of Gateshead, lectured to a large audience made up of Spiritualists and Salvation Army people at Hetton-le-Hole. NORTHUMBRIA.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.—Reference was made at St. Andrew's Hall, on Sunday last, to the earnest charitable work of Mrs. Heckford in the East of London, more particularly among the sick poor, and in connection with the Hospital for Children at Shadwell; and it was resolved to devote the whole of the poor-box collection, for some time to come, to help that work. In support of the same purpose a number of ladies, under the superintendence of Mrs. Williams, of 87, Highbury New Park, N., will immediately get to work at the president's residence, 21, Canonbury Park South, N., to make up and distribute useful clothing. Volunteers are coming forward most encouragingly, and the charitable may be assured that any amounts forwarded to Mrs. Williams will be most economically applied.

DEATH OF DR. S. B. BRITTAN.—Readers of the American spiritual journals, and those who may be familiar with the literature of the cause published across the Atlantic, will note with feelings of regret the death of the above well-known and able writer. Dr. Brittan died suddenly at his residence in New York, on the 4th inst. Dr. Brittan was the first public advocate and defender of Spiritualism in the States, having made his first contribution to the Press in 1846. He was also a poet of no mean ability, and a capable controversialist; and it will be some time ere the place he has left vacant finds a fitting occupant. The Banner of Light, from which the foregoing particulars are extracted, promises its readers a full biographical sketch in due course.

THE CONDUCT OF PUBLIC PHYSICAL SEANCES.

Circular issued by the Central Association of Spiritualists, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

Few Spiritualists can have failed to note, with regret, the deterioration which has of late years taken place in the conditions under which physical phenomena have been sought in public seances.

These conditions—so favourable to fraud on the part of dishonest mediums, and so calculated to excite suspicion in the minds of observers—have led to the most disastrous results. We are not speaking without full warrant when we say that there is hardly a public medium for physical manifestations in this country against whom, at one time or other, charges of imposture have not been brought. We fear that in some cases no reasonable doubt can be entertained that fraud of the grossest kind was really perpetrated; while in other cases there is reason to believe that—whatever may have been the appearance to inexperienced spectators—there was no conscious deception on the part of the medium.

But in either case the name of Spiritualism has been brought into discredit, and we are forcibly driven to the conclusion that other methods of procedure must be amended. We must demonstrate our abhorrence of imposture by disavowing and discouraging all conditions which do not plainly shut out even the suspicion of its possibility.

Obviously these remarks can have little reference to family circles, which are naturally held sacred by those who regard them as affording opportunities for veritable "communion with the dead." But it is open to grave question whether—even in the case of family circles—inquirers should ever be permitted to make their first acquaintance with Spiritual phenomena by introduction to seances held for physical manifestations in the dark, or where a cabinet is used for the seclusion of the medium.

We are chiefly concerned, however, with what are known as public or promiscuous seances for physical manifestations. These have been of late years generally marked by the following characteristics:—(1) The seance has been conducted in imperfect light, or in total darkness. (2) The medium has been isolated from the circle, by being placed either in a cabinet or behind a curtain. (3) The sitters have been, either wholly or in part, unacquainted with the subject and with each other. (4) There has not infrequently been a manifest want of harmony, consequent upon differences of opinion as to the nature and value of the tests employed.

These conditions, usually found in combination, effectually preclude careful and dispassionate investigation; open wide an avenue to fraud; suggest suspicion of its presence even where it does not exist; and in many cases, we fear, expose the medium to very injurious influences.

Such conditions should be allowed to prevail no longer. "Mixed" circles should be as little mixed as possible—mere wonder-seekers, and men whose moral atmosphere is known to be impure, being carefully excluded. Above all, darkness should give way to light. In the early days of Spiritualism public dark circles were the exception, and there is no need for them now. There is abundant evidence that, with mediums of the present day, satisfactory phenomena, including even "form" manifestations, can be obtained without isolation—the medium, where a cabinet is used, being placed near, but outside of it, and in full view of the sitters. But even if this were not so, it is neither wise nor honourable to expose mediums to the risks which have been shown to attend seances held under the conditions that have of late been prevalent; and it were far better that we should have no public manifestations of physical phenomena than that they should be sought under circumstances which, to say the least, inevitably conduce to suspicion.

In view of all these considerations, believing that fraud is not of the essence of this confessedly obscure subject, but rather an accident dependent on faulty conditions of research; feeling that Spiritualists have the remedy for the evil in their own hands, and that without its conscientious application they cannot hope to maintain a fair reputation before the world; we earnestly recommend—That in all public circles held for physical phenomena, the medium be so placed, and in such light, as to be continuously under observation by each member of the circle.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Madame Kardec, at the ripe age of eighty-eight, has quitted this sphere of existence for a wider and, I trust, a higher one. The Society for the publication of her husband's works, which conducts the obsequies, puts well in its motto the outlines of the faith in which she lived, and which she has now opportunity of realising, at least partially:—"Naitre: Mourir: Renaitre encore: et Progresser sans cesse:—telle est la loi."

Lady Bloomfield's "Reminiscences" abounds with stories of the supernatural, and has in the second volume one special apparition at the moment of death which may be commended to the attention of the S.P.R.

The Journal of Science says of "The Ghost," and "The Lady's Walk" in Longman's Magazine, that their appearance there is "a striking proof of a change in public taste. Forty years ago such productions would have been laughed out of countenance." Yes: and far more recently than that. Even now that combination of fear, mistrust, and scientific exclusiveness which causes some minds to shrivel up in face of any mention of the supernatural, and which affects others as some colours act on some animals, finds a place in the Pall Mall Gazette. Surely that enlightened journal can find better use for its space. If it is not disposed to bless altogether, its mild curses should be founded on more accurate knowledge than that shewn in a recent note.

I advise Spiritualists and all whom it may concern to read an article in the Religio-Philosophical Journal of January 6th, on Irving Bishop and Cumberland. These worthies have fallen out, and are abusing each other in a highly edifying manner. Bishop commences with some appropriate reflections on the character of Cumberland; and Cumberland retorts with some highly pertinent questions to Bishop. He is curious as to his antecedents, which in themselves are sufficiently curious; and he wants to know various things that I venture to predict Bishop will not throw much light upon. The editor, however, supplies some very pertinent facts about the "landed proprietor," which are very funny reading. Not less funny is it to find that Cumberland has now blossomed into the son of "a landed proprietor" in Leicestershire. The Journal rudely calls him the "Butcher Boy's Boy," which is nearer the mark. All this would be infinitely contemptible and beneath notice were it not that men with names and characters to lose have held commerce with these persons. They did it after warning; and it is well that they should know what they have done. I recommend them to read the Journal for January 6th.

It may not be amiss if I say a few words about Roustaing's "Four Gospels." I may say at once that I do not propose to write any criticism or review of these volumes such as might pretend to be in any way adequate. I have had them for a long time in my possession, and have repeatedly tried to form a reasonable conception of their contents, and to frame some critical notice of what offers so wide a field for criticism. But in vain. The field is too vast; I cannot traverse it. The points of interesting speculation which I might discuss are too numerous, and too airy and impalpable for practical and useful disquisition. And the radical divergence between my own beliefs (which I by no means hold dogmatically, and which I assuredly do not wish to obtrude) and the opinions put forward in this book is such that any review of mine would be a mere statement of a general and particular disagreement with most statements therein contained, where they are anything more than speculations which it is equally impossible either to deny or to affirm. When "Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, assisted by the rest of the Apostles," and occasionally by other not less exalted personages, address some 1,000 pages of explanation of the Gospels in the light of the Kardecian philosophy; and when I am entirely unable to acquiesce in most of the fundamental assumptions contained in those pages, I find myself unable to do more than wonder whether after all this band of Apostles and Evangelists had anything to do with what seems so different from their original teaching. As I ponder I feel convinced that the use of these great names—a familiar device of a certain order of spirits to attract an attention which they would otherwise fail to secure—is a pretence; and I feel relieved that I am no longer under the necessity of rejecting the teaching of such exalted personages. Since I must disagree with M. Roustaing I am glad to think that his sentiments are not demonstrated to be those of the holy men whose names are used.

I wish to express no opinion on the philosophical system of which M. Roustaing is the most advanced exponent. It is one which numbers its adherents on the Continent of Europe by thousands; and among these are many for whose judgment I entertain a high respect. There are also points of affinity between it and some other systems which are mutually confirmatory. We shall probably have to wait some time yet before we get a body of philosophy which is not overlaid with erroneous conceptions and fantastic theories. The account M. Roustaing gives of the way in which he obtained these new Gospels is singularly frank and explicit. I venture on an imperfect summary.

M. Roustaing practised at the bar in his native town of Bordeaux where, after thirty years, he gained a "free and independent position." In 1861 his attention was first directed to Spiritualism by an eminent physician of his native town. With a mind laudably free from prejudice he put aside his natural incredulity (so successfully, indeed, that it never recurred) and set himself to "a careful perusal of the works of Allan Kardec," with the result of "bringing home to his mind, more forcibly than ever before, the sense of the vastness of the universe, and the density of our ignorance of our relations" with the unseen world. This was something to gain, though the method of acquiring it was strange. But this was not enough. "I next (he tells us) reviewed the history of the world from the earliest times. . . I then directed my attention to the various religions and philosophies of our globe. . . I completed this course of preparatory elucidation by a perusal of the Old and New Testaments, which it seems he had never been able to read before. He rapidly arrived at conclusions on all subjects except the nature of Jesus, and His relations to God and the human race. By way of elucidating these mysteries he "besought the Almighty to grant me a manifestation from the spirit of my father, and from John the Baptist, after whom I am named." Sure enough it came: and very soon after, in the course of a morning call on Madame Collignon, also a resident in Bordeaux, that lady "felt her arm moved by the fluidic agitation so well known to mediums," and Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John (assisted by the Apostles) at once appeared and commenced the contents of these three long volumes. From such little causes sprang these great events.

Mr. Kirby's part in the work as translator may be unreservedly praised. He acknowledges his obligation to Miss Blackwell; but the bulk of the work is his. It must have needed no ordinary care to eliminate French idioms, and to excise the repetitions with which the book still abounds, but of which we learn that many have been struck out. The result is a perfectly readable and intelligible piece of idiomatic English, disfigured by nothing else than the unavoidable technicalities of Kardec's philosophical system. But whatever opinion may be formed of the value of its remarkable contents, there can be no doubt that if three-fourths of it were excised and the remainder concisely expressed, the reader would be a great gainer, and the illustrious inditers no losers. In its present form the book is impossible except to the most enthusiastic devotee.

SPIRIT BIRDS AND ANIMALS.

I have read with much interest the record of facts contributed by Mrs. Nichols. In the last, which appeared January 13th, the desire expressed by the writer—that any one having evidence bearing upon the materialisation of animals should give it—reminded me of some singular occurrences made known to me several years since. That these things happened as related I am fully convinced, although I was not myself a witness to them. I am fully aware that my perfect conviction of the trustworthiness of the friend from whom I received the following account must be less satisfactory than would be the declaration that I had myself seen the remarkable phenomena, which, though not strictly to be classed under materialisations, may be regarded as "bearing upon" this phase of manifestation. I can only offer what I myself feel sure is a true record of what took place in a private room, and in the presence of several persons of respectability, hoping that to some among your readers the following extracts from my friend's letter may prove interesting.

I wrote to ask for a detailed account of the facts, not trusting to my memory to recall them with exactitude. The lady who writes has great medial power, but is not a public medium. To my request she replied as follows:—

"I will tell you as correctly as I can about our little Dickie. We called it Dick, although it was a female bird—a canary, and had never sung a note. She was very tame, and used to fly about the room and take her meals on the table, but always slept in her cage, and would make a loud twittering and screeching when its door by any chance got closed. One afternoon Dick was making a great fuss, although she was inside her cage, and I, thinking the door was shut, asked Mrs. C. (my husband's mother) to see about it; but it was open, and still the bird seemed agitated. I should tell you there were inside shutters to the windows of our room, one of which would not push back into its recess, but stood out a little distance, leaving a space behind it. It was towards the top corner of the shutter that Dickie was looking, making various demonstrations of pleasurable excitement.

"Mrs. C. said, 'Why, the bird sees something! She acts as if she saw another bird!' Even as she spoke, we heard two or three sweet, low notes of a bird's song. Mrs. C. exclaimed, 'There must be a bird behind the shutter!'—at the same time pulling the shutter fully out; but no bird was there, and Dick had regained composure and was taking her lunch of seed. We concluded that the strange bird had flown out of the open window, although we wondered how it had got in without our seeing it. This took place about three in the afternoon. The next day the same thing happened; but after Mrs. C. had opened the shutters and resumed her seat, Dick still kept upon the perch, and the invisible bird (invisible only to us, for Dick evidently saw it) sang a well-trained canary song all through—then a pause—then a few low notes—another pause—then an encouraging chirp, which our Dick seemed to understand, for she tried what she could do, and did repeat some of the notes she had heard three times. Those notes were sung by the other bird, louder each time, and each time they were echoed by our canary; and then, for that day, the singing lesson was over. These lessons continued for about two weeks—more notes every day—until Dickie could sing the whole song as well as her teacher, and it was the sweetest song canary ever sang. Then the music lessons ended; but for many a day afterwards Dick would come to her cage at the usual time, and chirp and call, then sing her song, and look and listen; but her sweet teacher came no more, and, in time, it was forgotten by Dick, though she never forgot her song. I left the bird with my son when we went abroad, and he has often said to me that hers was the loveliest song he ever heard. Poor Dickie has gone to meet her teacher, if it were, as I believe, a spirit bird. I have been asked if I were sure it was a female bird, and can only reply that it laid eggs.

"There is a gentleman in Birmingham who will remember the spook of a favourite dog of his coming to a dark séance at my house. The dog whined, and scratched on a table, and, when asked to give his paw, laid a poor little shivering cold paw on the hand of his master. The animal also gave his paw to three others of those present, myself included. It was the paw of a dog and nothing else. Then, with a pitiful whine the creature departed."

Thus ends my friend's recital, and I give it for what it may be deemed worth. To me, it was very interesting, because I knew I could rely upon those qualities in the narrator which make such testimony valuable.

As to the canary's song (apart from the fact that the caged bird appeared to see the singer) it is not more wonderful than the clear, loud playing of a music-box, which I (and also my sister) heard several times in séances with Slade, apparently close to us, sometimes on the table, and sometimes resting, as a considerable weight, upon our laps, though not tangible to our hands. No such box was in the house; and even when it pressed close against us, the hand passed through the space it seemed to occupy. As to the direct spirit voice, in speaking and singing, that is somewhat different, or may well be so regarded.

The apparent materialisation of the dog's paw hardly amounts to proof of the presence of a spirit dog. The intelligence and feeling manifested by what most old-fashioned Spiritualists (myself included) believe to be human spirits, together with the strong evidence occasionally afforded of spirit identity, are corroborative of the supposition that the hands which touch us are materialised by human beings desiring to make their presence known: but exactly what, or how much, is indicated by the production of what to the touch appears to be the paw of a dog, or of a voice resembling that of a dog, who knows? Albeit, there are more than enough whose theories, in the estimation of the theorists, settle all such questions definitely and definitively. We should gladly welcome all reasonable suggestions as to possible, or probable, explanations of phenomena which become intellectually and morally valuable only in so far as we learn through them something of the laws which govern and the truths which underlie them: but dogmatism on such subjects is worse than conscious ignorance or humble silence.

This life is full of mysteries which have never been and never can be solved by those who dwell in it. Still less can any mortal go outside the boundaries of human experience and claim, or we can rationally accept, as absolute, indubitable knowledge: and those are wisest and safest from delusion who recognise the limits which no man can venture to overstep as a teacher of unquestionable truth, without becoming a blind leader of the blind.

Bonn, Germany.

LOUISA ANDREWS.

[We remember that at a séance with Mrs. Everitt some years ago, we heard a "bird" singing in the room, although there was no bird there—that is, no bird "in the flesh." And on Dr. Kenningle Cook, who was present, whistling a tune, the "bird" joined in and whistled the same tune.—Ed. "LIGHT."]

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.

SECOND SERIES.

This series of Spirit-Teachings, like the former, is made up of selections from a great mass which have been automatically written during a series of years. They are selected on no other principle than that of printing what has been valuable to the person for whom they were originally given, in so far as this can be done without trenching on what is merely of personal and private application. The latter consideration excludes a great mass of what would otherwise be interesting and valuable matter. The phraseology has been preserved, as far as possible, intact, names only being omitted. The series follows directly on the first, from which, indeed, it is separated only by the accident of its publication in another journal, and after some considerable interval of time. The publication is resumed in deference to many repeated requests. M.A. (Oxon.)

No. XXXVII.

Your warning was true. I do not remember feeling so ill for a long time as I have done for thirty-six hours after that message was written. It seemed as if all vitality had been dragged out of me, and I was good for nothing, full of pain, and with a headache such as I seldom had. How was it?

We told you. It was necessary for us to draw upon your power in a much higher degree than we wish to do. The result was that you were deprived of vitality, and were, as you say, weak and ill, and in bodily pain.

Will the same result follow now?

We can prevent it.

Yet you did not do so then?

We wished you to learn, and you never learn except by experience. We have found out that you must be so taught. You have chosen the method yourself.

Well, I will try and endure it. You were going to tell me of my transition state, of which you have often spoken. Will you add information as to my relations with X., and tell me what you have to say on the subject? There are very many points on which I wish for guidance now.

Again we shall disappoint you, for it would be very unwise in us to gratify your curiosity. It would but disappoint us as well as injure your progress. You must be content to leave all, or nearly all, in the hands of those who are wiser and more far-seeing than you can be, and whose faithfulness and truth you have proven long ago. Of your development we have told you at various times. We found it necessary to use you for objective proof of our work, and a disproportionate amount of time was sacrificed to this object. We were sorely vexed at the necessity; but we endured it with patience, sure that in the end we should reap our reward. You can never know the trouble which it caused us to do what you thought so little of. That necessity has slowly passed, and we trust that it may not recur. We should fear for you in such back-sliding. The phase through which you now pass is one fitting you for more special work, and for the higher communion to which all as yet has been preparatory. The steps by which that is being day by day pushed on we may not explain to you. You will see them when you have climbed high enough to look back, and when the mists which now hang around your path have been cleared away. Be content to wait.

But about X?

You are going through a course of training necessary for you, parallel to that which you have already gone through with us; and as you struggled through by conflict with us, so will you struggle through by conflict there to a plane of knowledge which you have not yet attained. There are many phases of knowledge, and it is the fault of many of your fellows that their eye is filled with one only. You must learn the powers of your own spirit, as well as the nearness of our aid and the ceaseless presence of assaulting adversaries. All this is done by our sanction.

You know how vague has been the information I have had; how little there is to stay upon. You know what I have written on this subject lately. Am I right? Can you give me no aid?

Yes. We can tell you that you dealt with us in the same way as you now deal with Magus and his friends. We cannot tell you of the processes by which conviction will come. Were we to do so we should ruin the plans.

But conviction may be of two kinds—of the truth of the claims put forward, and the reverse. Which do you mean?

In any issue you will be the gainer by having sifted and found truth. We will not say more. It is part of your training.

A most unsatisfactory part. Will you tell me about A. B. and his ideas?

We are not able.

Tell me, at any rate, whether it is by your direction that I am going into these things.

No; we have no concern with him. We always keep our own path, as you should know.

Yes; but by your authority? You endorse M., as I understand?

Nothing occurs without our knowledge, and we govern the results for your good. We do not endorse all the means used; nor do we interfere, save with results. We overrule, and are not concerned to meddle with means or with agents.

Then you will tell me nothing about anything?

We will not interfere, save where we see it necessary, and then in a region to which your perceptions cannot reach. When we have anything to communicate, we do it without questioning on your part; but we now have nothing. We do not blame your questions. They are the means by which you grow in knowledge. More receptive souls drink in unquestioningly. You must proceed by other methods.

Yes, that is so. I want to be left alone just now. I've taken in enough.

If you so desire, you will be left alone so far as appearances go. But we shall guide and protect you in all, so far as you permit us. You have already worked through much trouble, and have been firm and unyielding.

Is it over? I don't like it at all, but I have no fear.

Your danger is not from that side, but rather from spiritual pride. You have fought with power, and have been successful; but graver trials await you. You have entered on a path of trial, and it is not yet ended—scarce, indeed, begun.

That is pleasant. About Slade, can we not do something to deliver him and to deal a blow at Materialism?

Nay, friend, we know not. That is for your consideration. Only do your work with zeal, and strive for what to you is truth. That is the first requisite. It is well that a view of truth, however hard, be presented to men. We do not concern ourselves. It is in other hands.

I wanted to ask you about that Hieroglyph and the Voice that bade me fetch it, when I was about to meet L.?

We do not know, and cannot say, nor do we concern ourselves. When will you learn that the processes by which your spirit is set free and led into the path of wisdom are governed by other agencies? We do not interfere. It is not our place: nor have we care for the minor processes by which you are governed and which alone come before our ken. It is useless to ask us for information on such matters. It will not be given, for reasons which should be known to you. It is natural that steps which lead in ways of which you do not know the end should perplex you. We cannot satisfy all your scruples, nor solve all your perplexities. We have earned from you in the past a right to confidence. Be patient. One of the great needs of your spirit is restful patience. It is too eager, too impetuous in its desire for conclusive proof, which, indeed, would be conclusive only for a moment; too little inclined to silent meditation and prayer. You do more good to others by your sifting and trying, and by your ceaseless conflict, than to yourself. It is well to probe and try; it is necessary for you; but you neglect the more gracious time of silent assimilation and inward growth.

Why, that is precisely what I want to get! I have said often that I want to get out of public work and conflict altogether, and be left alone.

That will not be. You must needs work, but you must learn to maintain the inner life side by side with the outer. The outer is needful, the inner is needful too. There are periods when you will do well to cultivate the inner life in entire exclusion. You have periods of rest from worldly toil, use them for this.

You wish me more and more to lead a purely esoteric life. Will not that involve cutting myself off from all friends, from old associations, from active work, and the entering on a new phase of life?

We will answer briefly. It does not involve any such change as you imagine, but a real one nevertheless. It does involve change of association, but not isolation. It will bring you into connection with those who are yet unknown to you, but will strengthen rather than release old bonds. The time of great change is not yet.

+ IMPERATOR.

SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA IN FRANCE.

The Revue Spirite of December last contains a paper by Dr. Chazaraïn, of Paris, in which he minutely relates a series of manifestations, Madame Bablin being the medium.

At these séances musical boxes, &c., circulated about the room, resting occasionally upon the heads, hands, or knees of the circle, finally—when light was restored—to be seen again on the table at which the medium sat, bound, as placed by a committee before the light was extinguished.

It was usual at these séances, the sitters' hands being interlinked, for lozenges, a box of which was on the table, to be deftly insinuated between the lips of sitters; pocket-books, eye-glasses, neckties, and the hats of ladies, were often interchanged, as if to show that the absence of our light did not affect the sight of the invisible operators. They seemed to select the most recent inquirers for most attention, and pressed and patted their hands and heads as if in welcome. Fresh flowers were often dexterously placed between the fingers of the sitters, and one or more would, at request, be added; oranges were once laid in their laps. The room was always, as a matter of rule, searched before the circle was formed, and certainly contained neither flowers nor oranges. The medium's jacket was sometimes taken off, at others turned, the cord by which she was bound being as left by the committee. The medium, seated in her chair, was sometimes found to have been noiselessly placed upon the table.

On one occasion Dr. Chazaraïn, having had his thoughts much turned during the day towards a brother, deceased, was still thinking of him at the séance, when he felt an arm rest upon his shoulder, then a hand pressed his head, and lips imprinted a kiss upon his forehead. On another occasion, thinking of his little girl, two years of age, deceased six months, he felt a little hand laid upon his own, and then a little warm kiss, audible to those next him, was impressed upon his lips.

He was much struck with manifestations where the sense of sight confirmed that of touch. Such manifestations were generally preceded by the diffusion in the air of the room of some perfume sensible to all; luminous phosphorescent looking points would then appear and disappear, ascending or descending slowly or rapidly. They would become numerous, then be grouped together, and shew the form of hands, large and small, which, at request, opened and closed, and touched the sitters; they illumined the objects on the table, took hold of them,—musical-boxes, bell, child's trumpet, fans,—carried them sounding round the room, sometimes with amazing velocity; a hand would hold the trumpet in front of a sitter, and it would be sounded there; the fans also would be actively used, acceptable to the sitters in August.

Another order of manifestations was that of forms, visible and tangible, recognised as those of departed relatives and friends. One that came to Dr. Chazaraïn rested his hands upon Dr. Chazaraïn's head, pressed and stroked it, and threw a vaporous gauze around him, exhaling a slightly phosphoric odour. These forms were visible by the phosphorescent light emitted from their hands.

Dr. Chazaraïn calls attention to the fact that all these phenomena were witnessed by him and by never fewer than a dozen other investigators, under conditions precluding device or collusion. With respect to the darkness, which so many object to in manifestations of this order, Dr. Chazaraïn points out that that is a condition presenting an additional difficulty to individuals producing them who are endowed with earthly bodies. He urges that it would be unreasonable to conclude otherwise than that the producers of these manifestations were those to whom the hands belonged—hands seen by all present to hold and move objects—whose touch was felt, whose forms were seen and recognised in light of their own furnishing.

"Am I asked," says Dr. Chazaraïn, "to account for the entrance into a closed space of beings of human form and consistence? for the introduction into that space of other solid objects? for the turning and the taking off of the medium's jacket, her arms being bound and fixed to her chair? My answer is that such phenomena are comprehensible if we admit that the bodies of the beings who thus manifest their presence are fluidic (fluidiques), and able to penetrate bodies which to us are solid, and restore them then to their previous state; that they do this by means of a vital electricity (psychic force of William Crookes) drawn from medium and circle, and which may act upon the molecules of their external envelope—fluidic or materialised. Have we not the analogy of this in the decompositions and re-compositions by the electric current of a battery? If it be so we may account for the shocks and starts of mediums on contact being broken in a circle where a hand is thrust forth to snatch at a materialised actor in such manifestations. It may enable us to understand also the medium's shock, when under spirit control, on abruptly touching her, as an effect of sudden diversion of the fluidic current and abstraction of nerve force.

"Scientific men ask that such phenomena should be presented to them in daylight. It is true that they have been only very exceptionally witnessed in daylight, but is that a valid reason for holding back from investigating them? Are there not phenomena in chemical science not producible in daylight? Are phosphorus flames seen in daylight? Are not some chemical salts decomposed by light? Does science deny the existence of gases unless under illumination? Do not invisible gases produce solids which again are convertible into gases? Does science deny in light itself the colours it reveals in passing through a refracting medium?"

"Disincarnated bodies being fluidic cannot be seen by us except with such surroundings, and under such conditions, as furnish to their fluidic forces the means of producing the light which makes them visible to us; or to support the, to them, dissolving action of the light which we receive from our sun or from physical combustion."

THE TWO WORLDS.

Some men there are, I have known such, who think
That the two worlds—the seen and the unseen,
The world of matter and the world of spirit—
Are like the hemispheres upon our maps,
And touch each other only at a point.
But these two worlds are not divided thus
Save for the purposes of common speech.
They form one globe in which the parted seas
All flow together and are intermingled,
While the great continents remain distinct.

The spiritual world
Lies all about us, and its avenues
Are open to the unseen feet of phantoms
That come and go, and we perceive them not Save by their influence, or when at times
A most mysterious Providence permits them
To manifest themselves to mortal eyes.

LONGFELLOW.

MESSRS. W. H. SMITH'S BOOKSTALLS.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

DEAR SIR,—At the beginning of the year I asked the man at the bookstall here to add to my serials and papers "LIGHT." What was my surprise to be informed by him that on his applying to W. H. Smith and Sons to do so he was informed that "LIGHT" was not supplied!

I accordingly wrote to Messrs. Smith and Sons as follows:—"I have been for many years a liberal customer at your railway stall here. I have recently asked that 'LIGHT' shall be added to my usual periodicals—a high class weekly journal published in the interests of Spiritualism, a science now commanding the attention of men of great learning, and in which I am greatly interested. I am informed that 'LIGHT' is not supplied! Surely it is not your intention to become arbitrators of what the public shall read! If so, I, for one, shall protest, and claim to read what I please; and, moreover, I shall use what influence I possess to induce others to do the same. It is simply for convenience I use your stalls to obtain the dailies, weeklies, and monthlies that I want. I am well aware I could go to Stoneham's and get 25 per cent. discount, but it would involve the trouble of sending in the City, where time is money. Still if I am to be met with such an absurd statement with reference to 'LIGHT' that 'it cannot be supplied,' I shall give you no further orders, but get all I want in the way of literature at the cheaper shop. I trust this remonstrance will be sufficient, and that from Lewisham Station I may continue to pay you full price and get all I order."

Messrs. Smith and Sons' reply was laconic:—"Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 8th inst., we have to inform you that we are not agents for the publication you there refer to."

I have accordingly struck off my periodicals from their list, and now get them at Stoneham's at 25 per cent. off! Of course my withdrawal from this eminent firm is as a drop in the ocean, but if the many thousands of Spiritualists will do the same it may tend to shew them that theirs is a short-sighted, as well as absurdly bigoted policy, and that they need more "LIGHT!"

Yours truly,

Lewisham, January 29th, 1883. MORELL THEOBALD.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

The annual general meeting of the members of this Association was held on Tuesday evening, at 38, Great Russell-street, Mr. E. Dawson Rogers in the chair, when the following report was presented from the Council:—

Report of the Council.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

In drawing up a Report for the first General Meeting of the Central Association of Spiritualists, the Council is conscious of sensations of a somewhat unusual character. It feels itself to be the same, and yet not the same. It is animated by the same spirit as of old, a spirit earnestly devoting its energies to objects which the Society that so long met in these rooms was established to promote. It is the old spirit animating a new body. It is, however, of comparatively little consequence whether this report is designated as the first of a new series, or the tenth of an old one. It is more to the purpose that it represents and summarises the work of an association taking a leading part in a movement which it regards as second to none in importance, at the present time, whether looked at from a religious or philosophical point of view. The Council is, if possible, more deeply convinced than ever that such is the case; and although special difficulties and perplexities always attend the pursuit of new and unpopular truths, yet there is, on the whole, reason for encouragement in the increasing hold which the subject of Spiritualism is taking of the public mind, and which should incite those who are working for it to continue their labours with energy and perseverance.

It being but little more than six months since the last General Meeting of the British National Association of Spiritualists was held, and since the unanimous adoption of the resolution formally constituting the Central Association of Spiritualists, the present Report is necessarily somewhat meagre.

MEMBERSHIP.

The Central Association of Spiritualists commenced with 294 Honorary and Subscribing Members. The changes so far have been as follows:—

New Subscribing Members elected...	17
New Honorary Member elected (Chas. Blackburn) .....	1
Resignations .....	33
Deaths, Hon. Members, Dr. Nehrer, W. L. ....	2
Sammons .....	35
Total change (diminution) .....	17
Present number of Members .....	277

It may be remarked that the last six months of the year is always the time when there are most resignations, and the first six months is the time when most new Members may be expected.

ALLIED SOCIETIES.

Four societies have allied themselves with the Association in addition to those previously allied to the British National Association of Spiritualists, viz.:—North Shields Investigating Society; Central London Spiritual Evidence Society; Plymouth Free Spiritual Society; Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum. The total number in friendly union is now twenty.

The following representatives of Allied Societies have been appointed as ex-officio Members of Council:—South African Spiritual Evidence Society, Mr. Cornelius Pearson; Plymouth Free Spiritual Society, Mr. J. Bowring Sloman; Central London Spiritual Evidence Society, Mr. Richard Wortley; Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum, Mr. Sandys Britton.

WORK OF THE ASSOCIATION UP TO END OF YEAR 1882.

A successful soirée was held at the close of the season, last July, and the present season was opened by an equally successful one on November 6th. A series of discussion and social meetings has been commenced, and is going on through the winter and spring. The following is a programme of those which have been already held:—November 6th, Opening Soirée; November 20th, Paper, "Is it advisable for Spiritualists to encourage Professional Mediumship for Physical Manifestations?" by Mr. Thomas Shorter; December 4th, Paper, "Suggestions on the Practical Teachings of Materialisation," by Mrs. S. Heckford; December 18th, Paper, "Mesmerism," by Mr. Iver MacDonnell.

An important item in the work of the autumn was the issue of a circular relating to the conduct of séances for physical manifestations. This circular was drawn up with great care, and received the signatures of a large number of known and leading Spiritualists, both members of the Association and others. In connection with this, it may be mentioned that a series of séances is now being held in these rooms, arranged between Miss Wood and two friends of her own and a carefully-selected circle. The results will be duly reported to the Council.

In the month of September the whole of the premises occupied by the Association were re-decorated by the landlord. This has, however, been unavoidably accompanied by an increase of rent. Some expenditure has also been made by the Association in refurnishing.

The Council expresses its thanks for a number of presentations which have been made to the Library since last May, and also its obligation to all those ladies and gentlemen who have given valuable aid and assistance in the soirées and discussion meetings, and in the various arrangements connected with them. It also feels bound to express its indebtedness to the unremitting energy and industry of the secretary of the Association.

FINANCIAL.

From the Accounts appended to this Report it will be seen that the Council are still struggling against an insufficient income, and one which prevents their taking up works of importance to the movement. During the last year exceptional expense was incurred from necessary painting and decorations, which have made the rooms comfortable and attractive. The rent having been increased to £150, the Council urge all Members to use their best efforts to add to their numbers and to obtain further support for the Association. Several Members have left in order to subscribe to the new Society for Psychical Research, which is to be regretted, inasmuch as each Society works upon its own distinct lines and the existence of the Society for Psychical Research is clearly owing to work already done by our Association. The Council hope that their former liberal subscribers will renew their subscriptions, and make the Association, as it has been in the past, a home for Spiritualists and a centre where inquirers shall be welcomed and assisted in prosecuting their researches.

E. DAWSON ROGERS,
Vice-President.

MORELL THEOBALD, F.C.A., Hon. Treasurer.

E. H. FOITS,
R. FEARCE,

Auditors.

(Countersigned) THOMAS BLYTON, Resident Secretary.

Some friendly discussion followed the reading of the report, and the feeling was generally expressed that though the report was not so satisfactory as could have been wished, there was no cause for serious discouragement. The report was then unanimously adopted.

The following ladies and gentlemen were elected to constitute the new Council:—W. P. Adashead, G. P. Allan, Miss F. Arundale, F. Barrett, E. T. Bennett, J. Bowman, W. H. Coffin, Signor Damiani, T. H. Edmonds, J. S. Farmer, Mrs. FitzGerald, Desmond G. FitzGerald, Mrs. D. G. FitzGerald, G. F. Green, Miss Houghton, Sir Charles Isham, Bart., J. Lamont, J. G. Meugens, J. J. Morse, W. Newton, C. Pearson, R. Pearce, W. C. Pickersgill, G. H. Potts, E. Dawson Rogers, Signor Rondi, M. Theobald, Mrs. M. Williams, H. Withall, Miss H. Withall.

Mr. Sandys Britton having been elected members' auditor, the proceedings terminated with votes of thanks to the late Council, the secretary, and the chairman.

We learn that Mr. HARRY BASTIAN, well known to our readers as a physical and materialisation medium of remarkable power, is also a healing medium, having inherited the "gift of healing" from his Alsatian ancestors, among whom his father and grandfather were celebrated for their healing powers. Mr. Bastian has permanently associated himself in this work with Dr. and Mrs. Nichols, 32, Fopstone-road, Earls Court, South Kensington. This devotion to the relief of suffering will not, it is to be hoped, too much interfere with other forms of manifestation, though healing the sick may be considered the most important and desirable, if not the most convincing, of all "spiritual gifts," and one of "the signs that follow them that believe."

OFFICE OF "LIGHT."

LUDGATE CIRCUS, E.C.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

Reports of the proceedings of Spiritualist Societies in as succinct a form as possible, and authenticated by the signature of a responsible officer, are solicited for insertion in "LIGHT." Members of private circles will also oblige by contributing brief records of noteworthy occurrences at their sances.

The Editor cannot undertake the return of manuscripts unless the writers expressly request it at the time of forwarding and enclose stamps for the return postage.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

The Annual Subscription for "LIGHT," post free to any address within the United Kingdom, or to places comprised within the Postal Union, including all parts of Europe, the United States, and British North America, is 10s. 10d. per annum, forwarded to our office in advance.

ADVERTISEMENT CHARGES.

Five lines and under, 3s. One inch, 4s. 6d. Half-column, £1. Whole Column, £2 2s. Page, £1. A reduction made for a series of insertions. Orders for Papers and Advertisements may be addressed to Mr. J. J. MORSE, the business agent. All other communications should be sent to "The Editor." Cheques and Post Office Orders may be made payable to EDWARD T. BENNETT, at the Chief Office, London. Halfpenny Postage Stamps received for amounts under 10s.

Orders for Advertisements may also be sent to "The Ross Publishing Company," 4, Wine Office Court, Fleet Street, E.C., on or before Wednesday in each week.

THE S. P. R. AND THE C. A. S.

A CORRESPONDENT asks, "What is the distinction between the Society for Psychical Research and the Central Association of Spiritualists?" and also inquires whether there is any antagonism between the two bodies. To those who are acquainted with all the facts the distinction is obvious enough; to others it may not be altogether so apparent. It will, however, very readily be seen if a little consideration is given to the S. P. R.'s methods of procedure.

Taking nothing for granted, and for all practical purposes ignoring the results of previous inquiries, the S. P. R. started afresh on the path of research, resolved to put to the most rigid scientific tests—so far as the application of such tests is possible—every so-called psychical phenomenon, as it came under the notice of their special committees. What is popularly known as thought-reading, for instance—about which Spiritualists have made up their minds conclusively years ago, from large experience and the most abundant evidences of its truth—the S. P. R. assumed as unproven; their purpose being, if the facts were as alleged, to demonstrate them in such a way that no honest mind that cared to know could find plausible excuse for disbelief. And they have done this work exhaustively and well. No candid seeker for truth can any longer doubt. The S. P. R. have met the scientific sceptic by scientific methods.

And they will do so in other departments of psychical research. Of course we can say nothing about the special directions in which they are now engaged. They choose, as they are wise in doing, their own times and methods of making known the results of their inquiries. But Spiritualists cannot doubt what the end will be—they cannot doubt that, as time goes on, the S. P. R. will afford as clear and unquestionable proofs of clairvoyance, of spirit writing, of spiritual appearances, and of the various forms of physical phenomena as they have so successfully afforded of thought-reading. But meanwhile there is a sharp line of distinction between the S. P. R. and the Central Association of Spiritualists. The Spiritualists have a settled faith—nay, more, a certain knowledge—in regard to facts about which the S. P. R. would not yet profess to have any knowledge whatever. The S. P. R. are busy with phenomena only, seeking evidence of their existence, but not yet hazarding even a hint of their spiritual origin. To them the idea of spirit-communion, of sweet converse with dear departed friends—so precious to Spiritualists—has no present interest. We speak of them, of course, as a Society—not of individual members. As a Society they are studying the mere bones and muscles, and have not yet penetrated to the heart and soul. As a Society, they cannot yet call themselves Spiritualists. As a Society, they will, as their proofs accumulate, in all probability become—first, "Spiritualists without the spirits,"—and ultimately very like other Spiritualists, with the added satisfaction that in reaching that position they have made good every step in their path as they went along, and have, by their cautious conduct, induced many noble and clever men and women to tread the same way with them.

"Is there any antagonism between the two bodies?" After what we have said we think our correspondent will see that there certainly ought not to be, and we have also the pleasure of giving him the assurance that there is not. The Spiritualists are confident that the S. P. R. are doing a most useful work, and that, sooner or later, this work will bring a large accession to the Spiritualist ranks; and so there can be no room for jealousy. It is true that some members of the C. A. S., as mentioned in the report of the Council to the annual meeting, held on Tuesday last, have left the Association, having connected themselves with the S. P. R. Of course this secession, although, fortunately, but a small one, is very much to be regretted, and we cannot but think that those who have adopted such a course have been true neither to themselves nor to the cause which they should have at heart. The S. P. R. should be assisted by Spiritualists in every possible way, but not at the expense of any association which more correctly represents their professed faith. It is due to the self-denying labours of Spiritualist associations during many years of obloquy and reproach that the ground has been sufficiently cleared for the operations of the S. P. R., and Spiritualists should bear in mind that the C. A. S. and similar organisations have still the first claim on their support, and have yet before them a large amount of useful work which can only be accomplished by a continuance of the help and sympathy of friends. Spiritualists who become deserters at a time when their assistance is most needed will, sooner or later, look back upon their want of fidelity with sorrow, perhaps with shame and self-reproach.

A PERSONAL OR IMPERSONAL GOD?

I am glad to notice the adhesion of "M.A. (Oxon.)" and Mr. Penny to the truth of the Divine Personality. But some comment is required on the strictures of three other correspondents. Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald deems it "equally impossible to regard the Supreme Intelligence as a person or as an impersonal principle." I may ask, if He is neither personal nor impersonal, what is He, then? Is He half-and-half, a sort of go-between, neither fully self-conscious nor yet unconscious? Is He, like Richard III.,

Into this breathing world not half made up?"

Now what strikes me in our universe is that everything is positive and defined. The vague and indefinite appertains to our thoughts, not to the things or persons themselves. Each one of us is a whole personality, and thereby possesses a commanding advantage; but God, it appears, has a misty, undefined existence, "not wholly outside of any existent being or thing, and yet not identical with them," partly belonging to them and partly not. I cannot acquiesce in this nebulousity. If it be so, we have an immense advantage over the Supreme Being. I have ventured to write "Supreme Being," but Mr. Fitzgerald says "Intelligence." Are we to think of the Supreme, then, as a mere all-embracing intellect, but without moral attributes? If it be so, then our superiority to Him is even more decided. Such a Being deserves our deepest compassion.

I next come to Miss Arundale. She requires some further elucidation of my meaning when I wrote: "God must be able to communicate with matter." It must be so unless God is devoid of a great power and advantage which we possess. We manipulate matter in a thousand ways, and, as Cicero says, thereby almost make "a second nature" of things. We "originate force to impel and sustain it." With a mere thought we set nervous and electrical currents at work which set our own bodies in motion and thrill through them. We make an absolutely new beginning by our mere will, as when we say, "I will get up and dress." This is not a physical sequence, it is a physical fact consequent solely on a fiat of the will. Is it, then, an undue familiarity to presume that the Almighty can "communicate with matter and originate force to impel and sustain it"? If He cannot, then is He in a pitiable condition—to survey the worlds of matter, and yet to be absolutely powerless over them. We can combine forces, and thus modify and change our external condition. He cannot. He is all mind, but with no executive power. He is in the condition which Thucydides describes as "the most hateful grief of all, to have many thoughts and desires, but to have no power to realise them."

I further said, "Matter is inert in its own essence." Well, I do not stand upon a word; "essence" may be incorrect. What I meant was, that matter is in itself inert and at rest until an external force sets it in motion. I believe Newton sustains that proposition. Miss Arundale refers us to the "atoms," and inquires, "Are not all atoms the effect of the correlation of two great forces forming, as it were, one? Is not force itself but the outward expression of the interior essence? How, then, can effect be independent of cause, so as to require the origination of that cause to impel and sustain it?"

I may, in turn, remark—the atoms being "an effect," the effect of the correlation of two great forces, how came these two forces first to exist, and then to be correlated? An union necessary to give birth to the clever, nimble, and eternally vibrating atoms, vibrating to and fro millions and millions of times in a second. Miss Arundale seems to think that no external force is required for all this, but that the atoms eternally gyrate by their inborn energy and interior essence. Tyndall, however, would inform her that it is the ether waves impinging on the molecules of bodies which agitate their constituent atoms, and which make them capable of tremors equal in rapidity to those of light and radiant heat.

Not to intrude too much on your space, I would refer your correspondent to the remarks of Tait and Balfour Stewart on the use of the term "force"—"the modern abuse of which word is outrageous, alike to science and to common sense"—and Miss Arundale seems to be guilty of it.

I crave a little more space to reply to "C.C.M." If it were a question of "shells" I should not presume to differ from him, for those queer existences are to him "familiar as his garter." But I unfeignedly thank him for his translation of Zöllner, and highly value his co-operation in our cause. He remarks: "Even if we admit that the One Being must be perfectly self-conscious." He seems, then, to think it more probable that He is only dimly self-conscious, not quite sure whether He is alive or not. Now, as we are perfectly self-conscious, the "many" beings have a great superiority over the "One Being" who lives in the mist, and hardly realises what and where He is. He then continues: "Consciousness is not being, is not even energy, it is phenomenon only." Indeed! I thought that "consciousness" was buried out of sight, and that we infer it from its effects; that it is, in short, the exact opposite of the phenomenal. However, if it be phenomenal, it can only be so in the sense that everything whatsoever, whether in the universe of mind or of matter, is phenomenal; that the whole is a fleeting phantasmagoria; that the universe is all "outsides"; that there is nothing within to sustain it; that it is a house of cards; that all is an outward seeming only; that the whole is phenomenal; an universal Maya or illusion.

I humbly beg to dissent from such philosophy.

THE S.P.R. AND THE C.A.S.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I was at the first meeting, held at Great Russell-street, when Professor Barrett proposed the establishment of the Society now known as the Society for Psychical Research, and if I did not misunderstand him, he then stated that he was indebted to yourself for the suggestion. This being so, it occurs to me that you will be in a position to answer a question, a reply to which I think would be acceptable to others as well as to myself—viz., "What is the distinction between the S.P.R. and the Central Association of Spiritualists, and is there any antagonism between the two bodies?"

Hoping you will not consider this as needlessly troubling you, I am, yours faithfully,

A STUDENT.

Discontent is unhappiness at the non-possession of that, the possession of which would not make us happy.

DIRECT SPIRIT DRAWING.

A séance was held at my residence, Rose Villa, Church End, Finchley, N., on the evening of the 14th of January last, the circle consisting of my wife, two sons, two daughters, and myself, with Mr. W. E. as medium. We sat in the dark and had long conversations with spirits, who spoke with the direct voice. In the course of the sitting one of them asked: "Have you any private note-paper with printed heading?" I replied that he would find some in the Davenport. Immediately afterwards we heard several strong pulls at a side drawer in the Davenport. This drawer goes very stiffly, and we knew exactly what was being done by the noise made by the drawer in being pulled out. The spirit had, in fact, gone to the particular drawer in which my stock of note-paper is kept. Some quires of the paper were at once thrown on the table, and I was immediately—that is, within two or three seconds—requested by the voice to light up. Having done so, we found on a piece of the paper a message of about eighty words, well and distinctly written in pencil. As soon as this had been read I put out the light again, and had scarcely done so when light was once more called for. As nearly as I can judge, not more than three seconds had elapsed; but in that space of time a pencil sketch—of which a facsimile is given below—had been executed on another sheet of my private note-paper.

The voice told us that the sketch might be taken as a general "representation," though not exactly a likeness, of my daughter Kathleen, who has now been about ten years in the other life. I should add that the medium sat between myself and my wife, and that we know that he did not move from his seat during the séance.

E.D.R.

THE LATE TRANSIT OF VENUS curiously proved the accurate calculations of the ancient makers of that famous horological curiosity, the Strasburg clock. A few days before the transit, the American Register tells us, visitors to the Cathedral inspecting the planetarium attached to the clock, noticed that one of the small gilt balls representing Venus was gradually moving towards a point between the sun and the earth, and on the day of the passage the ball stood exactly between them. Old Conrad Dasypodius, the Strasburg mathematician, superintended the manufacture of the clock and its accompanying planetarium, sometime between 1571-4, the dates differing according to various authorities; and it is interesting to note that after three hundred years of existence, the clock faithfully fulfils the calculations of its dead inventor.—Graphic.

THE BARBY GHOST.

It was the opinion of Athanasius and others that souls, once delivered from the burden of the flesh, held no further communion with mortality; and many may recall the remark of St. Augustine—that, if souls ever re-visited the friends and haunts of their mortal being, he was assured that his mother, Monica, who had followed him by land and sea, would have revealed herself to him—so greatly beloved—in order to inform him of what she had learned in her present state, and advise him in his hard conflict. On the other hand, it was a widely-accepted tenet of ghostly faith, that the immaterial part was frequently seen hovering near the spot where the gross and crustaceous body lies, waiting either until the latter should be accorded the rites of sepulture, or until some crime should be revealed and expiated. Among the supporters of this opinion was Origen, who considered that the disembodied spirit might be permitted to wander within certain prescribed limits, until some especial purpose were fulfilled.

It must be confessed that, except by inclining toward this view, or by supposing that the spirits of evil were permitted to personate the departed, it would be difficult to suggest any rational explanation of a phenomenon which has been familiar to the thoughts of every successive generation since man's history was written. There is a certain consistency in the idea, which commends it to the inquirer, and gives to the incontrovertible evidence which establishes the occurrence of this class of incident, its greatest value.

Some years ago, in a letter from Sir Charles Isham, of Lamport Hall, Northampton, the writer remarked, parenthetically, that an incident had occurred—was, indeed, still occurring—in the neighbourhood, so strange, yet so indubitable, as to justify a visit of inquiry, from anyone delighting in the marvellous to the spot. Not many weeks later, an opportunity offered—by a slight deviation from a journey I had to make to the neighbourhood of Coventry—to comply with my correspondent's implied suggestion.

The pretty, sequestered village of Barby is situated a few miles from Rugby, and consists only of a few small dwellings of the cottage class, the inhabitants of which appeared both clean, sober, and intelligent, with manners that might have done honour to a more polished community. In this village died, March the 3rd, 1851, a Mrs. Knebb, aged sixty-seven. Born and bred in the place, she had married, late in life, a person of some means, who, dying, left her in easy circumstances for one of her condition, the cottage in which she resided forming a portion of her property. She was, however, of a singularly penurious disposition, concealing to the utmost her means of subsistence, and denying herself even the necessities of life, to such an extent as to bring on the illness of which she subsequently died. During this illness she was supplied with all she needed by her nephew, Mr. Hart, a farmer, and was nursed by two neighbours, Mrs. Holding and Mrs. Griffin. Her habits retained such hold upon her that she, on one occasion, pretending to be penniless, sent Mrs. Holding to beg for sixpence to purchase brandy. As her end approached, she evinced no mental disquietude, but, when turned in her bed by her two attendants, expressed an opinion that she should not survive the night, adding that she trusted it would prove so, and that before another she would be in Paradise. She died, in effect, that night, having a short time before left everything she possessed, by will, with the executorship, to her nephew Hart.

Before proceeding to the extraordinary part of the narrative, I may be allowed to state that I visited Barby fully prepared to find that what I might learn or witness there would not, when sifted, reward me for even the slight divergence I had made from my original route. Knowing nothing whatever of the locality or its inhabitants, it was by no means an easy task to get fairly on the track of the phenomenon, whatever it was, that had troubled the peace of this quiet spot. Fortune, however, favoured me. Entering into conversation with an intelligent native who was leaning on a gate, I remarked, casually, that I supposed the little hamlet, pretty as it was, lying so far aloof from the main roads, had few visitors.

"More'n common lately," said the young farmer, with a grin.

"Ah—how was that?"

"We've had one as brought more. You ain't the first gentleman as has come since Mrs. Knebb died."

"Who upon earth is Mrs. Knebb? and why should my coming have anything to do with that lady?"

"Oh, I thought as you was going to ask to be shown her cottage. Many does."

"What happened there?"

My rustic friend at once commenced the story—the beginning of which has been already told—and continued, in substance, as follows:—

One month after the funeral of the deceased Mrs. Knebb, Mrs. Holding and her uncle, who occupied the cottage adjoining Mrs. Knebb's (which had been closed), were alarmed by loud thumps dealt upon the partition wall, slamming of doors, and sounds as of furniture violently thrown about. This last circumstance seemed the more extraordinary, inasmuch as everything movable had been taken off the premises. Mrs. Holding's uncle, on entering the house, found all quiet, and as it had been left. These noises recurred nightly, generally commencing about two o'clock in the morning (the time of the old woman's death), but sometimes earlier, and caused the neighbouring family so much alarm that, as Mrs. Holding declared, they could never bear to go to bed till eleven—an unheard of dissipation in Barby—in the hope that, when they did retire, fatigue might enable them to sleep through it all. One night, however, the disturbance was so great that Mrs. Holding could bear it no longer, and, hastily dressing, went out in search of her uncle, who was absent. That gentleman was found at the Black Bull, but the only remark he made, as they walked home, was—

"Well, my girl, I do believe there's our Missis Knebb come back!"

On the 9th of April the family of a respectable sawyer named Accleton, tempted by the low rent, came into the disturbed house.

"Perhaps," remarked my companion, at this point of the story, "you would like to see Mrs. Accleton yourself, sir; that's her cottage near by."

I assented, and we found that lady at home, and perfectly ready to communicate her ghostly experiences. She told me that she occupied the bedroom in which the old woman died. It was a lofty and commodious apartment, having in the ceiling a small trap-door, giving access to a sort of loft among the rafters. Accleton was much from home, but the eldest child, a girl of ten, slept in a small bed in a corner, about three paces from her mother. On one occasion, soon after they had entered, Mrs. Accleton was awakened, about two in the morning, by a tremendous crash in the room below. Thinking it was her husband, who had gone to Hilmorton feast, she called out—"Oh, so you've got back, at last, I can hear!" No answer was returned, but the noises were renewed, at intervals, until seven o'clock, when the husband returned. Similar sounds were now heard almost every night, but nothing was seen until, one night—or, rather, morning—about two, the elder Accletons were aroused by loud shrieks from the child.

"Mother, mother!" cried the girl, "there's a woman standing by my bed, a-shaking her head at me! What do she want?"

The parents saw nothing, but the child continuing to cry, Accleton got up and approached the bed, saying: "Nonsense, nonsense, girl! It's only your mother's cap and gown!" This was said merely to pacify her, but it had no effect, the child reiterating her story, and adding that the woman wore a mottled gown, unlike her mother's, and a white cap, and was very tall. The deceased woman, Mrs. Knebb, was five feet eleven inches in height. All was now quiet till about four, when the girl, who had been lying with her face to the wall, shrieked out again, in an agony of terror—

"Mother! mother! here's that woman again!"

She declared that the visitor had awakened her by turning the corner of the sheet over her face. The apparition was seen by the little girl in all seven times, and her health, the mother assured us, had been seriously injured by the nervous shock, though, "by the blessing of God, and with youth on her side," she trusted that she would soon get over it.

The small seer was a pretty, blue-eyed, intelligent child, with a frank infantine manner, the reverse of cunning. She told me that the spectre came with a low laughing or singing voice, which awoke her. It was made visible by a "brown light" which seemed to surround her, stood erect with folded hands, and gazed at her in a bold firm manner.

Up to this time, some degree of incredulity existed among the neighbours as to the child's statement—a feeling never partaken by her parents. But all doubts were soon to be set at rest. Mrs. Accleton, whose mother was sleeping with her in the absence of her husband, was awakened one morning, at two, by a sudden light in the room. In an instant, the idea of the spectral presence crossed her mind, and she at first closed her eyes, but, regaining courage—"I said to myself," she related, "'the Lord's will be done. I never did her any harm.' With that, I lifted my head from the pillow, and there she stood, at the bed's foot, and 'set' me as firm and proud as if she was alive. I looked at her full five minutes. Then I spoke to mother, who was awake, and told her there was Mrs. Knebb. But all she said was, 'Lord help us! don't see it,' and pulled the clothes over her head."

Mrs. Accleton had previously declared her intention to address the spirit should it appear, but her courage proved unequal to this, although, she added, it moved towards her with a gentle, appealing manner, and even slightly touched the bolster, as though inviting her to speak. The form and face were distinctly visible in a misty light. It was, beyond question, the presentment of the deceased woman.

The next witness to whom my guide introduced me was a Mrs. Radburn—a determined-looking dame of about threescore, who had enjoyed the dangerous honour of partaking Mrs. Accleton's couch, and had been aroused one night by a pressure on her elbow. The room was so light that, mistaking it for dawn, she prepared to rise, when a clock struck two, and in the same instant she became aware of the spectral presence. It stood between her and the window. "Patches of light" were about the room, as it went "flustering" through the chamber. All the witnesses alluded to coruscations of some description, which invariably accompanied the spectre.

A very well-mannered and intelligent woman, Mrs. Griffin, who had nursed the deceased and performed the last offices to the dead, was roused at the usual hour, by the same cause. With more nerve and self-possession than her neighbours, she, though conscious of the presence of the unearthly visitor, determined to baulk it.

"I 'steered' my eyes through the room, sir, and said, 'My old wench, you shan't know I'm seeing of you.'"

The phantom, however, or curiosity—or both—exercised some compulsory power, and Mrs. Griffin did gaze at the spectre, which looked "bold and impudent," and wore a dark mottled gown and white cap, in which she had been dressed for the grave. Streams of brownish light proceeding from her seemed to direct themselves towards that portion of the ceiling where the trap-door was situated.

Now, the circumstance of these brown rays always pointing in one direction, coupled with certain conjectures engendered by the deceased's miserly ways, seems to have elicited a suggestion that "something" (money, peradventure) might be concealed in the loft before-mentioned, and an appeal was at length made to the nephew and executor, Mr. Hart, to permit a search. That gentleman himself proceeded to the house, and, assisted by Mrs. Accleton, who held the ladder by which he reached the trap, crept into the loft. It was totally dark, and the candle he used was thrice blown out by the eddying draughts before he reached the inner recesses. Suddenly, he called out that he had found a parcel, and flung down into the room a bundle of old deeds. Another minute and he cried out again, and hastily descended, carrying a large bag, secured with twine, and covered with dust and cobwebs. On opening it notes and gold were found to a considerable amount. On being asked if he did not seem astonished or elated at such a discovery, Mrs. Accleton replied that he displayed much agitation, shed tears, and said that "now he trusted the poor soul would rest in peace."

The hope was not immediately fulfilled. On the fourth day after the discovery just related, the noises re-commenced worse than ever. Hart now proceeded to examine more closely into the affairs of his relative, when certain debts were disclosed still existing against her estate. These were scrupulously discharged, after which (the "dead year," as Mrs. Radburn called it, being up) all disturbance ceased.

Such are the facts of the Barby ghost, detailed, by those questioned, with all appearance of sincerity and good faith. They were undoubtedly respectable, and seemingly religious persons, impressed with a deep reverence for things Divine. It may have been fancy, still the idea crossed my mind that the wonderful visitation to which these poor people believed themselves to have been subjected, had had the effect of somewhat refining their coarse natures, and imparting to their language and manner a degree of dignity not usually characteristic of their class in life.

On taking my leave of them I inquired whether the reverend rector of Barby had not expressed doubts of the story.

"Yes, yes, sir," was the prompt reply. "Mr. G. may think so, and say so; but seeing is believing, and twenty good gentlemen, like himself, could not convince us four sane persons against the evidence of our own natural senses. Mr. G. has not seen what we saw."

"THE HIMALAYAN SLOPES."

To the Editor of LIGHT.

SIR,—“Vera,” I see, is one of those who can perceive that it would not be possible for the “Brethren” to communicate their full knowledge to the world, because the world cannot yet “bear” it. It is still in the period of “shells and husks” when forms of religion are more thought of than religion itself.

Did they (the Brethren) attempt to impart their knowledge it would be utterly misunderstood—looked on as blasphemy and the ravings of madmen, and do more harm than good. Its possession (which word here includes assimilation) leads to the absolutely “Christ-like” life, which is not necessarily one which blazons itself before the world.

The true “secret of Hermes” is incommunicable, and must be acquired by each man for himself. The only thing that can be done for him is to point out the way. That way is the development of the Divine spirit within us—the “At-one-ment” on every plane, physical, intellectual, moral, and spiritual. Let him that would learn “try without ceasing.”

OBITUARY.

On January 21st, at 39, Avenue de Ségur, Paris, Madame Rivail (widow of the late Allan Kardec), aged 88 years.

AN APPARITION.

The following narrative may be relied upon as strictly true. We have the name of the writer, who is a gentleman of the highest respectability and integrity:—

In the year 1868 I was, with my regiment, quartered at Meerut, in the North-West Provinces of Bengal. I was in the habit, like many other people, of going during the hot months as often as practicable to the hill station of Mussoorie. The distance was usually accomplished, in those days at least, in about twenty-four hours. At Mussoorie I became acquainted with Colonel —, who had formerly been in the King of Oude's service. Colonel — owned many houses at Mussoorie, was a pleasant, affable man, was very fond of music, and very hospitable. I saw a great deal of him on the occasions of my visits to Mussoorie, and, during the few years which immediately preceded the year given above, I constantly met at his house a Mr. and Mrs. B., who were, in fact, relations of my own. They were Colonel —'s tenants, invariably renting from him for the season one of his houses, which was situated close to that occupied by Colonel — himself. Mr. and Mrs. B. were very musical. Mr. B. had a beautiful, soft, tenor voice, whilst Mrs. B., though singing well, especially songs of the German school, was invaluable as an accompanist to her husband. The evenings spent at Colonel —'s were invariably musical. The cheery Colonel himself played the flute, and the cornet-à-piston, to an accompaniment on the piano by his daughter—a tall, well-grown girl for her years, but at the time I speak of not more than sixteen or seventeen years of age. Sometimes the Colonel varied the amusements of the evening by snatching up a guitar and singing either some serenade full of moonlight and lovers' vows, or he would mimic, with irresistible drollery, the songs sung by native minstrels to charm, as they imagine, the English ear.

The year 1868 had come to a close. With the termination of the season of course all European visitors had returned to their homes in the plains. In the ordinary course of relief my regiment was ordered to Cawnpore, and from that time I lost sight of Mr. and Mrs. B., whom I left behind at Meerut. That they were happy in their conjugal relations I knew was not the case. I knew that he was much younger than his wife—that he was much sought after for his beautiful singing, and that his wife had already, on one occasion, condoned some flagrant act of his on the most solemn promise of amendment. I cannot, without referring to friends at a distance, give the dates of what follows; but I believe that it was in the beginning of 1869 that society was shocked by hearing that Mr. B. had, in consequence of renewed unhappiness with his wife, shot himself. He shot himself at Meerut, at about eight o'clock in the evening.

On that night, Colonel —'s wife and daughter were together in a bedroom at ten p.m. The former had already got into bed; the latter was brushing out her hair by a cheval glass, and in her night attire. Suddenly the girl exclaimed: "Oh, mamma, there's Mr. B.!" "Where?" cried the scandalised mother, clutching and pulling up the bed-clothes. "There, mamma! Do you not see him? There—he says: 'Good-bye, Sissey—good-bye!'" There, now he's going—now he's gone!" An immediate alarm was given; the room, the house, the garden were carefully searched, without obtaining any satisfactory clue to so extraordinary a scene in a lady's bed-chamber. Colonel — closely questioned the girl, who not only positively adhered to her previous declarations, but now detailed the clothes worn by Mr. B. as he appeared to her. Two days afterwards the post, and newspapers, brought to Mussoorie the news of the suicide of Mr. B. Colonel — and his wife did not communicate the fact to their daughter for some days, as they thought that since the night when she seemed to have seen Mr. B. she had been strangely depressed. When the fact was gently broken to her, it had such an effect that never from that day was any allusion ever made either to the occurrence itself or to the name which was connected with much that evidently had a strong affinity to the young girl's mediumistic tendencies.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.—With the view of testing the possibility of meeting the necessary expenses of the Sunday services at St. Andrew's Hall, by regular personal subscriptions, the Council of the Lyceum respectfully invite such support. In the event of that method promising success, the question of making the services absolutely free to the congregation, as such, will be promptly considered. Earnest Spiritualists should visit the hall at once, judge of the work going on, and of its chance of reaching outsiders, and then determine whether it deserves the encouragement suggested. Particulars of to-morrow (Sunday) evening's service will be found in the advertising columns.

"CONFESSIONS OF A MEDIUM."

With intense interest many friends on the Continent, among whom the above-named book is in circulation, became acquainted with many of the tricks which some so-called mediums impose on their too credulous dupes. Without accepting in toto the conclusions drawn, we are bound to say that the descriptions of the séances, the sayings and doings of the "spirits," and the different types of sitters, are true to the life.

We can give you the assurance that many items from the Continent, as given in the work, are confirmed by the most fashionable and solid inquirers in Holland and Belgium. There is no reason to doubt that it is not the same in England; at least, we witnessed many séances there just like those depicted in the "Confessions." Moreover, it is ridiculous to pretend that a man cannot be believed because he once cheated and afterwards made a clean breast of it. What would be the consequence if the courts of justice thought likewise?

Most of us think the work a precious contribution to the impartial study of Spiritualism, and consider it to be of great use to truth-seekers. If there is any truth in Spiritualism, and we think there is a good deal in it, that truth cannot be overturned by the imitation of real phenomena.

It is high time, however, that the eyes of honest truth-seekers were opened, and Spiritualism purified from the many dark spots which discredit it. Hiding the head under the wings may be ostrich-like, but Spiritualists must not imitate this stupid "trick." We repeat our conviction that the book merits a careful perusal, and will make a good deal of tricking and cheating impossible in the future. Truth above all.

You have my name, and I remain, dear Sir, truly yours,

R.,

Honorary Member of the C.A.S.

The Hague, January, 1883.

[There are two sides to the question which our correspondent raises. We have read the book to which he refers, and we know, of our own knowledge, that some of the incidents related are so grossly misrepresented as to throw discredit on the rest. No doubt there have been dishonest mediums and too credulous Spiritualists; but as a rule mediums are just as honourable and Spiritualists just as acute and sensible as other people.—Ed. "LIGHT."]

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON &amp; THE PROVINCES.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL

14, NEWMAN-STREET, OXFORD-STREET, LONDON.

The address on Sunday evening last, delivered with great power and freedom through the mediumship of M. Morse, was upon the question of the miraculous or sequential character of the accepted fact of Immortality. With Spiritualists the answer must be regarded as a "foregone conclusion," while with the outsider it is becoming daily more evident that unless the sequential issue can be successfully maintained, the alternative, as the lecturer put it, is gradually drifting to the single form of uncompromising denial of the alleged truth, because of the increasing unwillingness of educated thinkers to admit the possibility of miracle. With a prompt directness of speech, admirably calculated to awaken interest, the lecture opened with a quotation of the inquiry, "If a man die, shall he live again?" and, although this was not the question before us, it gave opportunity for a pointed contrast between the Christian faith and the scientific thought of the age, which, under an avalanche of doubt, treats the problem as at once unsolved and unsolvable. "Ask of Heaven," says the orthodox believer, who himself, as a rule, has no misgiving of the natural heritage of his soul; but this does not help one who is indisposed to listen to such appeals. It is a melancholy reflection that a faith claiming to be the only Divine religion the world possesses, should be thus associated with doubt, should be unable to supply its adherents with evidence or proof,—involving the certainty of knowledge—precisely because of the self-created difficulty resulting from assigning immortality to miraculous agency. By affirming that "the gift of God is eternal life" a limitation is, in terms, introduced, which favours the believer with a species of ecclesiastical sugar-plum, while imposing an impossible condition upon the mass of mankind. If such a position or such a process of selection could be truthfully maintained with regard to immortality, there would be only one regret open to us, and that would be that we are immortal, for it would be infinitely better to remain here and struggle and fight for progress in the world as we all know it, doing our manly best, and taking our chance of the questionable hereafter. In an eloquent outburst, after Tennyson, we were then charged to ring out every old falsehood, and every hoary wrong and superstition; and to ring in, with the Christ that is to be, every truth, and fresh and living inspiration. Immortality as a sequential fact, as a feature of continuous life, is in conformity with what we know of nature everywhere. Do not be alarmed by that dreadful word evolution. It is said to be destructive of spirituality; to take God out of life, the soul out of humanity. On the contrary, an intelligent appreciation of evolution places God the firmer on His throne, supplies a surer basis for all philosophy, makes truth the outcome of accepted experience, establishes the correlation of all the forces, the interdependence between all the departments, of being; for evolution is true of all social, intellectual, and spiritual conditions. Civilisation, too, is developed, and even under occasional decay preserves the elements of renewed advance. The world today is what the thought of the past and of the present makes it. And the analogy holds with children, whose very life involves immortality. From the earliest stage of recognised existence there grows an immortal soul, and there is developed from such apparently unpromising material, a Bacon, a Shakespeare, a Goethe. In the infant life are bound up the potentialities of gigantic forces, and the growth of these is but the extension of its inherent powers, with nothing miraculous at all about it. Side by side with the external aspect of things is an internal relation. There is another realm of forces, and unfailing spiritual development becomes as easy and as certain for the expression of intelligence as is the bodily growth of the chubby little dimpled scrap, which presently takes mature form as the red-handed warrior, or the large-hearted sympathetic woman whose active philanthropy influences the character of a nation. Sequence is clear everywhere, and miracles have an awkward habit of dropping to pieces whenever examined minutely. With sequence the self-hood is maintained, and however relatively inferior to his fellows a man may be, if the option is given him, he prefers to remain himself. Yes, the forces of life are continuous, and immortality then becomes the greatest of personal blessings, carrying forward the element of progress and humanity in its best and noblest forms, which are, in truth, the counterparts of the Divine. Approaching then the specific evidence, the lecturer spoke of those who have come to the front, more particularly during the last thirty years, when they were thought to be slumbering quietly beneath the gravel or the sod. They have come, and they come now, knocking, knocking, knocking, and when presently we respond, it is found that of those who were regarded as dead the individuality is there awaiting us. They appeal to the heart and to the understanding, and the people who indulge and encourage this intercourse are called Spiritualists, the very mention of whom provokes a cold shudder and their dismissal to an exceptionally hot place. Nevertheless, the leaders of thought and the preachers of religion must reckon with these unpopular investigators. They are a growing power and they are irrefragable alike in philosophy and morals, for they say they have proof!—proof which all may get for the seeking—proof of the continuity of life, of mind, of the affections, of all that makes us severally the individuals we represent. Upon this proof we get into accord with the higher impulses of being, and reach an assurance of conviction which is, after all, latent in the conscience of every child of man, and sustained, as a sequential fact, by the accepted analogous teachings of mundane science.

The first of the "Humanity" course of four lectures at this hall will be delivered on Sunday next, the 4th February, and a specially interesting series of associated readings will be concurrently introduced.

BIRMINGHAM.

On Sunday week it was my pleasure to be with some of the Birmingham Spiritualists, and to see the healthy and improving state of their public meetings, as carried on by Mr. and Mrs. Groom, and Mr. Gray. These friends have ever been ready to resign and leave others to do the work better; to receive assistance; or to work without. The last is their present position; and they are unmistakably doing well for the cause they love. They have the sympathy and support of good audiences. On this occasion, Mrs. Groom delivered an excellent address under inspiration, on "Let there be light." It embraced a wide range of thought, showing the various channels through which the light of love and wisdom reach humanity. It was followed by three extempore poems chosen by the audience on—"The Mind," "Justice," and "Love," which received the enthusiastic appreciation of the audience. Mrs. Groom then proceeded to give clairvoyant descriptions of the spirit friends of a great number of strangers present, which were publicly acknowledged to be correct. Overwhelming evidence has been given at these meetings of the reality of clairvoyance, and of the continued existence of departed friends, and it seems a sad loss that detailed reports should not reach the public through the Press.—A. J. SMYTH, Liverpool.

GLASGOW.

The members of the Glasgow Association of Spiritualists had a treat of no ordinary kind on Sunday evening last, the platform being occupied by Mr. David Duguid who, in response to a request made, had consented to tell the story of how he became connected with the subject of Spiritualism. Mr. Duguid spoke for over an hour, telling of incidents and adventures which to strangers present must have seemed far removed from the possibility of events in the nineteenth century. Nothing could have been of more interest than the story of how, step by step, Mr.

Duguid felt his way till he became a Spiritualist, and one of the most celebrated mediums. It is to be hoped that some of the incidents narrated will be put in writing for publication, as they are well worthy of preservation, and have not hitherto been recorded. One event may be here set down. Mr. Duguid had occasion some twelve years ago to cross the Sound of Mull in an open boat, in very squally weather. Half-way across, the water became so tempestuous, the wind having meanwhile increased in violence, that "fear took possession of the fishermen's hearts" and they hurriedly resolved to put back to shore again. This resolution, however, was strenuously, nay, fiercely opposed by Mr. Duguid, who was distinctly aware of the presence of his "invisible" friend, Jan Steen, the Dutch painter. The latter gave Mr. Duguid clearly to understand that the safety of himself and the other occupants of the boat depended on their pursuing their journey. Hence Mr. Duguid's insistence on this course, in preference to that suggested by the boatmen. By dint of tough pulling and skilful management, they ultimately weathered the storm, and reached the other side in safety. As he was leaving the boat, and mentally noting with gratitude this last "providential intervention" on the part of a familiar spirit and friend, judge of his surprise when one of the boatmen made known the fact that he also had seen the form in the boat; by asking Mr. Duguid who the "man" was to whom he was seen speaking in the midst of the storm. Gifted with that faculty of "second sight," which is by no means uncommon among the Highlanders, the boatman had witnessed the physical Mr. Duguid in conversation with the spiritual Jan Steen. Mr. John Robertson occupied the chair, and, on introducing Mr. Duguid, referred to the value and importance of his life's work, every phase of spiritual phenomena having been manifested through his mediumship.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—On Sunday evening last, Mr. Rowe, of North Shields, lectured from the platform of the N.E.S. upon "The Influence of the Art and Literature of Ancient Greece upon Modern Thought." The discourse was a carefully considered and well-digested one, and highly creditable to the lecturer, who strove, with considerable force of reasoning, to show how the inspired endeavours of the past had echoed their presence to the great and lofty inspirations of modern life. Mr. W. C. Robson occupied the chair. The latter gentleman met with a warm reception from the members, he having rejoined the Society after about a twelvemonth's separation, caused, as will be remembered, by the methods adopted by the then ruling powers. We are pleased to observe that the new executive are, in an admirable manner, doing justice all round, and in an energetic way performing good work in reducing the large debt left to them. We believe that about £27 has already been promised, if not actually received, for the purpose.

GATESHEAD.—The platform of the Gateshead Society was on Sunday evening, the 28th, occupied by Mr. Livingstone, trance-speaker, of Hetton-le-Hole. His subject was an exposition of "Spiritual teachings as a higher and more commendable religion for humanity than the harsh and erroneous dogmas of old faiths." While the lecturer commended in a most generous spirit the beauties of some of the older creeds, he nevertheless declaimed in energetic language against some of the theories which are often put forth in the name of Christianity, but which are altogether at variance with the teaching of Jesus. Mr. Burton occupied the chair.—NORTHUMBRIA.

ROCHDALE.

During the last ten years the Rochdale Spiritualists have passed through a series of vicissitudes. Within the last two years, however, the Society has assumed a somewhat more prosperous condition. Great efforts have been made by the secretary, Mr. Lewis Firth, who has been ably supported by the other officials. There is now every appearance that these efforts are about to be crowned with success. On two occasions recently, Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten, under the auspices of the Society, has paid visits to the town, and been the means of creating a greater interest in the subject of Spiritualism. She is to pay another visit on Sunday, the 11th February, when it is expected that she will have the opportunity of addressing good audiences, the lectures on this occasion being free, reliance being placed on voluntary contributions for payment of expenses. Mrs. Britten will speak as before in the large room of the Central Stores. In the morning a social gathering will take place at the Society's room (corner of Milnrow-road), when it is anticipated several Spiritualists from the surrounding localities will relate their experiences in connection with their investigations into the Spiritual philosophy.

MISS FOWLER'S TESTIMONIAL.—Will you kindly inform your readers that I have been appointed hon. secretary to the above? Persons wishing to contribute will kindly forward their subscriptions to J. F. Young, Trafalgar House, Llanelli, South Wales. Acknowledgments will be made, by your kind permission, in your columns.—Yours truly, J. F. YOUNG.

We have been asked for the name of the author of "Wonderings," a title poem which recently appeared in these pages. We regret to say that we do not know. It was copied many years ago from a book the title of which has been forgotten.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliottson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning, Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübke, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

Is It Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism and also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER, AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct sances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful sance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Some time ago, I commented on a very striking paper in the Journal of Science on some points connected with the development and reproduction of the Protozoa, and raised some interesting questions respecting personality and individual identity arising from them. The January number of the same journal contains some further reflections on organic individuality that are full of suggestive interest. There are, it seems, animals concerning which it is difficult to say whether they are independent beings or parts of some larger totality. These are the compound or colonial organisms, such as the sponges, the hydra, and the like, which are at first produced from a single egg, and are so far entitled to be regarded as individual; but which—e.g., the common serpularia, or sea-fir,—consist again of multitudes of animalcules, each capturing and digesting its own food, until it dies, and is replaced by others which spring not from eggs but from buds. Which, in such a case, is the individual? The whole spray, or the animalcule? It is not easy to say. Take the fresh-water polype known as the hydra. Cut it transversely, longitudinally, obliquely, as you please; each section starts life on its own account, and throws out at its sides buds, each provided with tentacles and with a mouth for capturing and absorbing food. Each such bud grows, is detached, and begins life for itself as a distinct animal; and frequently before this it puts out buds and exercises all the normal functions of animal existence when united to its parent. All the time the hydra can reproduce itself from eggs. We are therefore quite unable to say whether one of these odd little beings has sprung from egg or bud. In the former case, it is an animal: in the latter, it is only a bit of an animal, without individuality and separate identity.

These are complex and perplexing considerations. They find a convenient illustration in the case of a particular kind of water-worm which is thus described:—

"It is provided with tentacles at the head, and with a pair of leg-like processes attached to each segment. If one of these creatures is observed for a sufficient length of time it will be found to be constricted at some point towards the hinder part of its body. The part behind the constriction or narrowing grows in length, gains more segments, each with its legs, and develops a head with eyes. But it still for a time remains attached by its head to the mother, from whom it derives its sustenance. It may happen that before the young individual has become fully perfected, and detaches itself, a third portion begins the process of assuming a distinct organisation. Thus Professor Müller found three individuals adhering together in one length in a manner that may be familiarly illustrated by a link of sausages. 'The mother had thirty footed segments: the youngest daughter, or the one nearest the mother, had eleven, but the head was not yet developed. The most remote had seventeen rings, with a head and eyes, and the tail of the mother. The intermediate specimen had also seventeen rings and a head.' Successively these portions, as they become fully developed, detach themselves and start on an independent career, producing new individuals in the same manner."

Our ordinary terminology is not adequate to describe these very mixed relations. Whatever consciousness these creatures possess must be common property up to the time of separation. If a cat was reproduced similarly it would be an interesting inquiry, which is the Pussy that jumped on the table and upset the inkstand two months ago? And it would be impossible to say!

There are, then, phases of life accessible to our investigation wherein the problems of personality are by no means such as we can settle. We get from their study a warning against assuming that all life must necessarily exist on the lines of our own. The mystics hold that the human body is the highest conceivable shrine of spirit, being made in the image of God. We are accustomed to think that there is no difficulty in proving identity, and that "the return of the departed" with some superficial utterance that is capable of a kind of verification, is "proof-palpable of immortality." But occasional excursions into unknown domains of life, and pondering on the lessons, so learned, suggest care in coming to conclusions.

My notes on Psychopathy have brought me a number of interesting communications to which I find it impossible to reply individually. Many of my correspondents give cases of healing not different in kind from those to which I have already drawn attention. The multiplication of such cases does not produce any confirmatory effect on my mind. One carefully tested case would go further than a thousand more or less loosely recorded cures. This exact verification is, however, lamentably difficult of attainment. The editor of a little evangelistic journal called Word and Work seems, from the number which has been sent me (January 4th, 1883), to have tried to verify an alleged case. He is (I am told) a qualified physician, and he is assuredly not indisposed to welcome evidence of that healing by the prayer of faith which he would expect to find in a time of revival and spiritual upheaval, such as this is. His experience is not encouraging. He proceeded on the same plan as that which I ventured to lay down as satisfactory. Selecting a case, which "offered fair opportunity of testing the claims advanced" he offered to submit it to personal investigation.

The invitation and offer met with no response, or rather, was evaded by the lady in charge of the home, who wrote simply to explain its objects, and to refer to two or three physicians. This, says the editor, "is not satisfactory." Certainly not. Still less satisfactory was it to be referred by the editor of the Christian Herald (in which paper the Bethshan report originally appeared) to "a young woman who professed to be cured of hip disease, accompanied by shortening of the limb." The editor very properly refused to have anything to do with such a case "for reasons which medical readers will appreciate." He "deliberately chose what he recognised as a crucial instance of miraculous (sic) cure," and he offered to examine it. The refusal or evasion of that request is regrettable, but not very surprising to one who has experienced the difficulty of getting at real facts in these cases.

Another record of healing is furnished in a pamphlet called "The Healing of Sickness by Scriptural Means. By Karl Andreas." The method adopted by him is to follow, with all the minute precision with which a medical prescription should be treated, the passage in the Epistle of St. James (v. 14-16) which orders anointing with oil by the elders of the church, and the prayer of faith that "the Lord may raise" the sick man up. He demands from the sick person unquestioning faith in the claims made, and belief in the possibility of the miracle of healing in response to prayer. He requires a literal following of the Apostolic directions; and regards "personal holiness" in the "Elder" as essential. It is not pretended that any virtue resides in him or her, nor any efficacy in the oil. To the writer's simple faith it seems enough that these means were once prescribed, and that a promise is attached to their employment. "Any deviation from that passage, in word or deed, or ministering in unbelief, will cause disappointment, as experience has shewn. Even the unbelief of persons present in the sick room . . . and whom mere curiosity brings there, will counteract or bring to nought, partly or wholly, the prayer of faith." This is the claim: and one remembers that our Lord when He healed Jairus' daughter, "suffered no one to follow Him save Peter, James, and John," and that "because of their unbelief" His "mighty works" were once frustrated.

Of the cases recorded, most are not such as are valuable for scientific purposes, or can be adduced as good evidence. But some are very remarkable. I quote one as a specimen, and should be glad to know if Dr. C. is still alive, and can personally confirm the statements made in the subjoined narrative, which I give in Mr. Andreas's own words:—

"The wife of a medical gentleman, Dr. C., residing in London, had, through neuralgia and rheumatic fever, both her legs and three fingers of the right hand paralysed, so that she could not put one foot before the other, and her right hand was wholly shut. In this state she had been for upwards of four months. After all medical means possible had been tried, but all to no purpose, her husband wrote to me asking me to come and pray for her. I went there one evening of the first week in February last, and after I had explained the whole and encouraged her faith, I prayed over her with laying on of hands and anointing with oil with the words, 'Jesus of Nazareth maketh thee whole.' Being done, I asked the lady if she thought that my word was true. She answered, 'I think so; just wait a moment, and I'll try to get up,' when assisted by her husband and myself she got up from her couch, and setting one foot before the other, she walked round the room four times, and when her daughter came in she walked once more round the room, as she said, 'to give another witness for Christ.' Having after this sat down again on her couch, the lady said to me, 'Now, Mr. Andreas, I can shake hands with you, which before I could not do with my right hand,' upon which she shook hands several times with the once wholly clasped right hand, which now had opened. Dr. C. said now to me, 'As a medical man I can assure you that no power upon earth could have enabled my wife to put one foot before the other, for when one of the cleverest physicians in Gray's Inn Hospital was yesterday here, who is one of the greatest medical men in all London, we tried her, but it was impossible, and he proposed an experiment, for her to go for six months through an arsenic-cure; but,' added Dr. C., 'no medical skill upon the face of the earth could effect what you have been the means in God's hand of effecting, and I only just now got this couch for her, thinking that she would spend her remaining days upon it,' and he continued saying, 'Only two days ago I cut the nails of her right hand, and I had to get the scissors under to get to them, but now you see that hand is quite open, and she can almost straighten it.' A few days after, when I paid a second visit to pray for this lady, she was sitting in a chair close to the table, and holding with those once wholly paralysed fingers of the right hand a small stocking-needle; she was mending her husband's stockings, of which she had a regular pile before her. After that I prayed once more with her, which makes three times altogether, and on asking, as I was going to leave, when I should call again, Dr. C. said, 'Oh, Mr. Andreas, I'll send you a note, perhaps in a week or so, to say when we want you again, lest you should come and not find us at home,' but since that day I have neither seen nor heard anything of them, and of course I have not been, as it is scriptural to be called. Indirectly I have, that is through other people, received tidings that she is going on prosperously and improving fast, and from others I heard how this lady takes out-of-door exercise."

A SOLICITOR PLEADS FOR CANDID INQUIRY.

From the "Whitehall Review."

With reference to an article on Spiritualism which appeared in one of the recent numbers of the Whitehall Review, a cool, clear-headed country solicitor in large practice writes us as follows: "There is perhaps no one who is less superstitious than myself; but after giving the subject very full and careful consideration I am satisfied that a body of evidence exists amply sufficient to establish the existence of certain most extraordinary phenomena, not only outside of the present ordinary experience of mankind, but I may say opposed to it. This being so, it appears to me that a case has been made out for a calm, philosophical, and scientific investigation of the facts. It is of course hopeless to expect this from ordinary mortals. The way mankind has always proceeded, and I presume, always will proceed, is this: At the various points of their course from barbarism up to their present state of comparative enlightenment they have always assumed that they were fully acquainted with the whole natural laws and forces by which the universe is sustained; and whenever any one discovered a new law or a new force its truth was vehemently denied. In bygone times such discoverers probably suffered martyrdom at the hands of the Church, and in more modern times they have been howled down both by the public and the press (which latter usually swims with the tide), and every term of reproach and opprobrium applied to them. When Newton discovered the law of gravitation he was told it was a lie; when Galileo insisted that the earth turned round he was thrown into prison, and narrowly escaped with his life; when Franklin informed the Royal Society of England that he had drawn electricity from the clouds by means of a kite, they treated him with ridicule and scorn; when Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood, not only the public but his professional brethren laughed at him, said it was untrue, and called him a quack; and last, though not least, when Darwin, twenty-five years ago, published his 'Origin of Species,' a storm of abuse was hurled at his head which it is pitiful to think of, and there was no name under heaven bad enough for him. But before he died it was found that he had discovered a key which unlocked the secrets of the universe, and the same nation which had so abused him while he lived insisted when he died on his being buried in Westminster Abbey as one of their greatest prophets. Spiritualism is just passing through the ordinary course. The mob and the press are howling it down; but, howl as they like, it cannot be put down if, as I believe, there is truth at the bottom of it. I can see clearly that the facts are working their way, and whatever truth there is in Spiritualism must be recognised in time. But it is a most abstruse and difficult subject to investigate, more especially as for worldly purposes it is so often mixed up with deception and fraud. The only way to get at the truth is to collect the facts as far as possible and then sift them. In the beginning of all new sciences it must be expected that in endeavouring to do this a large amount of chaff and rubbish will be got with only a few grains of truth mixed up in it. This was the case, in the past, especially with electricity; but, by proceeding with regard to it precisely as the Psychological Society are now doing with regard to the extraordinary phenomena called Spiritualism, we see what magnificent results have been obtained. The true position now to take up is to maintain that there is a sufficient amount of evidence to prove certain extraordinary mental phenomena, and, that being so, the whole facts ought to be fearlessly and scientifically investigated like any other branch of science. This is the way in which our whole knowledge of the laws of nature—nay, our whole scientific knowledge—has been obtained, and there can be no reason why this method should not be followed in this as in other cases."

He who is indifferent to praise is generally dead to shame.

THE DOCTRINE OF "SHELLS."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—As this is a question of extreme importance, practically no less than philosophically, and we have been largely referred to in the discussion of it in your columns, and our teaching impugned, we shall be much obliged if you will allow us to supplement "C.C.M.'s" able exposition of the Theosophical doctrine concerning it by some remarks tending to elucidate it yet more fully.

For the attainment of a sound conclusion upon any subject, it is indispensable that there be, first, sound premises; and secondly, sound reasoning from those premises. For, however excellent in itself may be the superstructure constituted by the latter, it can have no stability unless the former also be secure. It is the second only of these conditions which has been fulfilled by the Hon. Roden Noel. He has reasoned correctly from his premises; but those premises are in themselves defective. Hence, notwithstanding the knowledge and skill displayed in his superstructure, it lacks that first condition of stability—a firm foundation.

The consequences of this characteristic of Mr. Noel's treatment of the subject are, even to his own position, disastrous in the extreme. Not only does he deprive of their only possible explanation some of the principal and most incontestable facts of spiritual cognition; but, even while seeking to uphold the current orthodox presentations of the doctrines of the Trinity, the Logos, and Creation, he, in denying the possibility of differentiation of the Ego, and ignoring the differentiation of Substance, makes the Trinity, the Logos, and the Universe, one and all alike impossible!

This assumption—so fatal—of the indivisibility of the Ego, has its rise in a misconception of the nature of the Substance and the constitution of the entity concerned. Mr. Noel not only treats as simple that which is complex, but, in likening the astral envelope, or "Shell," to a material fabric, such as a coat, and arguing that the former is, when separated from its central Ego, as devoid of consciousness as the latter, he compares things which differ so essentially as to have between them no point of similitude, and which are, therefore, incapable of comparison, namely, living, conscient Substance with lifeless, manufactured stuff.

The following account of the nature and constitution of the individual system will render the Theosophical position clearly intelligible. Taking it for granted that those of your readers who are sufficiently interested in the question to follow this discussion, have already made themselves familiar with "The Perfect Way," we shall refrain from repeating what we have there said respecting the fourfoldness of the constitution of Existence, and come at once to the question of the nature and mode of distribution of Consciousness.

Remembering that Spirit is Consciousness, and that, therefore, all differentiations of Spirit—the material, the astral, and the psychic—are modes of Consciousness, originally proceeding from and indefeasibly permeated by Spirit—it becomes obvious that the consciousness of the Ego of any individual system consists in the sum total of the consciousnesses of all its individual particles, and, though single, is the resultant of the innumerable minute individual personalities which, bound harmoniously together, compose the system.

The consciousness of the Ego thus resulting depends, necessarily, both in quantity and quality, upon the character and condition of the constituent elements of its system. Consciousness, therefore, is not so much a Thing as a Condition, as the following illustration will shew. Let us imagine an incandescent globe, consisting of several concentric spheres or zones, each zone of course containing all those which are nearer to the centre than itself. Of this fiery ball the radiant point, or heart, occupies and constitutes the innermost and central zone; and each successive zone constitutes a circumferential halo more or less intense according to its proximity to, or remoteness from, the radiant point. But each such zone is secondary and derived only, and is not in itself a source of luminous radiation.

This illustration applies alike to Macrocosm and to Microcosm. In the human kingdom the interior zone, which immediately contains the radiant point, the Divine Spirit, and is Nucleus to its Nucleolus, is the Soul, Psyche. And by this one indivisible effulgence the successive zones are illuminated in unbroken continuity; but the source of this effulgence is not in them. As his radiant point is the Divine spark, or spiritual Ego, so this effulgence is Consciousness. And inasmuch as Spirit is Consciousness, and Consciousness is manifold, and all things are modes and manifestations of it, the Ego, though One, comprehends in its Unity many personalities. Were it not so, there could be no Universe, no Man; but only one point of Light, spreading no rays—a thing against reason and altogether impossible, since it is the very nature of light to be radiant, that is, to emit itself.

Similarly, in the human system, Consciousness emits Consciousness, and transmits it first to the astral, and last to the material man. First, that is, to the Amina bruta, which, after death, constitutes the Phantom, Ruach, or "Shell;" and, last, to the physical body. But the more concentrated the Consciousness, the brighter and more effulgent the central spark. And every part of man is conscious in its own mode and degree, and capable of independent expression. Thus, in the phenomenal manifestations of Somnambulism, either the Anima Bruta and the physical body exhibit consciousness, while that of the soul is suspended; or the soul exhibits consciousness while that of the spheres exterior to it is suspended. And the part which remains conscious (a thing dependent on the characters and desires of the person or persons concerned in the manifestation) is capable of reflection, of thought, of memory, even of intelligent invention, according to its kind and its endowments. For, in being diffusive, Consciousness is also divisible.

Now, if from our supposed incandescent globe we take away the central radiant spark, the whole globe does not immediately become dark; but the effulgence lingers in each zone according to its position in regard to the centre, the outermost first becoming dark. So is it at the dissolution of the man. From his outermost and lowest sphere, the physical body, the consciousness speedily departs. In the shade, Nepesh, which is an emanation from the dead body, as the "Astral" is from the living,—Mr. Noel seems to confound the shade with the Ruach—consciousness lingers a brief while. In the Ruach (Anima bruta, astral soul, or Shell) consciousness lasts long, it may be for many centuries, according to the strength of the lower will of the individual, manifesting the distinctive characteristics of his outer personality. In the soul, the immediate receptacle of the Divine Spirit, the consciousness is everlasting as the soul herself. And while the Ruach remains below in the astral sphere, the soul—Psyche—obeying the same universal law of gravitation, detaches herself and mounts to the higher atmosphere suited to her, there to undergo purification prior to her further evolution; unless, indeed, she be wholly gross and devoid of aspiration, in which case she remains "bound" in her astral envelope as in a prison.

For being an agglomeration of all the essences of the myriad consciousnesses which compose the human system, the soul is as the apex of a flame—its upper, purer, and intenser part—having for fuel the body, and for lower part the astral sphere. And from these it is separable as is a flame from its fuel, or as one part of a flame from another part, yet leaving an energetic flame behind it; and it is capable of transference to other affinities as a flame is transferable from one mass of combustible material to another.

Meanwhile the Ruach, or astral Shell, on its detachment from the soul, continues to operate in the same manner as before such separation, just as does Mr. Noel's hypothetical old coat after he has ceased to wear it. For to everything belongs its proper behaviour. The coat holds its parts and its warp and woof together; and maintains its colour, shape, consistency, and all other of its characteristics, after he has parted with it. It was a coat when he wore it. It is a coat still.

And so with a man's astral Ego. In his lifetime its proper function was to reason and think electrically (as distinguished from psychically). It is not a coat; it is Substance having life. And when the Soul puts it off, it continues to be what it was; for it is of thought-nature, and it keeps its nature as does the coat. And just as it would be a miracle were the coat, on being discarded, to change its nature and become something else than a coat—say, non-material; so it would be a miracle were the astral phantom, when the soul separates from it, suddenly to change its nature and become something else—say, non-substantial, and devoid of the characteristics it hitherto possessed. Matter remains matter, and psychic substance remains psychic substance. Mr. Noel would make differentiation in the substantial world impossible, a procedure of which the consequences have already been indicated.

This, as we have remarked, is not only a philosophical but a practical question, and we now come to the latter aspect of it. The phantoms of the dead resemble mirrors, having double surfaces. On one side they reflect the earth-sphere and its picture.

of the past. On the other they receive influxes from those higher spheres which have received their higher Egos—these consisting, as already described, of the most sublimated essences of the lower. The interval, however, between the two is better described as of condition than of place or time; for these belong to the physical and mundane, and have no existence for the freed soul. This is because there is no Far or Near in the Divine.

The Ruach, however, has hopes which are not without justification. It does not all die. The soul, on attaining Nirvana gathers up all that it has left in the astral of holy memories and worthy experiences. To this end the Ruach rises in the astral sphere by the gradual decay and loss of its more material affinities, until these have so disintegrated and perished that its substance is thereby enlightened and purified. But continued commerce and intercourse with earth adds, as it were, fresh fuel to its earthly affinities, keeping these alive, and so hinders its recall to its spiritual Ego. And thus, therefore, the spiritual Ego itself is detained from perfect absorption into the Divine.

The Ruach survives only in so much of it as is worthy of such recall. The astral sphere which it inhabits is also its place of purgation. And "Saturn," who, as Time, is the "devourer of his own children," even those who being born only of Time have in them no Divine, enduring element, devours the dross, and suffers only that which is ethereal to escape.

This "death" of the Ruach is gradual and natural. It is a process of disintegration and elimination extending over periods greater or less according to the character of the individual. Those which have belonged to evil persons, having strong wills and disposed earthwards, persist longest and manifest most frequently and vividly, because they rise not, but being destined to extinction are not withdrawn from immediate contact with the earth. These are all dross; there is in them no redeemable or redemptive element. The Ruach of the righteous, on the other hand, complains if his evolution be disturbed. "Why callest thou me?" he may be represented as saying, "Disturb me not. The memories of my earth-life are chains about my neck. The desire of the past detains me. Suffer me to rise towards my rest, and hinder me not with evocations. But let thy love go after me and encompass me. Rise thou with me through sphere after sphere."

Thus even though, as often happens, the Ruach of a righteous man remains near one who, being also righteous, has loved him, it is still after the true soul of his dead that the love of the living friend goes, and not after his lower personality represented in the Ruach. And it is the strength and divinity of this love which helps the purgation of the astral soul, being to it an indication of the way it ought to go, "a light shining upon the upward path" which leads from the astral to the celestial and everlasting.

A knowledge of the physical is an indispensable aid to the comprehension of the metaphysical. The chemist is well aware that a great number of substances which to ordinary observation appear indubitably simple, both in their nature and in their operation, are in reality complex and divisible. Thus, water, once universally regarded as an element, is now known by all to be a complex substance composed of two elements united in invariable proportion, and easily divisible into its factors. The same occurs with a number of chemical bodies which, though behaving as simple in many combinations, yet are divisible by analysis into several elementary substances. To all ordinary perception these bodies appear simple entities, since they exhibit affinities as such; but when the right test is applied, they dissolve and separate into their distinct constituents.

Similarly with the human body. The material of the brain is constituted of countless cells and connecting fibres; and each cell has its own consciousness according to its kind and degree. Nevertheless the resultant of all these concordant functions is one Perception and one Consciousness. There is also a consciousness of the nerves, another of the blood, and another of the tissues. There is a consciousness of the eye, another of the ear, and another of the touch. And so with every bodily organ. And all these work continuously in the body, each according to its kind and its order; yet the intellect of the man knows nothing of it. And if one of these living organs be interrogated, it answers after its own kind.

If, then, man comprises in his own physical body so many diverse parts which he can neither direct nor discern, why should it appear strange that his ethereal Self should be similarly multiple? The Anima bruta is as an organ of the Spiritual Man; and though it be part of him, its acts, its functions, and its consciousness are not identical with those of the Anima

Dieing. Consciousness is divisible, and diffusible, in man as in God, in the planet as in the universe. And One Law is throughout all; for "He who worketh is One."

SELF-CONSCIOUSNESS AND DIVINE PERSONALITY.

Although I hope that to no one besides Mr. Haughton will my sentence, "Even if we admit that the One Being must be perfectly self-conscious," seem to imply the opinion that "He is only dimly self-conscious, not quite sure whether he is alive or not," I may point out that the question is not between perfect and imperfect self-consciousness, but between what consciousness can, and what it cannot contain, or be. In that sentence I was supposing that in the Being of God, there are not, as in man, latent or dormant potentialities of form and action, but that in His consciousness the infinite evolution or development is already manifest. Mr. Haughton must pardon me a smile at his naive assumption that "we are perfectly self-conscious," a smile which was irresistibly broadened as I imagined to myself Mrs. Penny's consternation on reading that singular proposition. And when he further tells us that consciousness is "buried out of sight," that "we infer it from its effects," and that it is "the exact opposite of the phenomenal," I must simply confess my inability to conceive what he can possibly mean. But, judging from the alternative he presents to us, I should expect that, with a little agreement upon terms, Mr. Haughton would find himself to be a professor of that philosophy of illusion from which he at present begs to dissent.

In all philosophy there is no more ambiguous term than self-consciousness. According to the now prevalent view, the Ego stands only for the unity of consciousness, and the Ich Denke is only the representation of that unity. For a true self-consciousness, or cognition of self, there must be a direct intuition of the Ego as subject—the subject itself must become object. But in such an intuition the distinction between subject and object necessarily and ex hypothesi disappears. For otherwise the object would not be the subject itself, but only a representation of the subject. Now such a complete identification of subject and object is directly opposed to the conception of a personal consciousness, in which this duality is always present. The thought of the Ego can only arise in distinction from the non-Ego. The self-consciousness of God, as Being, would thus give, not "I," but just "Being." It was, of course, in the other, and only really conceivable sense of self-consciousness, as the consciousness of the totality of subjective "content," that I spoke in the passage so curiously misunderstood by Mr. Haughton. But this "content," thus manifest in consciousness, is not being, but ex-istence, a distinction first explicitly pointed out in modern philosophy, I believe, by Fichte, and recognised in the dynamical process of Seyn and Daseyn by Hegel. The clear apprehension of it is one of the conspicuous merits of that remarkable book, "The Perfect Way." In man, it is hardly necessary to repeat, being is only partially existent. All our hope of immortality, all our potentialities of development, presuppose this. We may conceive a supreme and unifying consciousness, in which is a pleroma, a completed fullness of manifestation. But such an intelligence, could it say "I," by so saying, by so opposing the universal self to the universe, would assert Being, other than Existence, other than Consciousness, other than all that even its own consciousness could contain or manifest. Behind Isvara is Brahman. C. C. M.

SPIRITUALISM IN INDIA.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Allow me through your columns to express the hearty thanks of the members of the Colootollah Spiritualist Society, to the friend who has kindly sent to them two copies of "Gleanings from the Spirit World," and also to Mr. William Oxley for his offer to send to the Society a few valuable books, viz., "Angelic Revelations concerning the Origin, Ultimatum, and Destiny of Human Spirits," and "Philosophy of Spirit, with a New Version of the Bhagvat Gita," in pursuance of the request which Mr. Eglinton, who had been always so kind to them, made on their behalf to those interested in the spread of Spiritualism abroad, in "LIGHT" of November 18th last. They also take this opportunity to thank publicly Mr. Eglinton, whose favour and kindness they hope to continue to merit always, as also of the other English friends willing to contribute to its progress. I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

HEALING MEDIUMSHIP IN FRANCE.

DEAR SIR,—I have translated the following from the last issue of the Bulletin de la Société Scientifique d'Etudes Psychologiques of Paris. It is signed by M. Ch. Fauvety, the president of that society. I am sure it will interest many readers of "LIGHT."—Yours truly, J. D.

In one of the poorer quarters of Paris cures have been, and are still being, performed, by imposition of hands, &c. The subjects are mostly poor; many of them have been treated unsuccessfully at hospitals. The healer asks for no payment. What good he does is, he says, for the love of God and of humanity. Orthodox practitioners could gain nothing by prosecuting a heterodox therapist like this, so he goes on in his work unmolested.

The healer's name is Hippolyte. He is between forty and fifty, and is in the business of a watchmaker with his father, a hale and upright man of eighty. The house affairs are managed by a worthy daughter of twenty; two adopted orphan boys complete his household.

In the room at the back of the shop early every morning the daughter is ready to receive sick visitors, giving to each a number in the order of which each will be attended to. At nine o'clock Hippolyte begins and keeps at his work of healing until past noon, and then he goes to the watch-making and mending by which the household is supported.

With respect to his method of treatment, it may be said that Hippolyte has none. He says that as soon as rapport is established between the patient and himself—which seems to be pre-requisite—he has impressions as to what is out of order and what he has to do; sometimes his hands are used to make passes; sometimes somnambule sleep then comes on, in which communications are made through the patient about his case, and what he, the patient, must be told to do, or not to do, to help in the cure. In chronic cases the method generally pursued is evidently calculated to rouse into activity the will and organic forces of the patient, in aid of which Hippolyte magnetises with manipulation. In these manipulations he declares that he is moved by his "spirit guides." In many cases the patient is evidently subjected to the operation of some force acting internally, making him, or enabling him, to execute such movements as are necessary for bringing long disused parts into orderly use.

Various members of the committee of the Society have with me, and without me, watched Hippolyte's treatment, and all concur in recognising in it agencies beyond those of the magnetiser and those of the patient as individuals; and we concur in thinking that if they do exercise any agencies of their own they are also aided by other forces governed by intelligence, and in all cases with the result of positive cure, or palpable amelioration.

Being convinced of the reality of the facts we think it our duty to publish them in the interest, not only of science, but of humanity.

The maladies we saw cured included paralyses, neuralgias, gouty and rheumatic affections, diseases of joints,—some condemned to amputation at hospitals,—spinal disorders, suppressions, &c. As many as thirty patients came some days, of both sexes and all ages. The following few cases will illustrate some of Hippolyte's modes of proceeding; they are from a note containing more written for me by him:—

"A youth suffering from epilepsy was brought to me after much orthodox treatment. As I spoke to him he went into a fit of fearful severity; he foamed at the mouth and his face was livid. I felt myself moved to lay my hands upon him, my right to his heart, my left to his head, and to direct my gaze to his throat. He presently came out of the fit, passing into the somnambule sleep. Then, in answer to questions, he said,—or it was said through him,—that the exciting cause of his fits was fright occasioned by some mischievous companions; he then predicted the day and hour of the next fit, and said he would be well and would not need treatment until then. When he returned to ordinary consciousness he had no memory of what had been said through him. I got his promise to come on the day named. He came in accordance with the promise and went into a similar fit, but less strong, exactly at the predicted hour. My hands were applied as before; the fit lasted but a few minutes, he passing again into the somnambule sleep; in it came another prediction that the next fit would not be until after twenty-one weeks, and date and hour were named; that the fit following that would be at a still longer interval and would be the last. The fulfilment of these predictions is looked forward to with complete confidence.

"A. Delavigne came, after long and fruitless treatment by the faculty, with chronic articular rheumatism and cold swelling of wrist, and hand, and fingers, quite disabling her from her work of lace-making. In this case the action of a spiritual force upon the inner mechanism of those parts was manifest. While treating her I felt the impulse to put a wooden roller under her hand, and upon this roller, without her own volition, and without any aid from me, her hand was exercised for three hours with intervals of rest. This was repeated at every treatment. Sometimes the bare hand would be made to beat the table forcibly with blow after blow, without any effort of her own, as if to rouse the internal parts of the limb into action. She completely recovered and returned to work.

"A neighbouring tradesman asked my attention to the case of a lady-customer of his. Three weeks previously she came to his shop to make purchases, and while doing so her little boy, who accompanied her, fell down some cellar-steps. Thinking he must be killed—but he was not hurt—she, being weak, having just got about after her confinement, fainted and fell. She was carried home, for it was found that all power had left her lower limbs. She had been under medical treatment ever since, but with no good result; she was getting very weak, had lost desire for food, and was almost sleepless. She came in an invalid's chair and was carried in.

"After the first treatment of twenty minutes she was able to walk to her little carriage. The next day, while under treatment, she passed into somnambule sleep. In it she spoke of her internal condition and predicted coming pains, from reaction, and their duration. At every subsequent treatment she passed into the sleep, assisted with directions, and predicted her full restoration; or all this was given through her. At the end of six weeks, her visits having become less and less frequent, she felt quite well. Her last visit was to tell me, with radiant and grateful countenance, that she had been invited to a soirée dansante, and had found that her limbs had entirely regained their full strength and activity."

M. Fauvety says that although people not poor find their way to Hippolyte, the greater number are very poor, as may be judged from the circumstance that on the table were always tickets for bread placed at Hippolyte's disposal by the Conseil de Bienfaisance of his district; there was also a wooden bowl to receive the small contributions of the less poor for him to distribute among those who needed better nourishment than their own means afforded, or to pay omnibus fares for those unable to walk.

BIRTHDAY CONGRATULATIONS.

SIR,—I am going to inform you of something that occurred a short time since in my house. I was seventy-two years of age, and my wife and myself were sitting against the fire at about 9 p.m., and I remarked to her that this was my seventy-second birthday, and that I had not had a birthday present in all my life. In a short time we went to bed, at about 9.30. I had got to bed; my wife knelt down in the dressing room to say her prayers. She had only said a few words when the spirits began rapping joyfully all over the room. That room is next to the sleeping room. My wife got off her knees as she was a little timid. The rappings were truly wonderful. I said to my wife, "You need not be afraid; you know what they are; they are giving me a congratulation of my birthday." The rappings then were more numerous than before. I will just say that rappings are a common occurrence in my house on the furniture, &c. I oftentimes converse with them by raps. Sometimes they speak to me, but I thought you would not mind my giving the above particulars.—I am, dear sir, yours truly,

PIECES JUSTIFICATIVES

OF THE NEED OF A SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

The last case I gave was one wherein thought-transference appeared to merge into true clairvoyance, the testimony being that of the "editor of a large provincial paper in the North of England," who sent me his report at the request of Mr. Thomas Bell. Prior to this I had received the following letter from Mr. Bell, which records a sitting with the same sensitive, and is a striking corroboration of the testimony received from others. It is quite possible that my own more recent failures with Miss F. may be due to her seership, for such it really seems to have been, having now passed away. On this point I should be glad of information.

CASE III.

October 14th, 1876.

"SIR,—I observe from the Daily Telegraph that you are seeking for information as to whether or no one mind acts on another. Perhaps the following statement of a fact that came under my personal notice may interest you :—

"In December, 1874, I had occasion to go to London at a few hours' notice on business. On attending an appointment I found the gentleman had other engagements which compelled him to defer our meeting four or five hours. I therefore made a call, without previous arrangement or acquaintance, on a lady named Miss L. F., living in Princes-street, Regent-street. During conversation she appeared to go into a dreamy unconscious state. She then told me, without my giving her the slightest clue as to who I was, the name of the town I came from, the nature of the business (law) I had come about, how it would be settled, and when I should return home (I had a return ticket on me); she then correctly described the appearance of my house, stated that it belonged to me, that I was making extensive alterations, and that I had a misunderstanding with a neighbour about a runner of water. She stated that I had a large family, the sons being all in business—except one, who was at school in a large house at a distance—and my daughters being nearly all married and having families. She described the personal appearance of my wife and named her little likes and dislikes. She described the habits and personal appearance of my father, who died twenty-nine years previously, and stated what he died of. She described the personal appearance of a son of mine who died twenty-two years previously, giving me the exact age then if he had been living. She also gave me details of my private affairs that are not generally known. It may be alleged that all the foregoing was mind-reading, but now comes a curious fact pointing to a different conclusion. A few hours before I had left the North, and within twenty-four hours of my interview with Miss F., I received a telegram from Middlesborough stating that a vessel belonging to me was wrecked, and the captain much injured. Up to the time of my interview that was all I knew. She told me of the wreck and the captain's injury, she described the position the vessel was laying in, the nature of the damage she had received the fact that I had only recently insured her, but that nevertheless I should sustain a heavy loss. I asked if the vessel was stranded on a sandy beach; she said 'No.' I asked if she was on the rocks. She said 'No.' And whether she was on a bank of shingle. She said 'No.' In fact she said, 'she is on something like rocks, but they are not rocks.' On returning North, and getting the surveyor's report I found all her statements, with trifling exceptions, correct, the vessel really having run on a deposit of iron furnace slag or scoria at the mouth of the Tees.

"I remain yours faithfully,

"THOMAS BELL."

Professor W. F. Barrett, Dublin.

In a subsequent letter Mr. Bell writes :—

"I cannot think Miss F. knew anything of me; I only visited her that once, and I have never mixed with the so-called Spiritualists of London. Mind-reading cannot explain all she told me, as she informed me of things—such as the details of the shipwreck—which were wholly unknown to me, and of many other things which were long past and completely forgotten by me."

In a further letter Mr. Bell states that even a more interesting case than that of Miss F. had lately come under his notice, the sensitive in this case being the wife of a clerk in a merchant's office in Newcastle-on-Tyne. He writes :—

"The silent action of the mind of those present on the sensitive certainly does not explain all the facts, for I have frequently asked for a reply to things I knew, and willed, and the answer has come, 'I don't know.' On the other hand, a question was put as to where Meyerbeer's opera of 'L'Africaine' was first played in public. The reply was 'Berlin.' We thought it was in Paris and said so. The answer was: 'I beg your pardon; it was brought out first in Berlin under a different name and failed; it was thereupon withdrawn. The plot was re-written and some years after the piece was brought out in Paris.' On inquiry, we found this actually to have been the case. Here was a case clearly where information was given that none of us knew at the time, and certainly appeared beyond the probable range of knowledge of the sensitive."

The concluding evidence in my possession relating to Miss F., was kindly sent to me by Mr. Hensleigh Wedgwood, who writes as follows :—

"My last experience with Miss F. was, like yours, wholly worthless, but when she was here before I had a very striking one. She said she saw a large commanding looking man who seemed to be my father; he had some title, I think she said, but am not quite sure as to that, but she said he seemed to hold some office. Then she went on to cough and put up her hand to her throat and intimated that he died of choking. All this agreed exactly with my father-in-law, Sir James Mackintosh, who held the office of Commissioner to the Board of Control at his death in 1831, before Miss F. was born, and of whom, of course, she never heard. He died in consequence of a chicken bone sticking in his throat."

As I have already said, I do not hold myself responsible for the accuracy of my informants, but each case must stand on its own merits.

W.F.B.

THE S.P.R. AND THE C.A.S.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am greatly obliged to you for your prompt reply to my inquiries, and for the emphatic denial you have given to the hushed rumour which I had heard that the Spiritualists entertain unkindly feelings towards the S.P.R. I could not believe that there was any truth in the report, but I think good will be done by your assurance that the most friendly relations exist between the two bodies.—Yours truly,

A STUDENT.

[We cannot even guess what could have given rise to so absurd a statement, for which there is not the slightest semblance of foundation. How is it possible that Spiritualists should view with any other feelings than those of the completest satisfaction, the operations of a Society which is doing such excellent work—work in the accomplishment of which every true Spiritualist must rejoice? To be in any sense unfriendly towards the S.P.R. would be to be wanting in fidelity to some to whom Spiritualists owe a debt of lasting gratitude—notably to "M.A. (Oxon.)," who, at the first conference convened by Professor Barrett, succeeded by the judicious proposals which he put before the meeting in giving life and form to the new Society, who has worked heartily with it ever since, and who certainly would not be found in active co-operation with any movement by which the interests of Spiritualism could be jeopardized. No! there is no unfriendly feeling—and there is not likely to be.—ED. "LIGHT."]

THE MAGNETOSCOPE.

It may not be inapt, before proceeding to more special mention of this extraordinary instrument, to advert to a class of incidents familiar enough to the majority of readers, and which may be described as "phenomena of the death-chamber."

Innumerable are the instances of strange intercommunication between the departing spirit and those to whom its earthly affections were most strongly bound. How is it possible to resist the multitudinous testimonies that such things have been, from pre-historic ages to the present, of constant occurrence? One is forcibly reminded of the words of Imlac, the Sage,—“There is no people, rude or unlearned, among whom apparitions of the dead are not related and believed. This opinion, which prevails as far as human nature is diffused, could become universal only by its truth.”

The eye and ear are alike, in turn, subjected to this mysterious influence. Often the impression is distinct and defined as the material being. Such was that appearance of Lord Lyttelton—narrated in a former paper—at which Mr. Miles Peter Andrews was about to throw his slippers, as at an untimely jester!

Sometimes it is a vague, uneasy, intermittent consciousness, such as that experienced by the Count de M., mentioned in Miss Knight's interesting autobiography :—

"The Count, when minister at Stockholm, was staying at the house of the Count d'Uglas, while the Countess, with her invalid daughter, had gone on to Paris. One morning he told his host that he had passed a most distressing night, having continually seen a kneeling figure—sometimes on one side of the bed, sometimes on the other,—and that though the back was always turned to him, he could well recognise it as his daughter. While speaking, he sketched the figure from memory, and it did, in fact, exactly resemble hers. On comparison of dates, it appeared that the young lady had died at the hour at which her father first became sensible of the spectral presence."

Miss Knight recounts this incident on the authority of the Countess d'Uglas herself.

Such revelations, through the sister sense—that of the ear—are in equal abundance.

A lady, within the circle of my acquaintance, was residing at a watering-place in Kent, at the distance of many miles from the place where a relative, to whom she was warmly attached, lay seriously ill. While sitting alone one evening, there was a slight tap at the door. It was repeated, and my friend rose and opened the door. In the act of doing so, she distinctly heard a soft familiar voice say, "It is I."

At that hour her friend had expired.

A lady known to my sister, was, some twenty years ago, in close attendance on her father, who was suffering from an illness that almost forbade hope of recovery. As she was one evening reading to the invalid, who was seated in his easy chair, she was interrupted by a tap at the door; her "come in" not being followed by the entrance of any one, the reading recommenced, but was again interrupted by a more emphatic tapping. Miss W. then rose and opened the door. No one was to be seen. Somewhat perplexed, she returned to her seat, but had scarcely resumed her book, when a third time the summons was repeated, and now as it were, impatiently. The sick man rose from his chair. "That is for me," he quietly said, and, opening the door, went into the passage. The next moment he sank upon the floor, and his daughter, running to him, caught his last sigh.

Instances of a similar kind may be multiplied by the score, but these may suffice to introduce a theory of possible explanation, to which attention has not, in my opinion, been sufficiently directed. Electricity—powerful magnetoid currents—can, as every one is aware, be generated in the human frame, and even become controllable by the will. Hence "vitalised electricity"—(its scientific name)—has been the subject of much discussion and experiment, to which the work of Dr. Dubois Reymond, of the Academy of Sciences, Berlin, led the way. If simple variations of temperature can produce such results as we have seen in a former paper ("The Domestic Ghost"), what may not be expected when powerful electric currents, subject to laws and conditions with which we are as yet but imperfectly acquainted, contribute their eccentric influence? Such phenomena declaring themselves within the narrow limit of a house or chamber, might occasion no surprise to the scientific observer. But how, at an immeasurable distance, can these all but immaterial agents act thus strenuously on the material? Mind, says philosophy, is a self-moving force. Agreed. But can it move anything else? Thought may fly to thought, as the detached vital current, attracted by its affinities, shoots through the void, and reveals itself, almost as an actual presence, to one far distant. This may be conceived—but how dull, inert matter can be made obedient to an influence essentially sympathetic, is a more perplexing question. It has been truly said by Herschel, that principles—not phenomena—are the fitting objects of study. It is none the less true that the latter frequently guide the way to the former.

Returning to the subject of the electric currents, the power of which to move substances has been abundantly proved (the old magicians knew something of their value—See "Les Bigarrures du Seigneur des Accords,")—need we search beyond their irregular action for an explanation of those remarkable incidents which have been known to accompany the last great change? Strange concussions, atmospheric movements, the ringing of bells, &c., &c., as the electric current darts along the readiest conductor; the actual displacement of heavy inert substances before the silent force of the gaseous combinations suddenly leaping into life; these, and such-like phenomena occurring in the hush and shadow of the chamber of death, may well have acquired a character of the supernatural. It is not in such scenes that the mind readily inclines to philosophical investigations. The half-revealed realities of this perishable sphere lose their grandeur and interest, as we stand gazing into the infinite, whither a beloved soul is hastening, while the ever prompt imagination avails itself of the temporary anarchy of thought to invest that which is, in truth, "such stuff as dreams are made of," with the importance of a real thing. Thus, while a strange circumstance may be impressed indelibly on the memory, the opportunity of tracing out its origin has, for obvious reasons, been permitted to pass away.

One observation more, before we turn to the special subject of this paper—the Magnetoscope. Less liberal than the inquirers of old, who met together expressly to tell or to hear some new thing, and while doing so, caught the first dawn-streaks of the glorious Christian day, the sacans of our age evince a marked disfavour for any "new thing" that presumes to make its appearance unfettered by a recognised authority. The door of Areopagus is shut to nameless men, and the stamp of learned societies is necessary to render the new theory admissible within the pale of discussion. Should the poor bantling, born perhaps of some neglected student's brain, become importunate, he is either floored—and expected to consider himself so—by one blow of a scientific bludgeon, or hustled back, with shouts of derisive laughter, into the obscurity from whence he came.

To those unacquainted with the Magnetoscope, I may be allowed to say that it is a very simple instrument, invented by Mr. Rutter, for the purpose of testing the operations of the fluid essence discovered by Reichenbach, called "Odyle," more subtle even than electricity, which, as readers know, is itself seven hundred thousand times finer than air. This "Odyle" besides producing analogous phenomena, further manifests itself where magnetism does not; in many chemical processes, in vitality, crystals, friction, sun and moon spectra, polarized light, &c. The experiments of Dr. Leger, some years since, were beginning to render the magnetoscope familiar to the public, when the premature death of the professor, leaving his analyses and observations incomplete, withdrew the instrument and its capacities from general notice. The magnetoscope, which can be constructed for a few shillings, and on which any one who pleases may operate without danger or difficulty, is prepared thus:—

A brass rod about a foot long, crowned with a brass disc the size of a florin, is screwed upon an immovable base, such as a heavy table, stone floor, or wall. From beneath the disc extend two arms, one composed of wood or metal (conductors of electricity), the other of animal matter, such as whalebone or porcupine quill (non-conductors). From either arm depends a silk of equal length, with a pendulum of equal weight. The operator places his middle finger lightly on the immovable disc which crowns the instrument, when the pendulum attached to the conducting arm acquires a certain movement (greater or less, according to the nerve power of the operator), while the pendulum from the non-conducting arm remains perfectly still. This proves beyond question that the magnetic current passing through the operator's frame—and that alone—supplies the motive power.

The next extraordinary feature is the manner in which this subtle agent, after shewing that it can govern inert matter, is itself governed by the mere will, thus leading to the conclusion that the will of man is in itself a natural force. The mental process by which these currents are directed, involving a peculiar state of the nervous power, is difficult to explain in a few lines. I am, at this moment, dealing rather with results, and it may be enough to add that I myself, among others, enjoyed many opportunities of witnessing the exercise of this will-power upon the instrument, not only by Dr. Leger himself, whom I knew well, but by those who carefully followed his directions. Dr. Leger's command of the instrument was indeed extraordinary. With his thin finger lightly resting on the immovable machine, he caused the pendulum to vary its oscillations from rotatory to elliptical, from north to south, from east to west, according to previous announcement, or to the chance suggestion of a stander-by.

In the further—and the last—extraordinary characteristic of the magnetoscope, there mingles an element of fancy—so to speak—which might, nevertheless, had Dr. Leger been spared to complete his investigations, have resulted in the discovery of a scientific truth. The doctor had persuaded himself that to every phrenological organ there was found to belong one—and one only—of the seven different oscillations of his magnetoscopic pendulum, i.e., normal rotation, elliptical, or oval, N. and S., E. and W., N.E. and S.W., and S.E. and N.W. By placing his left middle finger on the organ to be tested, and his right, as usual, on the brass disc, the doctor observed that the pendulum began invariably to move in the direction belonging to that organ, the amount of movement indicating the degree of development. According to this evidence, therefore, it would become possible to ascertain, with much accuracy, a man's dispositions and character without the least knowledge of his previous history.

So fascinated was Dr. Leger with what he regarded as a discovery fraught with many beneficial results, that, neglecting for the time his analytic pursuit of the wondrous fluid-essence which was its origin, he started on a tour, and, with his silent oracle, made the round of most of the gaols and lunatic asylums in the kingdom, astonishing governors and doctors with his impromptu biographic sketches of those under their charge, extending, in many cases, even to the very delinquencies for which the criminal portion had been made responsible. I was indebted to a friend of the deceased professor for an opportunity of inspecting the reports of these examinations, most minutely tabulated by the former, and embracing no less than 883 cases.

One point of difficulty will naturally present itself, on which, however, had the doctor lived to complete his work, some light might have been thrown. Conceding that the magnetoid currents are subject to the operator's will, in what manner, when employed in divining character, can their independent action be secured? Say that the doctor's subject, for the time being, happened to be a gaol ruffian of repulsive aspect, and strongly-developed malific organs, might not the former's secret conviction that his subject was a consummate scoundrel unconsciously prejudice the will that rules the currents that govern the instrument? Fine as was the adjustment of the doctor's invention, far finer was the adjustment of that which he did not invent—the human will.

Quitting, now, its phrenological connection, let me be allowed in a few words, to invite attention to the point at which I would arrive—a possible solution of some of the so-called supernatural events of which our social and domestic history is full. Although these currents are, of course, manifested in the healthy as well as the morbid subject, it is in the latter only that their extreme development and eccentric action attract attention. Hence, it may be reasonably inferred that a diseased condition of the brain, in which this fine fluid is generated, is the real parent of the phenomena. In Morell's "Mental Philosophy," much stress is laid upon the instinctive operations of the nervous system, and the power which ideas exert over the physical functions of the body. "Abnormal though they be, they are often highly suggestive of very important truths in connection with that dim and almost unknown region which lies between the conscious and unconscious life of man." Thus, for example, the mind wills, and the hand writes in obedience to its dictates; but that reflex current which perpetually returns to the great sensorium the consciousness of the hand's act, may be wanting. And the curious question has been raised, whether it may not, by affinity, when thus detached, be attracted by, and made to act upon, the morbid system of another?

It must always be held in mind that, knowing as yet but imperfectly the conditions of these fluid agents, we cannot logically assign any precise limitation to their field of action. Electricity needs no artificial agent to direct it to a distant point.

In referring to the possibility that the eliminated force may be attracted to the morbid system of another, so as even to affect the external senses of the latter, a field of consideration is opened, which, fairly examined, might lead to the explanation of a very large class of extra-natural incidents—such as, for example, the supposed warnings of another's death.

With the approach of the last hour of mortal strife, the faltering mind sinks down, as seeking rest, on some familiar scene—"babbles" of its youth's green fields—searches out hungrily for a beloved face—drags from its grave, perhaps of many years, some remembrance exquisitely sweet. In that moment, the lines are laid for the transmission of the swift and secret intelligencer. Sight—that delicate sense, more easily deceived than any—but also, as Macbeth suspected, sometimes worth all the rest—recognises its advent. Soul kisses soul—the "spectre" (as we call it) is complete.

THE C.A.S.—The first meeting of the newly elected Council of the Central Association of Spiritualists, will be held at 38, Great Russell-street, at 6.30. p.m., on Tuesday next. As some important matters will come before the meeting, it is very desirable that there should be a full attendance.

SUBJECTION TO SPIRIT INFLUENCES.

SIR,—I have long been interested in the spontaneous exercise of a kind of mediumship by two lady friends of mine. I believe that their experiences, strange though they are, are by no means unique; and in the hope that some account of them may be of service to others, I send you this letter which one of my friends has written at my request. My own knowledge of the circumstances described is derived from occasional visits, when my friends have told me something of the experiences which they have been going through. I first learnt of them nearly two years ago. This involuntary writing and this guidance of the hand to form connected sentences out of words detached, seemingly at random, from the printed page had then only made its appearance some few weeks. My friends had submitted themselves entirely to the guidance obtained from these sources, and from the voices mentioned in the letter. They boasted to me that they had no longer a will of their own; they were more than content to submit themselves unquestioningly to this unseen control. But not only were their present actions regulated by this agency. Great things were promised to them by the same means. A mighty awakening was at hand for all the world, and a great part was reserved for them in the new era. A grand and mysterious destiny was dimly foreshadowed for them, and the price of it was their implicit obedience in the present.

I remember that what they told me then impressed me with a strange sense of reality. I knew my friends to be sane women, given to good works, and without any morbid excess of vanity which would render them a ready prey to self-delusion on such topics. My reason refused to accept all that they told me; but they almost forced me to believe, with them, that there was a real external power behind directing and informing them.

When next I saw my friends they had discovered that they had been deceived. They were, if possible, more convinced than ever that they had been under the control of spirits other than their own. But they had now learned to discriminate. Vexatious and misleading monitions, wearisome tasks, and tedious journeys undertaken in vain, directions faithfully followed, which had failed them at the critical moment,—all this had opened their eyes. They had again learned to use the light of their own reason.

Should any of the readers of "LIGHT" be sufficiently interested in this brief narrative to wish for more, my other friend has intimated her willingness to recount her experience also, which slightly differs from that here set forth.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

FRANK PODMORE.

London, January 20th, 1883.

DEAR MR. PODMORE,—In reply to your request that I should send you a condensed statement of my spiritualistic experience, I must preface such statement by another, viz., that it was not till months after that experience that I first became acquainted with spiritualistic literature. The friend who unfolded to me her own personal experience was theoretically opposed to Spiritualism, although, unconsciously, she introduced the subject to me. She urged upon me the possibility of being taught of God by means of allegorical drawings, and by guidance of the hand in writing, or in reading of the Bible.

The method I refer to is simply this:—I would place my hand upon the book or paper, keeping it perfectly quiet unless moved by an unseen agency beyond my own control; and this would occur quite as readily when I was alone as when in company. I would simply hold my pencil quietly at one edge of the large sheet of drawing-paper, in my friend's presence, and within three minutes it began to move rapidly, tracing a variety of curves and circles, always ending in a large Roman cross extending over the whole drawing.

The exact method of using the Bible for the purpose of direct teaching, is to place the fingers between the covers and open, if guided, at the page thus indicated, and then in the same manner the finger or pencil is moved by unseen agency till it stops under a word or part of a word. The character of this teaching might have been at first simply summed up as advanced Christian thought, giving emphasis and confirmation to what I already believed.

After two or three weeks I began to have directions in benevolent work through the same means, and one or two strikingly helpful, which entirely altered my course of action. About this time I first heard an inward voice speaking clearly to me. I had a very difficult work to accomplish, and the usual method of guidance was out of the question at the time, and the voice continually directed me, and proved of great service. It altered my previously determined course of action. At first I had only help and no contradictory directions. But after a little while I was much harassed by directions, which were false, viewed as a whole, although having a strange admixture of truth. I was drawn on insensibly to follow them only to find myself befooled. I was assured it was only a trial of patience, yet my outside life became more or less a torture; I became conscious there were forces at work—two forces quite distinct seeking to obtain the ascendancy over my being. The one voice was so exactly a counterpart of the other that I suffered very much in my desire to follow the true one.

At last the inward conflict brought on a horrible attack of neuralgia, which ended, I passed into a trance-condition and saw and heard that which I cannot repeat to anyone. The next night I was again in a state of trance, and this time among the heavenlies. There was apparently no connection between the trance experience and my previous spiritualistic experiences, beyond the fact that the good inward voice appeared to be with me throughout explaining what I did not understand, and when I came to myself it was the same voice which asked me whether or not I could bear to know that the glorious vision I had seen was not altogether as I had taken it. "It was of things yet to come." In a moment of time the freedom of my will was essentially regained, and the first step towards intellectual freedom also achieved. It would be difficult to explain to any save the initiated how complete up to this time had become the slavery of my will to spirit influences, nor, as far as my own consciousness is a safe guide, how unsought these voices had been on my part. It seems to me that my hearing voices was the result, not of any unconscious effort to hear them on my part, but from the attitude of my whole being towards spirit communion. Since then I have had my hand and pencil moved, and have occasionally heard a voice, much to my distress, as it has always proved false, but I have not obeyed any voice, nor written nor drawn anything, since that memorable day of awaking as from a dream.

Of the truth of Spiritualism in some of its fundamental doctrines I have no doubt whatever; they are burned into me. There may be others, like myself, totally ignorant of spiritualist teachings, and hence altogether unarmed against the subtle dangers which attend pre-eminently religious Spiritualism, and if my experience can help anyone I shall be very thankful.

You are quite at liberty to make any use you think best of this note except publishing my name.

APPARITIONS.

Visit of a Mother at the moment of death to a distant Son, and transcorporeal visit of the living Father to the same Son.

The writer of the following communication is suffering from a mortal and very painful disorder, which makes the effort of writing a great difficulty to him. But his anxiety to add his testimony to a discredited truth has given him strength to make the exertion.

H. WEDGWOOD.

"My father was a Baptist minister at Soham, Cambridgeshire. In the year 1849, being one of a large family, I went from home to begin the battle of life. There was great love between my mother and me. When I had been away about a year I was sent for in a hurry to see my dear mother, who was thought to be dying. I got leave of absence for a week and went home, and the last day before returning to business, while sitting by my mother's side, I said, 'Mother, if it is possible, when you pass away will you come and tell me?' She said, 'I will if I possibly can.' On the morning of October 7th, 1850, I awoke and felt like a soft hand touch me, and heard the well-known voice say, 'I am gone,' and something seemed to glide away from my side. I awoke the young man who was sleeping with me, and said, 'My mother is gone. She has just been here and told me so,' and just as I said it the clock standing on the stairs struck three. The news came to hand that my mother had died at five minutes to three. So that in about five minutes she had left the body and travelled between forty and fifty miles to me at Riseley, Bedfordshire, if the clocks agreed.

"In the year 1871, I was living at Seaview, Seaton Carew, going daily to Stockton-on-Tees to business. It was race week in August and so a busy time. I was going down into the cellar to fetch butter for a customer, and as I was on the top step I saw my father standing at the bottom of the cellar steps in his shirt and nightcap, and he seemed to walk into the cellar. I went down and fetched the butter and looked for my father, who was nowhere to be seen. I went up and said to my employer's wife, 'I must go home now, for my father will not last long, and wants to see me.' So on the last day of the races I started and arrived at Amersham, my father's residence, a journey of about 250 miles. On the Saturday afternoon I inquired of my sister how my father was at the time I had seen him at Stockton. She said he lay as if dead for more than half-an-hour; in fact they held a looking-glass to see if he breathed. He died November 23rd, 1871.

"When these things occurred I had never had anything to do with Spiritualism. If it was mentioned in my hearing I always made fun of it and called it superstition.

WHAT IS MATTER? WHAT IS FORCE? To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I must crave your kind indulgence for a little space that I may correct what seems to me to be a misconception on the part of your correspondent, G. D. Haughton, as to the meaning which I attach to a certain word in my letter of the 22nd ult.

In mechanical phraseology I understand force as the "rate of change of momentum." In physics, force has been defined as "the cause of motion," and in my use of the term I referred to that quality of matter which manifests itself in attraction, and which Balfour Stewart informs us is designated as chemical affinity when "exerted between atoms of different bodies, in contra-distinction to cohesion, which denotes the attraction between molecules of the same body." Tyndall further informs us that "a group of atoms, drawn and held together by what chemists term affinity, is called a molecule." It may here be urged that atoms are elementary bodies and dependent on exterior force for their activity, but with all due respect to the scientist, the assumption that because, as yet, they have been unable to sub-divide the so-called atoms, therefore these atoms must be the ultimates of matter, is to say the least somewhat untenable, especially if we take into consideration the ignorance of the scientists, as confessed by one of their number in the following words: "We know little or nothing about the shape or size of molecules, or about the forces which actuate them," and which are stated by the same writer to be "beyond the direct scrutiny of the human senses."

The fact that atoms are acted upon by ether waves, which form the lines of communication by which light and energy from the stellar universe penetrate to our own planet, is no proof that the atoms so acted upon may not in themselves contain the essence of life, or spirit. What is this "luminiferous ether" which surrounds all atoms? Science herself describes it "as a substance almost infinitely elastic;" if therefore a substance may it not be called matter? What then is matter? We have no evidence that a single particle of matter has ever been annihilated; it may pass through endless transformations but dissolution always involves reconstruction in other forms. Matter, for aught we know to the contrary, may be eternal, without beginning and without end. The modern theory of evolution tends to show that in Nature there is unity of development and action, and by this term, Nature, is meant not alone this material world on which we make our limited observations, but the boundless and ever extending Universe with its forces, energies and manifestations; the grain of sand and the largest of the rolling orbs of space being alike subject to, and moved by, the same inscrutable force. Thus it will signify little the distinction we draw between matter and spirit; we may almost call them inseparable correlative terms, for there can be but one primordial element—spirit—whatever form it may take for its manifestation. I would just add one further remark: that in this view of Deity, as not outside of, but the all-pervading essence of Nature, there is no necessity for a setting up of exterior communication.

LETTER FROM MR. D. D. HOME. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I find that you have copied in your journal a letter of mine printed in the Religio-Philosophical Journal of December 23rd, 1882. In speaking of Dr. D. as an "atheist" I was in error, inasmuch as it would seem that he firmly believed in God as a creative power. I ought to have qualified my real meaning by saying that his doubts were as to the identity of our individual immortality, and of this he was convinced by what he witnessed in my presence. I am too apt to consider those who doubt the continuity of our individuality in spirit-life, as unbelievers in everything, and the word "atheist" was written thoughtlessly. As this might occasion pain to any survivors, I desire to explain the oversight that I regret to have made.

May I request you at the same time to state that an article, published in a sheet known as Herald of Progress and copied in the Religio-Philosophical Journal of January 6th, 1883, entitled, "Mr. D. D. Home at Baden-Baden in 1857," is from first to last a fabrication, and wholly untrue! Any one who either knew me or who had assisted at a séance of mine would distinguish the falsity of the statements. The Duke of Sutherland never insulted me by offering me money, nor did I refuse to have a séance at Stafford House. I shall ever have a grateful remembrance of the kindness of his Grace and the Duchess to us when my wife was passing away.

The Prince of Prussia never offered me five thousand florins, for he knew too well my position and his father's interest in me.

As my first meeting with the Prince of Prussia was at once amusing and interesting, I may as well mention it here. The Emperor William of to-day, then (1857) Prince Regent, requested me, through one of his aide-de-camps, to call on him at 3 p.m. I went as desired and on entering the drawing-room I was received by a gentleman whose commanding presence agreeably impressed me, but as he began a series of questions more or less personal I became reticent and replied rather coldly. It was a relief when the door opened and the Prince Regent came in. I was taken aback when he laughingly said, "I see that I do not require to present you to my son, for you already know him."

The last time I saw his Majesty was in the year 1870 during the Franco-Prussian war, at a château near Versailles, and he said to me, "Ah, Mr. Home, when I relate the strange things I have witnessed in your presence they laugh at me, but that does not change the fact, and it is all truth nevertheless."—Faithfully yours,

D. D. HOME.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL.

14, NEWMAN-STREET, OXFORD-STREET, LONDON.

The subject of the lecture, by Mr. Morse, at this hall, on Sunday last, was "Humanity: its Birth." The treatment of the theme was comprehensive and complete in itself, although, as one of a course embracing also the life, death, and resurrection of Humanity, it should be regarded by the conscientious student as simply preliminary. The guides of the lecturer urged this consideration, and it is especially recommended by the penetrating character of the general views submitted, which were clearly framed to combine an appreciative analysis of the earlier stages of the career of Humanity, and to indicate the probably dominant ideas of the series, designed to complete the picture. The remaining divisions will be introduced consecutively, as quoted, during the current month. Humanity, then, as approached by the lecturer, does not mean either the bare history of the race, in its fame and its triumphs, its horrors and its miseries, or the surface conditions generally of the life of man, but rather those inner qualities and characteristics of our being, which distinguish us as by an elementary divinity. In this sense the birth is not yet consummated, for while the idea represents us as the outcome of the thought of the past and of the present, expressed in the intelligence, the morality, and the spirituality or religion of the human race, account must be taken of the capacity and resources of our nature, whose promise and whose unfoldment have still to encounter the remnants of the difficulties and of the opposition which have so long restrained its development. Thus regarded, the lecturer claimed a ready reverence for the one word "Humanity" as inclusive of the divine principle, and affirmed that the turmoil and the persecutions of the past would have been mitigated or subdued if the framers of human thought, the influential leaders of men, had seen it to be to their interest to recognise the claim. And the difficulty now is largely the result of erroneous conceptions of the origin and qualities of man. The doctrine of a perfect creation and subsequent universal depravity, still prevalent, has lent itself to every form of wrong, although, when the book of Being is interpreted by the works of God, these will never be found to contradict the Word, one form of which is mistakenly quoted to sustain the theory. When it is no longer thought to be a mark of morality and goodness to believe that the race is essentially deformed, and itself incapable of amendment, a truer view of the inheritance of Humanity will prevail: the reverence for life will be justified by the accepted potentialities of Being, and the power and place of many of the great of the earth will crumble away and disappear. When intelligence is not perverted to cruelty, when morality shall be found on the side of the highest right, when religion concerns itself less with creeds and the sanctification of wrong, and more with the inner conscience, so blessed a Trinity will bring to the stage of Earth a foretaste of Heaven, and perceptibly advance the birth of Humanity. The higher thought of the age recognises the situation and perceives clearly enough that the growth which can be already certified furnishes an indisputable guarantee of continued progress, alike for the race and for its individual members. Underlying the three suggested qualities, there is the social idea of Humanity, and this includes the industrial work, whose principle it is to minister to the needs and good of all, although in practice the preferential advantage of classes or divisions of men is still powerfully maintained. The problem of combining the social and industrial under more harmonious conditions, promising the greatest happiness of the greatest number, is one for the near future, and will probably press very heavily presently. For the race, however, which has already achieved so much, in the teeth of such formidable difficulties in other departments, it may be certainly predicated that a happy solution of the problem is not only certain, but that the process itself will help to build up those sterling qualities for which we contend as the inheritance of humanity. Reference was made to the common abuse of the word "selfishness," which, when not misapplied, furnishes the key to many of the mysteries of life. A selfishness which induces a hungry man to feed himself, a sick man to seek a physician, a fallen man to get up again as quickly as possible, is not inconsistent with regard for others; and the maintenance of the selfhood, fairly considered, is the parent of much of the sustained, persistent effort to overcome wrong everywhere, which eventually grasps and embraces all the higher, sweeter, and nobler attributes of human existence. When Humanity is fully born, the intelligence, morality, and religion of the world, with its allied social and industrial conditions, will be found to be in harmony with justice and love, and it is even now an urgent question for each of us, to determine how far we have individually helped or retarded the exhibition of the Divine qualities in the human form, or, in other words, how far we have influenced the "Birth of Humanity."

The subject of the address on Sunday next, the 11th inst., will be "Humanity: its Life."

LIVERPOOL.

Mrs. Britten and Mr. Irving Bishop.

Mrs. Britten gave two eloquent discourses on Sunday last, at the Concert Hall, Lord Nelson-street. In the morning the subject was "Spiritualism, the Science of the Age," and in the evening "The History and Status of True Spiritualism, versus Conjurers, Tricksters, and other Opponents." The evening's subject was a very attractive one, and the hall was crowded to excess. Mr. Irving Bishop was amongst the audience, and a large number of his sympathisers. Mrs. Britten, though said to be suffering from indisposition, on account of which the chairman (Mr. Lamont) specially besought the forbearance of her hearers, occupied more than an hour in the delivery of her oration, which was marked by considerable eloquence, and listened to very patiently. She claimed for Spiritualism that it underlay every religion in the world; without it there was no religion. The modern movement had systematised Spiritualism; it was no longer a miracle, and made communication with the spirit-world possible to every living creature. The power shown by tricksters and exponents of Spiritualism was nothing more than the crust or outward shell of the movement. Spiritualism never did, never would pay, and it was because tricksters, possessing medium power, having tried which would pay best, had appeared before the world as "exploders," that they had so confused the mind of the public, that men scarce knew what to believe. Spiritualism was a great science and a great religion; it was a demonstration of immortality, and in every portion of the world the spirit-telegraph was working, and every creature who had passed from this earth answered in the spirit, to the earnest inquiry "O spirit, how dost thou live?" "I am happy or I am miserable in precise proportion to the good or evil I have done on earth." Mrs. Britten, at the close of her address, invited questions, and added, "Let them be put now, and we will answer them, and don't put them to-morrow, when we are gone." Several questions having been put and answered to the apparent satisfaction of the inquirers, Mr. Bishop, who was greeted with loud applause, said that as a prominent Spiritualist, Mr. Fowler, had stated in letters to the newspapers that he (Mr. Bishop) was aided in his performances by spirits and he would make a first-class medium, he should like to know through Mrs. Britten, as she was controlled by the spirits, what they thought about Mr. Fowler's charge, which he declared to be wholly false. Renewed applause greeted the question. Mrs. Britten's reply was, that "if the questioner proclaimed himself to be a fraud, we should be glad to give him the credit. (Laughter, and signs of dissent.) If the gentleman positively asserts that that which he does is done by trick or any contrivance of a mechanical character we give him the benefit of his assertions. We only ask him to be kind and generous to us. In the spirit of fraternity, we give him the credit of performing the work he does by talents of his own peculiar kind. Why should he deny to the Spiritualists their assertions when they proclaim that they are controlled by spirits; that the phenomena they produce is not wrought by themselves? We believe every living creature is more or less a subject of spirit control. It is most probable that our questioner is aided in his performances by the spirits of a like character. (Laughter and confusion.) The best propagandists the world has ever seen are the exponents of Spiritualism. I believe our friend is doing a very valuable work in the propaganda of Spiritualism." Mr. Bishop asserted that his question had not been answered, and in this he had the sympathy of a large section of the audience, who applauded most warmly. Mrs. Britten, however, declined to be drawn into a discussion of the question, and the meeting ultimately broke up in disorder.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—On Sunday evening last Mr. Thomas Dawson, of Gateshead, lectured from the platform of the N.E.S., his subject being "Gleanings from the Harvest Field of Spiritualism." The speaker handled his subject in so admirable a manner as to draw from his audience the highest commendation. Mr. Dawson promises well as a platform speaker, and we trust he may have his ready faculty of speech utilised to its fullest extent. Mr. Kersey occupied the chair.

GATESHEAD.—Last Sunday evening Mr. John G. Grey gave to the friends of the G.S.E.S., an excellent address on "Spiritualism," which met with the appreciation of an attentive and fairly good audience.

ASHINGTON.—On Sunday last Mr. H. Burton, of the Gateshead Society, lectured from the platform of the Ashington Society. There was a large audience, who listened with marked attention to a discourse upon "Our Immortality," which was regarded by all present as one of the most interesting and instructive they had ever listened to. Mr. Greaves occupied the chair, and spoke in glowing terms of the lecture. He had in the past been led to understand that Mr. Burton had tendencies to Atheism, and had done his level best to enforce his views, but the discourse he had listened to that evening astonished him, being so distinctively and unmistakably Theistic.

MISS WOOD.—After the lecture a large company retired to the house of Mr. Winlow and held a séance with Miss Wood, of the most conclusive nature. The medium was thoroughly secured by tape and seals, which were found intact at the end of the sitting, precluding her moving in the slightest degree without being discovered. Little Pocha presented herself very clearly, and distinctly moved a short way into the circle, and chatted for a while, and retired. Another form about the size of the medium afterwards presented itself, and finally a tall form appeared at the opening of the curtains and made some peculiar signs with its right hand and arm, and was recognised by a company of friends from Pegasuswood. They afterwards stated that at their private circle Mr. Wake, a medium well known in Northumberland, passed over some ten months ago, and had promised to present himself at this sitting, and make the said signs as a mark of recognition.—NORTHUMBRIA.

GLASGOW.

On Sunday last, the platform of the Glasgow Association was occupied morning and evening by the Vice-President, Mr. James McDowall, the author of a series of papers on "Matter and Spirit," which appeared at intervals in the pages of The Medium during last year. Mr. McDowall is a working man of great mental capacity who has elaborated a system of philosophy, which for some time back he has expounded at the morning services. He is most patient as a teacher, a man gentle in speech and demeanour, and though his system as a whole may not be readily grasped, the members have to admire the many beautiful settings forth of truth with which his lectures are studded. In the evening Mr. McDowall gave his experiences in his early study of Mesmerism, and how the perusal of an old number of Human Nature, which he found on a book-stall, had been the means of first letting in the light on the subject of Spiritualism. Without rest he has followed the subject till now. Altogether the address was of an attractive kind, and at the close several questions were satisfactorily answered. Next Sunday Mr. John Griffin will speak, his subject being, "My Experiences, and the Teachings of Spiritualism."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. T.—The address of the Rev. W. E. Beardman, is "3, Rochester-square, Camden-road, N.W."

S. C. H.—Your communication on "The After-Life of the Lower Animals" shall appear in our next.

N. D.—You will find Mr. Home's present address at the foot of his letter on our 70th page.

F. S.—We will send a copy to the gentleman referred to if you will kindly favour us with his address.

A. E.—You should attend the Sunday Evening Lectures given by Mr. Morse, at St. Andrew's Hall, Newman-street, Oxford-street.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Frische, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning, Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübke, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H.I.H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H.S.H. the Prince of Solms; H.S.H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H.S.H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HODDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Hoddin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism and also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER, AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin. December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Mr. Spicer's interesting paper on the Magnetoscope came opportunely with a copy of Mr. Rutter's "Human Electricity," which the kindness of a friend enabled me to read in its transition through my hands to the S.P.R. It is an interesting book, worthy of careful study, which Mr. Spicer shews us how to apply usefully. I find, with the pleased smile with which one greets an old friend, that a certain Quarterly Reviewer was hard at work on "dominant ideas" as far back as 1853, and I turn with "expectant attention" to the close of Mr. Rutter's rejoinder, and find (as I expected) that he "is not prepared to assent to the absurdities which have lately been set down to the potencies of 'suggestion,' 'expectant attention,' and 'dominant ideas.'" No: and thirty years make us none the more disposed to heed them than Mr. Rutter was.

I note, with regret, the removal of one more prominent Spiritualist from the field of active work. Dr. S. B. Brittan, the "editor at large" of American Spiritualism, did for many years a very prominent work, especially in refuting objections and removing misconceptions respecting the subject of which he knew so much. He wielded a powerful pen, and used it fearlessly in defence of truth.

The moral reflections of the Spectator on the last "Methrathon" (as the Birmingham fortune-teller and wizard called himself) are almost as curious as the widespread belief in his pretensions which the trial revealed. It is not singular that a belief, which has been handed down from generation to generation from time immemorial, should survive in districts little touched by the fashionable scepticism in things spiritual: especially when their recognised teachers, "the established clergy, despise the whole set of ideas too much to speak of them," and therefore do nothing to direct thought and belief into proper channels. It is this ignoring, scoffing, contemptuous attitude that has so failed in all times, and so fails now, to make any serious impression on beliefs that are founded on reality, though they possibly and probably distort facts grievously and draw from them ludicrous inferences in many cases. The Spectator writer "can testify of his own knowledge to positive faith in astrology . . . as existing among fairly-educated persons!" I am happy to confirm him. I know several "fairly-educated persons" who have such belief as the result of careful investigation: and I venture to think that such knowledge is more excellent than the clergy's attitude of disgust that cannot bear to speak of what they have made no effort to understand. Yes: "Positive beliefs, hardly distinguishable from belief in magic, are still in existence in England:" and I make bold to say that it is better to deal with them, purify them of "superstition," and investigate their claims to attention, than to assume the clerical attitude of superior scorn. That has failed at any rate. The crude beliefs linger and spread, because they have some misunderstood or distorted truth at the bottom of them. Let science direct the light of modern knowledge on them, and tell us whether any, and, if so, what truth is in them. That is nobler work than sneering.

I am indebted to Mr. John Wetherbee for a copy of the Boston Commonwealth, (January 20th), containing a paper on "A Watchnight with the Spirits" which records some noteworthy facts. The meeting was held, as the title indicates, at the death of 1882 and the birth of 1883. Miss Berry, the medium, has not been long enough at the work to become hackneyed. Mr. Wetherbee speaks very highly of her powers, of her intelligence, and of her integrity. Some fifteen or twenty people were present. The medium sat in an angle of the room, and the observers (if we can call them so in darkness) sat in a horse-shoe circle in front of her. The room was absolutely dark. The description of what occurred is important enough for extended quotation.

"Soon appeared one or two mellow (what are called in circles) electric lights. They were more or less bright, but shed no light on the surrounding darkness. There were several of them, some more extended than others. In a few minutes one of them, which seemed to be on the floor, extended itself upwards, became about two feet long and two or three inches wide, then seemed to sink into the floor, and all was dark. Then it was repeated; and another, higher up in the room, descended; and others of different forms and sizes appeared till the whole together made a full-sized or adult human figure, under the circumstances wonderful to behold. Then suddenly, after a few motions manifesting life, it dropped to the floor in a shapeless lump of mellow light, and then went out as before. Then, in the same way, by degrees it reappeared; this time the full form, visible by its fiery outlines and lighted folds and trimmings, became a thing of life, moving around gracefully and naturally. During this witching or ghostly hour some twenty of these radiant forms appeared; or forms with radiant outlines. Sometimes two or more appeared at the same time. Once a child, perfect in form, about three feet high, appeared by the side of an adult spirit. Some one said: 'Why don't the adult spirit take it up?' The spirit stooped then and took the spirit child in its arms and caressed it, and moved about with it some time. These radiant forms were often much nearer some of the friends than they were to the medium, who kept her seat, and by her voice we knew all the time where she was. Some of the friends were so fortunately seated that these forms in moving about would not only come near them, but the sweep of their skirts, trimmed with light, would pass between them and their feet when a little extended, as they were seated. They saw the passage, but felt nothing, it being apparently intangible to the touch, though unmistakably real. The forms all had the appearance of being jet black, with illuminated outlines and trimmings, folds, belts, caps, and parts of the form glistening with this light, making perceptible the black or illuminated parts of the figure. All these forms seemed to disappear in one way, and 'dematerialise' seems to be the word to express it. When disappearing, the light or figure shrunk into a somewhat shapeless mass of light and gradually sank to the floor, growing beautifully less and then going out, or dematerialising as if it sank into the carpet or floor."

A very remarkable manifestation at the same séance is thus recorded. It will not (as Mr. Wetherbee says) be soon forgotten by those who saw it.

"A shapeless lump of woolly or fleecy-looking light, about the size of a man's hat, appeared on the floor, a little in front of the medium, and about as near to the lookers-on. While watching it, wondering what would come next, some one started, rather spontaneously, the good old hymn, often sung at religious meetings, beginning 'Come, Holy Spirit, heavenly Dove!' and during the singing the lump of shapeless light on the floor flew up into the air a perfect dove—flew about the room—wing movements perfect, as if a thing of life. This was no flash; it lasted quite a while. All saw this illuminated bird—saw it sustain itself naturally, fly to and fro, and then descend, again apparently assuming the original mass of formless, fleecy light on the floor, which then grew less and less, and, in the usual way with all these radiant apparitions, went out—extinguished itself."

The Himalayan Brother has got into a novel. "Mr. Isaacs," by F. Marion Crawford (Macmillan), gives us some curious details about these beings, in whom the author seems fully to believe. Ram Lal (the Koot Hoomi of the novel) is an Adept who appears in proper style as a Brother, "in astral shape while his body is quietly asleep in a lamasery in Tibet." Moreover, he "controls the forces of nature," so as to raise a "fleecy mist" at a most opportune moment. And he talks metaphysics and philosophy in a very bewildering manner. Spite of some defects, the book is fascinating, and worth reading.

DO LOWER ANIMALS LIVE HEREAFTER?

SIR,—I desire to supplement the interesting anecdote recorded in your paper of February 3rd.

I see no reason why the "pets" we have loved on earth may not be restored to us after our removal to the sphere we call Heaven. To me, it is certain that whatever God knows will add to our happiness there will be there enjoyed by us. To some the restoration of a dog or a bird may be a very small matter; to others it will not be so. I have a dog for which a dealer might give me twenty shillings; I would not part with it if he were to offer me £200. That sum could bring me nothing that would yield me so much enjoyment as I derive from the companionship of my friend with four feet.

But to the purpose of my letter.

Some months ago, "sitting" with Mrs. Jencken, I had this message from my wife: "Do you remember a little bird I had that I was very fond of? It died: its spirit is flitting about me now." I thought no more of it until, about two months afterwards, I was at Bath, where a little boy (of high-class parents and position) gave me, among other messages, this from my wife: "I have brought my little Dickey with me: he is on your shoulder now!"

I have another anecdote to tell. My wife had a beautiful little dog that she loved dearly: it loved her as dearly: indeed it seldom left her, and was on her bed when she "died." I gave it—or rather lent it in perpetuity—to the good woman from whom I had purchased it six years before. I could not well keep two, and I knew the dear pet could not be in safer or better hands. It died. At one of my "sittings" I put this question to my wife: "I have just had a sad loss; can you tell me what it is? I ask it as a test." No one present but myself had the slightest idea what I meant. I got no reply, although I repeated the question several times, and was consequently somewhat pained at receiving no response. But to my great delight, and also to my utter astonishment, I confess—I found written on a sheet of paper under my hand, these words:

"My dear little Blackie is with me."

Now, its name was "Minnie"; no one knew it by any other. I doubt if anyone had ever heard it called by any other. But she used to do so to distinguish it from mine; mine was little "Whitey"; hers little "Blackie."

I need not say the message was "direct writing," with which the "medium" had nothing to do—could have had nothing to do. Moreover, it is so exactly the handwriting of Mrs. S. C. Hall, that I should have no hesitation in presenting it as an autograph.

It is by no means the only specimen of her writing—"direct writing"—which she has given to me since she left earth; one I have that contains 140 words, written in less than a minute, in the full light of mid-day. Mrs. Jencken could as easily have written that long communication, covering a large sheet of paper on both sides, as I could have moved the moon—one of the few things a man may yet safely pronounce to be "impossible." I have had the communication photographed, both sides, and send you one of the photographs.

Any person acquainted with her handwriting would recognise it at once. She writes to me concerning many things known to me only, and has brought with her her child—the only child we had who lived (and her earth-life was very brief). She is now not a child, but a "young lady" (as was she, his daughter, of whom the poet, Longfellow writes).

She, too, has written to me—direct writing.

Delusion or fraud is utterly out of the question. I believe Mrs. Jencken to be entirely incapable of either—of any wrong thought indeed; but if she were, I take good care to render either an impossibility. It is my duty to do so at all times.

But that is a topic on which I shall have probably much to say to you at a not distant date. My book, "Retrospect of a Long Life," is finished, and I may have leisure to do some more work in some other way.

I trust to advance the cause whence I have derived happiness incalculable; for she who was my companion, guide, comforter, friend, and wife, during fifty-six years of earth-life, is all these and more, now that she is a saint in Heaven. I have, not only frequently, but continually, evidence of her presence as clear, convincing, and conclusive as I have that there are four fingers and a thumb on my right hand.

I believe I shall demonstrate that fact to the conviction of any intelligent and upright reader of the statement I shall make: and I think I shall be heard with as much attention, and trust, and confidence, as I should be in a court of justice, upon any subject on which I could not fail to be rightly informed.—Truly yours,

S. C. HALL.

SUBJECTION TO SPIRIT INFLUENCES.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I think that Mr. Frank Podmore is doing good service to the cause of Spiritualism by bringing forward the experiences of his friend, as narrated in "LIGHT" of the 10th inst.

I am perfectly certain that no disaster to the truth can possibly take place from a free and candid expression of opinion on the part of those who have passed through the ordeal of incipient mediumship, but, on the contrary, these experiences may serve as guide and warning to others who are yet in the "Valley of the Shadow," and who may by their help avoid the many pitfalls in which that "Valley" abounds. It appears to me to be almost a matter of necessity in commencing the study of any new subject, that the mental attitude of the student should be that described by Mr. Podmore as one of submission. The danger lies in allowing that submission to degenerate into servility.

With those of us who are mediumistic, and who possess even the most moderate share of vanity, there is always a tendency to believe that we are in some way, not to be explained, the especial objects of the watchful care of higher powers; and this belief, in all probability, is the medium which distorts and perverts the truth which we are gradually drawing to ourselves, and ends in travesty that which otherwise might have been of the highest value.

These painful experiences ought, at least, to teach us to remember that whilst accepting gratefully any suggestion from the spirit-world which may help us to form the line of battle to the best advantage, yet that the actual conflict must be borne by ourselves.

It is easy enough to induce others to work out for us our school lessons, and we may, for a time, receive credit for that which we do not deserve, but in what will that avail us when we come to pass the examination of life? I have heard many voices during my state of transition, but one voice stronger than all the rest has ever warned me not to accept all that was told to me as absolute truth, but to test everything at the bar of my own reason.—Yours faithfully,

EDMOND W. WADE.

Lewisham, February 12th, 1883.

Many Spiritualists will learn with regret that Mr. W. Davis, of Clapton, who is so well known as a trustworthy and excellent medium, has been suffering from a severe illness, and we are expressing the wish of his friends that he will soon recover.

LETTERS ON THEOSOPHY.

(FROM AN ANGLO-INDIAN TO A LONDON THEOSOPHIST.)

No. IV.

It was not possible to approach a consideration of the states into which the higher human principles pass at death, without first indicating the general framework of the whole design worked out in the course of the evolution of man. The great majority of the blunders made by ordinary theological speculation on this subject are due to ignorance of this general design. People have been led to regard the present physical life as the only one of its kind which a human soul is called upon to pass through. They have next found themselves obliged to provide in Heaven, or some sphere of punishment, for all the rest of eternity, since they are reluctant to contemplate the notion of final annihilation even for their mere personal entities, unable to understand that unless specially qualified for perpetuation, they might tire of such entities in progress of millenniums. Thus the Heaven of vulgar theology—not to speak of the hell—is a congeries of inconsistent conceptions as fatally at war with each other as with the facts of the earth-life they are supposed to supplement. Heaven is treated as a place in which life is infinitely prolonged—an eternity which has a beginning, but no end,—and found enjoyable in the highest degree. But each person is simply himself or herself as on earth, in a new spiritual body, with recollection of the past life on earth, and perceptions of the continued life in progress here for the living friends and relations left behind. Now a Heaven which constituted a watchtower from which the occupants could still survey the miseries of the earth, would really be a place of acute mental suffering for its most sympathetic, unselfish, and meritorious inhabitants. If we invest them in imagination with such a very limited range of sympathy that they could be imagined as not caring about the spectacle of suffering after the few persons to whom they were immediately attached had died and joined them, still they would have a very unhappy period of waiting to go through before survivors reached the end of an often long and toilsome existence below. And even this hypothesis would be further vitiated by making Heaven most painful for occupants who were most unselfish and sympathetic, whose reflected distress would thus continue on behalf of the afflicted race of mankind generally, even after their personal kindred had been rescued by the lapse of time. The only escape from this dilemma for believers in the conventional Heaven, lies in the supposition that Heaven is not yet opened for business, so to speak, and that all people who have ever lived from Adam downwards are still lying in a death-like—annihilation-like—trance, waiting for the resurrection at the end of the world. The resurrection, by-the-by, has an occult meaning, which the present explanation may help to elucidate, but of that more anon. Which of these hypotheses is most favoured by ordinary theology we do not pretend to say, but Heaven must be recognised by that doctrine as either open or not open yet for the reception of souls, and then one of the two lines of speculation, above roughly indicated, must be followed.

None the less, of course, would theology deny that either statement of the case was correct. No statement of any case which ordinary theology favours, ever is admitted to be correct by theologians if it is put in plain language which conveys a definite conception. Now this brings us to a point of great importance in regard to these fragmentary teachings. The statements which have to be made are susceptible of being expressed in the plainest possible terms. The language of occult philosophy may be as precise as that of physical science. It has not always been so, because a great deal of it has been employed to disguise the statements put forward, just as early astronomers would sometimes record their discoveries by means of anagrams perfectly destitute of meaning on the surface. But the obscurity of occult writing has never been due to the cloudiness or confusion of the ideas under treatment. Thoroughly understood, all occult knowledge—within the range of ordinary human understanding—can be presented to the reader in language as lucid as a diamond and, no more than the facets of the diamond, need the edges of its separate assertions be blurred to make them fit.

The facts about the spiritual condition of life, which for each human individuality travelling round the great circle of evolution, intervenes between every one of its separate incarnations, are thus susceptible like the facts of objective existence, with which these essays have chiefly hitherto been dealing, of intelligible expression in terms which need not provide by intentional obscurity for any possible necessity of later withdrawal or qualification. But of course the conditions of lives which are not objective are not so easily grasped as those which are paralleled by our own, and statements which may be perfectly definite as far as they go may nevertheless be incomplete. The world of effects is a strange and unfamiliar territory for most of us, and untrained imaginations might not follow a close description of its features. However, there are living men, be it remembered, to whom its territory is not unfamiliar; to whom its minutest details are no longer strange. From these the information comes which we are about to lay before the reader.

Rejecting the unscientific name which has become encrusted with too many mis-conceptions to be convenient, let us keep to the Oriental designation of that region or state into which the higher principles of human creatures pass at death. Devachan, to begin with, makes no offer of eternal accommodation to the finite personalities of dying men. It has already been explained that when the four higher principles escape from the body—i.e., from the lower triad,—they divide in accordance with the affinities that have been engendered in them during their corporate life. The lower religions remain in the Kama loka, or immediate vicinity or atmosphere of the earth; and the higher two, invested with consciousness by having assimilated all that is adapted to a superior state of existence from the fifth principle, manas, or animal soul, pass into a temporary period of oblivion from which they are, so to speak, born into Devachan. Now in Devachan, that which survives is not merely the individual monad, which survives through all the changes of the whole evolutionary scheme, and flits from body to body, from planet to planet, and so forth; that which survives in Devachan is the man's own self-conscious personality—under some restrictions, indeed, which we will come to directly, but still it is the same personality, as regards its feelings, aspirations, affections, and even tastes as it was on earth. Those feelings and tastes of course which were purely sensual will drop off, but to suggest a whole range of ideas by means of one illustration, a soul in Devachan, if the soul of a man who was passionately devoted to music, would be continuously enraptured by the sensations music produces. The person whose happiness of the higher sort on earth had been entirely centred in the exercise of the affections will miss none in Devachan of those whom he or she loved. But at once it will be asked, if some of these are not themselves fit for Devachan, how then? The answer is that does not matter. For the person who loved them they will be there. It is not necessary to say more to give a clue to the position. Devachan is a subjective state. It will seem as real as the chairs and tables round us,—and remember that above all things to the profound philosophy of Occultism are the chairs and tables, and the whole of the objective scenery of the world, unreal; merely transitory delusions of sense. As real as the realities of this world to us, and even more so, will be the realities of Devachan to those who go there.

Now, we fancy very few Western thinkers at the first glance will welcome this account of the Heaven awaiting them beyond the grave, but we are not weaving pleasant fancies; we are describing natural facts, and to say that a condition of things is unacceptable to the imagination is to say nothing in disproof of its actuality. As regards Devachan, however, a patient consideration of the place in nature which it occupies will show that this subjective isolation of each human unit is the only condition which renders possible anything which can be described as a felicitous spiritual existence after death for mankind at large. And Devachan is a purely and absolutely felicitous condition for all who attain it. There is no inequality or injustice in the system. Devachan is by no means the same thing for the good and the indifferent alike, but it is not a life of responsibility, and therefore there is no logical place in it for suffering. It is a life of effects, not of causes; a life of being paid your earnings, big or little, not of labouring for them. Therefore it is impossible to be, during that life, cognisant of what is going on on earth. Under the operation of such cognition, there would be no true happiness possible in the state after death.

But there is no true happiness possible, people will say, in the state of monotonous isolation now described! The objection is merely raised from the point of view of an imagination which cannot escape from its present surroundings. To begin with about monotony; no one will complain of having experienced monotony during the minute or moment, or half-hour, as it may have been, of the greatest happiness he may have enjoyed in life. Most people have had some happy moments at all events to look back to, for the purpose of this comparison, and let us take such a minute or moment, too short to be open to the least suspicion of monotony, and imagine its sensations immensely prolonged without any external events in progress to mark the lapse of time. There is no room in such a condition of things for the conception of weariness. The unalloyed, unchangeable sensation of intense happiness goes on and on,—not for ever, because the causes which have produced it are not infinite themselves, but for very long periods of time, until the efficient impulse has exhausted itself. It is not a reality, it is a mere dream, objectors will urge; the soul so bathed in a delusive sensation of enjoyment which has no reality, all the while is being cheated by nature, and must encounter a terrible shock when it wakes to its mistake. But in the nature of things it never does nor can wake. Its waking from Devachan is its next birth into objective life, and the draught of Lethe has then been taken. Nor as regards the isolation of each soul is there any consciousness of isolation whatever; nor is there even possibly a parting from its chosen associates. Those associates are not in the nature of companions who may wish to go away, of friends who may tire of the friend that loves them, even if he or she does not tire of them. Love, the creating force, has placed their living image before the personal soul which craves for their presence, and that image will never fly away.

There is a sense of unreality about the whole affair which is painful to the mind at first no doubt, but this is probably much more due to an imperfect grasp of the nature of the existence described on the part of people used merely to objective experiences, than to any inherent demerits in the scheme of existence provided for souls in their transition state in Devachan.

And we must remember that by the very nature of the system described there are infinite varieties of well-being in Devachan, suited to the infinite varieties of merit in mankind. If "the next world" really were the objective Heaven which ordinary theology preaches, there would be endless injustice and inaccuracy in its operation. People, to begin with, would be either admitted or excluded, and the differences of favour shown to different guests within the all-favoured region, would not sufficiently provide for differences of merit in this life. But the real Heaven of our earth adjusts itself to the needs and merits of each new arrival with unfailing certainty. Not merely as regards the duration of the blissful state, which is determined by the causes engendered during objective life, but as regards the intensity and amplitude of the emotions which constitute that blissful state, the Heaven of each person who attains the really existent Heaven is precisely fitted to his capacity for enjoying it. It is the creation of his own aspirations and faculties. More than this it may be impossible for the uninitiated comprehension to realise. But the indication of its character is enough to shew how perfectly it falls into its appointed place in the whole scheme of evolution.

Devachan being a condition of mere subjective enjoyment, the duration and intensity of which is determined by the merit and spirituality of the earth-life last past, there is no opportunity while the soul inhabits it for the punctual requital of evil deeds. But nature does not content herself with either forgiving sins in a free and easy way or damning sinners outright, like a lazy master too indolent rather than too good-natured to govern his household justly. The Karma of evil, be it great or small, is as certainly operative at the appointed time as the Karma of good. But the place of its operation is not Devachan. The rebirth into objective existence is the event for which the Karma of evil patiently waits; and then it irresistibly asserts itself. Not that the Karma of good exhausts itself in Devachan, leaving the unhappy monad to develop a new consciousness, with no material beyond the evil deeds of its last personality. The rebirth will be qualified by the merit as well as the demerit of the previous life, but the Devachan existence is a rosy sleep, a peaceful night, with dreams more vivid than day, and imperishable for many centuries, as the loftiest mountains of the earth for the time abandoned.

It will be seen that the Devachan state is only one of the conditions of existence which go to make up the whole spiritual or relatively spiritual complement of our earth-life. Observers of spiritualistic phenomena would never have been perplexed as they have been if there were no other than the Devachan state to be dealt with. For once in Devachan, there is very little opportunity for communication between a spirit, then wholly absorbed in its own sensations and practically oblivious of the earth left behind, and its former friends still living. Whether gone before or yet remaining on earth, those friends, if the bond of affection has been sufficiently strong, will be with the happy spirit still, to all intents and purposes for him, and as happy, blissful, innocent, as the disembodied dreamer himself. It is possible, however, for yet living persons to have visions of Devachan, though such visions are rare and only one-sided, the entities in Devachan sighted by the earthly clairvoyant being quite unconscious themselves of undergoing such observation. The spirit of the clairvoyant ascends into the condition of Devachan in such rare visions, and thus becomes subject to the vivid delusions of that existence. It is under the impression that the spirits with which it is in Devachanic bonds of sympathy have come down to visit earth and itself, while the converse operation has really taken place. The clairvoyant's spirit has been raised towards those in Devachan. Thus many of the subjective spiritual communications—most of them when the sensitives are pure-minded—are real, though it is most difficult for the uninitiated medium to fix in his mind the true and correct pictures of what he sees and hears. In the same way some of the phenomena called psychography (though more rarely) are also real. The spirit of the sensitive getting odysseised, so to say, by the aura of the spirit in the Devachan, becomes for a few minutes that departed personality, and writes in the handwriting of the latter, in his language, and in his thoughts as they were during his lifetime. The two spirits become blended in one, and the preponderance of one over the other during such phenomena determines the preponderance of personality in the characteristics exhibited. Thus, it may incidentally be observed, what is called rapport is in plain fact an identity of molecular vibration between the astral part of the incarnate medium and the astral part of the disincarnate personality.

Meanwhile the average communicating "spirit" of the seance room is the denizen of that intervening region between earth-life and Devachan, which has already been referred to as Kama loka. On the subject of shells or elementaries so much has been written of late that this branch of the subject may be passed over lightly now. The upper duad having won in the struggle which takes place after death in the Kama loka between the two sets of principles, the lowest of all, with a remnant of the fifth, its more brutal memories and instincts alone remaining, continues to roam the earth's atmosphere for a time, an empty shell, though alive for awhile to a certain extent. A word or two of explanation, however, is required in reference to the complete two-principled being which remains in the Kama loka, when the upper duad does not win in the struggle for possession of the late personality. It might be imagined that such a being would be far more potent for the purpose of communication with still living people, than the shell. And so it might be if it remained in Kama loka, but the fact is that in such cases the surviving personality is promptly drawn into the current of its future destinies, and these have nothing to do with this earth's atmosphere or with Devachan, but with that "eighth sphere," of which occasional mention will be found in older occult writings. It will have been unintelligible to ordinary readers hitherto why it was called the "eighth" sphere; but since the explanation in these fragments of the seven-fold constitution of our planetary system, the meaning will be clear enough. The spheres of the cyclic process of evolution are seven in number, but there is an eighth in connection with our earth,—our earth being, it will be remembered, the turning-point in the cyclic chain—and this eighth sphere is out of circuit, a cul de sac, and the bourne from which it may be truly said no traveller returns.

It will readily be guessed that the only sphere connected with our manvantaric chain, which is lower than our own in the scale that has spirit at the top and matter at the bottom, must itself be no less visible to the eye and to optical instruments than the earth itself, and as the duties which this sphere has to perform in our planetary system are immediately associated with this earth, there is not much mystery left now in the riddle of the eighth sphere, nor as to the place in the sky where it may be sought. The conditions of existence there, however, are topics on which the adepts are very reserved in their communications to uninitiated pupils, and concerning these we have for the present no further information to give. One statement, though, is definitely made, viz., that such a total degradation of a personality as may suffice to draw it, after death, into the attraction of the eighth sphere, is of very rare occurrence. From the vast majority of lives there is something which the higher principles may draw to themselves, something to redeem the page of existence just past from total destruction. And here it must be remembered that the recollections of life in Devachan, very vivid as they are so far as they go, touch only those episodes in life which are productive of the elevated sort of happiness of which alone Devachan is qualified to take cognisance, whereas the life from which for the time being the cream is thus skimmed, will be remembered eventually in all its details quite fully. That complete remembrance is only achieved by the individual at the threshold of a far more exalted spiritual state than that which we are now concerned with, and which is attained far later on in the progress of the vast cycles of evolution. Each one of the long series of lives that will have been passed through will then be, as it were, a page in a book to which the possessor can turn back at pleasure, even though many such pages will then seem to him most likely very dull reading, and will not be frequently referred to. It is this revival eventually of recollections concerning all the long-forgotten personalities that is really meant by the doctrine of the resurrection, of which the modern Prayer-books make so sad a hash. But we have no time at present to stop and unravel the enigmas of symbolism as bearing upon the teaching at present under conveyance to the reader. It may be worth while to do this as a separate undertaking at a later period, but meanwhile, to revert to the narrative of how the facts stand, it may be explained that in the whole book of pages,—when, at last, "the resurrection" has been accomplished—there will be no entirely infamous pages; for even if any given spiritual individuality has, occasionally, during its passage through the worlds, been linked with personalities so deplorably and desperately degraded that they have passed completely into the attraction of the lower vortex, that spiritual individuality, in such cases, will have retained in its own affinities no trace or taint of them. Those pages will, as it were, have been clearly torn out from the book; and at the time of death the spiritual individuality will have passed into the unconscious gestation state, from which it will be reborn in due time into its next life of objective activity. All the self-consciousness connected with that existence will have passed into the lower world, there eventually to "perish everlastingly," an expression of which, as of so many more, modern theology has proved a faithless custodian, making pure nonsense out of psycho-scientific facts.

As already indicated, and as the common-sense of the matter would shew, there are great varieties of states in Devachan, and each personality drops into its befitting place there. Thence consequently he emerges in his befitting place in the world of causes, this earth or another as the case may be, when his time for rebirth comes. Coupled with survival of the affinities comprehensively described as Karma, the affinities both for good and evil engendered by the previous life, this process will be seen to accomplish nothing less than an explanation of the problem which has always been regarded as so incomprehensible,—the inequalities of life. The conditions on which we enter life are the consequences of the use we have made of our last set of conditions. They do not impede the development of fresh Karma, whatever they may be, for this will be generated by the use we make of them in turn. Nor is it to be supposed that every event of a current life which bestows joy or sorrow is old Karma bearing fruit. Many may be the immediate consequences of acts in the life to which they belong—ready money transactions with nature, so to speak, of which it may hardly be necessary to make any entry in her books. But the great inequalities of life, as regards the start in it, which different human beings make, is a manifest consequence of old Karma, the infinite varieties of which always keep up a constant supply of recruits for all the manifold varieties of human condition.

We have spoken of the three conditions in the world of effects—the state in which the principles liberated from the body are still in Kama loka, and physically in the atmosphere of the earth; the state of Devachan, and the intervening state of gestation or preparation for the latter. But the reader's conceptions on the subject will necessarily be vague without some indications as to the periods of time with which passage through these states is concerned. Consciousness in the Kama loka even is not immediately re-awakened after death. When a man dies his soul, or fifth principle, becomes unconscious and loses all remembrance of things internal as well as external. Whether his stay in Kama loka has to last but a few moments, hours, days, weeks, months, or years, whether he dies a natural or a violent death, whether this occurs in youth or age, whether the Ego has been good, bad, or indifferent, his consciousness leaves him as suddenly as the flame leaves the wick when it is blown out. When life has retired from the last particle of the brain matter its perceptive faculties become extinct for ever, and the Ego's spiritual powers of cognition and volition become for the time being as extinct as the others. His mayava rupa may be thrown into objectivity as in the case of apparitions after death; but unless it is projected by a conscious or intense desire to see or appear to some one shooting through the dying brain, the apparition will be simply automatic. The revival of consciousness in Kama loka is obviously, from what has been already said, a phenomenon that depends on the characteristics of the principle passing unconsciously at the moment out of the dying body. It may become tolerably complete under circumstances by no means to be desired, or it may be obliterated by a rapid passage into the gestation state leading to Devachan. This gestation state may be of very long duration in proportion to the Ego's spiritual stamina, and Devachan accounts for the remainder of the period between death and the next physical rebirth. The whole period is, of course, of very varying length in the case of different persons, but rebirth in less than a thousand to fifteen hundred years, is spoken of as almost impossible in the ordinary course of nature, while the stay in Devachan, which rewards a very rich Karma, is sometimes said to extend to enormous periods.

In conclusion, it may be added that this is a mere sketch of the state of things under examination as complete as the writer is in a position to make it at present, but requiring a great deal of amplification as regards details, and this will no doubt become possible at some future time. Meanwhile the outline, as far as it goes, may be relied upon as correctly drawn.

A TAHITIAN SEER.

The accompanying extract from an article on Tahiti, published in the Chronicle of the London Missionary Society for the present month, is worth placing in a position where it can be more readily accessible to those interested in psychical research. I hope, therefore, you may be able to find room for it in your columns. The writer is the Rev. J. L. Green, who has for several years been a missionary in Tahiti, and may be taken as a trustworthy witness. It ought not to be too late to have this story thoroughly investigated; even should it turn out to be partly mythical, the characteristic a priori reasoning and the consequent behaviour of the scientific men of Tahiti are too good to be lost. "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin."

"There existed in former times in the 'Court' at Tahiti a custom which found also a place in the 'Court' of England in early days. It was customary for the King of Tahiti to have among his attendants a 'jester,' and some few years before the Island had been visited by foreign ships, this jester suddenly renounced the gods of the island; he moreover denounced them as utterly unworthy of the worship rendered to them; he also predicted that, ere long, large canoes without outriggers would come across the sea, bringing strange people with them; their skins would be white, but their bodies would be all covered over except their faces. He also stated that the people on one of these ships would tell them of another God whom all the Tahitians would ultimately worship; that the arrival of this large canoe would be preceded by a 'rapu fenua,' a 'trembling of the earth.' This jester was remonstrated with, threatened, and warned of the consequences of treating the gods of his fathers with such contempt; but he still persisted, and positively refused to give any further heed to the worship of those idols. The utter absurdity of the idea of a canoe, however large, crossing the sea without any outrigger was proved to the satisfaction of some, at least, of the people, when they removed the outrigger of one of their canoes, and took the canoe outside the reef in a heavy sea; it rolled and tossed about for some time, and ultimately filled with water. This prophet-jester was henceforth regarded as deficient in reason, and therefore, was allowed to indulge in his fanatical denunciation. Strange as it may seem, a year or two before the arrival of the Duff, a severe earthquake shock was felt all over the island, the first and last on record. The people became alarmed, and began to think that after all the 'jester' was not far wrong; for in the meantime the possibility of a large canoe without an outrigger living at sea had been proved by the arrival of foreign ships at the island. At length the Duff [the L.M.S. missionary ship] arrived, and the people were told of another God, to whom alone homage was due, and who alone could save from sin. The natives called this ship Te rapu, the Trembling, and these first missionaries were permitted to see the system of idolatry, which had kept the natives in bondage to Satan for so many ages, tremble and fall before the mighty power and influence of the Gospel of Christ."

PIÈCES JUSTIFICATIVES

OF THE NEED OF A SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

The following evidence, relating to Miss F., has been kindly sent to me by Mr. Hensleigh Wedgwood, in addition to that which was reported last week:—

"To set against your failure with Miss F., I must tell you of a sitting I had with her to-day. You know the way she goes on, so that it is extremely difficult to give a consecutive account of her addresses. In this street lived a cousin of mine, with whom we have all been very intimate all our lives, latterly a great invalid, suffering very much from his chest, a bachelor who died in the end of the summer leaving me a legacy. Miss F. said she felt his presence, causing a numbness down one side, then expressing pain in her chest and painful coughing. She said he was a cousin of mine who lived near me, and had lately died after months of illness; he was alone, unmarried; his sister C. was with him at his death. (She was there two days before.) He had a sister Susan. (True.) She heard the name 'Ratmus.' (It was Erasmus.) She made one or two attempts at this before she got it. I suggested Horace (the name of a nephew), which she repudiated. My cousin, she said, was very tired of life, and was glad to die. I fully agreed with this, and have repeatedly said so of him since his death. He was happy now, she said, and wished me to know that he recognised that I had been right and he wrong. I used constantly to tell my spiritualist stories to him, while he held that everything supernatural was impossible. He went on to say that 'he had done what was right by everybody, and we were to enjoy it. He had given me a surprise, a pleasant one.'

"Most of these particulars Miss F. could have heard from no one. I had nearly forgotten one matter that she could not have got even from reading my mind. She talked about the time of his death, which she said wasn't this and wasn't that. I said it was about two months ago. She said that would make it in September, which I thought it was. She said it seemed to her that it was in August, and on coming home I find it was August 26th. She spoke of his great intimacy with me, which in fact had continued for fifty years."

The next case is one of those interesting but somewhat rare examples of clairvoyance induced by the mesmeric sleep. In this instance my informant gives me permission to publish his name. He is the Rev. Thomas Myers, and I will merely add that his vicarage is in the North of England, and that he is the nephew of the revered and learned Rev. Frederic Myers.

CASE IV.
CLAIRVOYANCE.

November 4th, 1876.

I think from a letter of yours in the last Spectator you will be interested in the following facts, of which my wife's family has a store. Some few years ago my wife and her sisters discovered that a friend and dependant, a poor woman, had an extraordinary power, when they put her (for her health) into a mesmeric sleep. Such things as these occurred:—

Fact No. 1.—This person, we will call her W., was put into the sleep at Durham. My wife's brother, Mr. C., desired W., through his sister, the operator, to visit a certain house, the number and street of which were given her, in London. She was entirely ignorant of London, and the house and family were unknown to all except Mr. C. She said she had found it, and went upstairs into a room in which she found a young lady—a corpse. She said they were bringing up the coffin, and she spelt out a name on the coffin lid, which was the name of the dead young girl. W. informed them that the deceased young lady's friends were most anxious that Mr. C. should perform the funeral ceremony (he was a clergyman), and said that a letter had been sent off earnestly urging his going up from Durham to London. Mr. C. only knew that the girl was very ill. It turned out, however, that she was actually dead; the letter arrived next day earnestly desiring Mr. C.'s attendance to perform the funeral service.

Fact No. 2.—Another of my wife's brothers (Mr. G.) was most anxious to see an uncle upon a matter of important business, but he had no knowledge of his address, except that he lived somewhere in London. Mr. G. came to the house, and W. was sent into this mesmeric sleep. He said, "I am going to London to-morrow; ask W. where my uncle lives." They did so. A certain address was given. Mr. G. drove from the station straight to the house, and found the address was correct.

Fact No. 3.—W., in her sleep, was told to go and see a lady in London, and was asked certain questions about her, among others: "What is she doing?" The reply was, "Sitting at the table, drinking a cup of tea." This seemed very unlikely, as it was in the middle of the day, about one o'clock. Mr. G. had occasion shortly afterwards to pay this lady a visit, and asked her if she could recollect what she was doing in the middle of that day, saying that he had a special reason for inquiry, and that it was not mere curiosity. She confessed that she was drinking a cup of tea—her usual practice before going into the city.

In accordance with my request Mr. Myers kindly obtained the revision of the foregoing account by each of those who were present at the time; hence it may, I think, be taken as a substantially correct statement of facts. I was, however, anxious to know more about this clairvoyante, and in reply to my inquiries Mr. Myers writes as follows:—

"The person W. is alive now (1876), but the power she possesses is not known beyond my wife's family. This clairvoyante is perfectly trustworthy, is an ignorant, uneducated woman, and my wife's family have kept her name secret, and also her whereabouts—chiefly, I believe, in accordance with her own desire, as she does not wish notoriety, and is afraid of being thought a witch. Those who know her are fully convinced of her high principle and conscientiousness, and she has a larger share of common sense than most people possess in her rank of life."

THE FORENSIC GHOST.

Whether or not the defective ventilation of our courts of law be inimical to the phantom constitution, or whether these sensitive essences, oppressed with the absurdities of forensic costume and manners, take fright at the first glimmer of a counsel's wig, or at the titter that follows his joke—there can be no question of the extreme difficulty that has always been experienced in bringing a spectre fairly to judicial book. The office of detective seems better suited to its method. If we may trust recorded testimony, both sworn and unsworn, a ghost has suggested essential evidence, indicated lines of prosecution, even convened witnesses—and, all being ready, marched, so to speak, up to the very gate of justice. There, however, in this country at least, the spectre has invariably come to a stand. An objection to be sworn in that impressive manner so familiar to the frequenters of British courts of justice, may have something to do with it. Cross-examination by a sceptic in horse-hair, whose incredulity goes the length of impeaching one's very existence, and whose questions, in any case, must pierce one's substance through and through, may be sufficiently alarming. It is, as Dogberry observes, "most tolerable and not to be endured," that flesh and film should be thus pitted against each other; and, consequently, we need not be surprised that a tacit understanding has been arrived at, to eliminate altogether the accusing or litigious shade. If flesh and blood, that can speak well up to a jury, and stand bullying, cannot convict a man, shall a shadow have that power? No. The ghost's word—appraised by the Prince of Denmark at "a thousand pound"—is now, in the jealous eye of the law, not worth one dump.

I would not, however, be thought to speak too lightly on the subject. Few things are more censurable than the habit, only too prevalent in our time, of speaking with over-familiarity of things that lie beyond the hitherto ascertained limit of natural laws. Nothing in this educated age astonishes one more than the extreme narrowness of that district which separates absolute scepticism from blind credulity. They are such close neighbours, that, without risk of offending one or the other, the reasonable mind has scarcely space to stir. With the former, the mere act of inquiry—"whether these things are so"—seems to involve a sort of abandonment of principle; with the latter, the most superficial examination seems enough. Without in the least challenging the wisdom of that arrangement which has outlawed the ghost, it is interesting to trace the manner in which, within the memory of the existing generation, what we are compelled to call supernatural interposition, has, to all appearance, contributed to the ends of justice. Thus in the case of a notorious murder near Brighton—some thirty years ago—a dream and a dream alone gave clue to the real authors of the crime, and to the spot where the victim's remains would be—and actually were—discovered. A remarkable instance of what, in Scotland, would have been termed second-sight, occurred within my recollection in a Midland county, and though, in accordance with practice, suppressed at the trial of the murderer, was received, and attested upon oath, at the preceding inquest. A market gardener, known from his fine presence as "Noble Eden," was murdered while at work in his fields at a long distance from home. His wife, ironing at a dresser by the kitchen window, saw her husband run swiftly past, pursued by another man, who brandished a stone-breaking hammer, as if threatening to strike. Aware from the first that it was a spectral illusion, and impressed with the conviction that some evil had befallen her husband, Mrs. Eden and a neighbour, who confirmed her testimony, at once gave an alarm. Search was made at the spot to which he had intended to proceed, when the body was discovered, cold and lifeless, the murderous weapon—a stone hammer—lying beside him.

Another example of this species of warning attracted some attention in the "barking" times at Edinburgh—the voice of one of the victims, recognised under circumstances irreconcilable with any known law of nature, having led to the suspecting, and thence to the conviction, of those monstrous criminals. A gentleman, not long deceased, used to relate that, while resident near Fort George, N.B., the disappearance of an old woman employed by many in the neighbourhood as a messenger, created much excitement. One evening as Mr. H. was sitting reading in an arbour, the missing woman suddenly thrust her head through the leafy shield! There was a broad crimson streak round her neck. She uttered no word, but an impression seemed to be conveyed to Mr. H.'s mind that she had been murdered, and that her body lay concealed beneath stable refuse, in a distant byre. Search was made there, the corpse was found, and the woman's husband, subsequently tried for the murder, was executed, confessing the crime.

In the French courts, questions of ghost, or no ghost, seem to have been permitted a wider range. Counsel has been freely heard on either part. In a case that, now many years ago, stirred up the whole philosophy of the subject, so much curious matter was elicited as to make the record worth preserving. Honoré Mirabel, a poor labourer on the estate of a family named Gay, near Marseilles, invoked the protection of the law, under the following extraordinary circumstances:—

While lying one night under an almond tree, trying to sleep, he suddenly noticed a man of remarkable appearance, standing in the full moonlight at the window of a neighbouring house. Knowing the house to be unoccupied, he rose to question the intruder, when the latter disappeared. Fetching a ladder, Mirabel mounted to the window, but found no one. Struck with terror, he descended again with all speed, and had barely touched the ground when a voice accosted him.

"Pertuisan!" (he was of Pertuis) "there is a large treasure buried close at hand. Dig, and it is yours."

A small stone was dropped on the terrace, as though to denote the spot.

For reasons not explained, the favoured Mirabel hesitated to pursue the adventure alone, but communicated with one Bernard, a labourer in the employ of a farmeress—Madame Paret. This lady being admitted to their confidence, the three met next night at the haunted spot, and after digging to a considerable depth, came upon a large parcel wrapped in many folds of linen. Struck with the pick-axe, it returned unmistakably the melodious sound of coin; but the dirty and—as Paret suggested—plague-tainted appearance of the covering, checked their curiosity until, having been taken home and well soaked in wine, the parcel was opened, and revealed more than a thousand large Portugal pieces of gold.

It is strange, but true, that Mirabel was allowed to retain the whole of the treasure. But Mirabel was not the happier for it. He feared for its safety. He feared for his own life. Moreover, the laws respecting "treasure trove" were peculiarly explicit. It was questionable how far the decision of the ghost might be held to override them. In France, of treasure found in the highway, half went to the Crown, half to the finder. If discovered by magical arts, the whole went to the Crown, with a penalty on the finder. To these existing claims, the phantom had made no allusion.

In some perplexity, honest Mirabel consulted another friend, one Auguier, a tradesman of Marseilles, who advised that the secret should be confined to those who already knew it, adding that he (Auguier) was prepared to devote himself, heart and soul, to his friend's best interests, lend him any cash he needed (so as not to exhibit the foreign money), and, in fine, become his perpetual solace, monitor, and guard! The friendship thus happily inaugurated, resulted in Mirabel resolving to entrust the entire treasure to the custody of his friend, and appointing time and place for that purpose. On the way to this rendezvous, Mirabel, fell in with one Gaspard Deleuil, whom (Auguier being already in sight) he requested to wait for him beside a thicket; then going forward, he handed to the trusty Auguier two sealed bags, one secured with red ribbon, the other with blue, and received in return the following satisfactory document:—

"I acknowledge myself indebted to Honoré Mirabel twenty thousand livres, which I promise to pay on demand, acquitting him, moreover, of forty livres which he owes me. Done at Marseilles, this seventh of September.

"(Signed) LOUIS AUGUIER."

This little matter settled, Mirabel retired to his native village, and after starring it there for a few weeks as a man of wealth, revisited Marseilles. He had passed a jovial evening with his friend and banker, Auguier, when, on his way home through a dark street, he was assailed by a powerful ruffian, who felled him to the ground, wounded, and made his escape. This incident begat a certain suspicion in the mind of Mirabel. As soon as he was able, he called on Auguier, and demanded the return of his treasure, or liquidation of the bond. His friend was lost in astonishment. What an extraordinary application was here! "Money? What money?" With honest indignation, he denied the whole transaction. Mirabel must be mad! To establish his sanity, and at the same time, refresh the memory of his quondam friend, Mirabel appealed to the law, and in due course, the Lieutenant-Criminal, with his officer, appeared at Auguier's house, and made perquisition. No money was found, but the two bags that had contained it were, with the red and blue ribbons that had secured them. Auguier, questioned, gave a somewhat different version of the matter from that of Mirabel. He had indeed enjoyed a casual acquaintance with that gentleman. They had dined together, once, at Auguier's house. He had accepted the hospitality of M. Mirabel, as often, at a tavern. He had advanced that gentleman a crown. Mirabel had spoken of a ghost and money, and had talked of placing the latter of these in his charge—but had, in effect, limited his confidence to the deposit of two empty bags, and some ribbon. Deeply impressed with the marvellous history, the Lieutenant-Criminal decided that process should issue. It did.

Madame Paret, questioned, said that Mirabel had called on her, pale and agitated, and declared that he had been holding converse with an apparition, which had pointed out some hidden treasure. She was present when search was made, and the money found, and remembered hearing Mirabel say that he had subsequently entrusted it to Auguier. This testimony was confirmed by Deleuil, who, on the 7th September, had met Mirabel near the Porte des Fainéants (Idlers' Gate), and seen him deliver two bags, and take a receipt or bond in exchange.

François Fournière, questioned, confirmed the story of the ghost and the gold, and added that Mirabel seemed profoundly affected by the extraordinary favour and generosity shewn him by the spirit. He took the witness to his chamber, and there displayed to him a large bag, filled with gold coin. Other witnesses deposed to the sudden intimacy between Mirabel and Auguier, dating from the period of the discovery of the gold, and sundry experts testified to the resemblance between Auguier's autograph and the writing of the before-mentioned bond.

The ghost and Mirabel carried the day. It was a mere "walk over." The Lieutenant-Criminal, entirely with them, decreed that Auguier should be arrested and submitted to the "question." Appeal, however, was made to Parliament, at Aix. Persons began to censure the ready credence given by the magistrate to the story of the ghost, and an able advocate of the day prepared to do battle with the shade.

Is it credible (he asked, at the hearing) that a spirit should quit the repose of another world, simply to inform M. Mirabel, of whom it knew nothing, of the existence and hiding-place of this treasure? How officious must be the nature of such a ghost! how slight the prescience that failed to foresee that Mirabel would be deprived of his treasure by the first knave he had the misfortune to trust! Bah! There was, assure yourselves, no such spirit! And if no ghost—no gold. If no gold, then no ground for the accusation of Auguier. The case, he urged, was laden with suspicion. How, pray, was it that the woman Paret and the witness Deleuil demanded no share in the alleged booty? Were these excellent persons superior to the common weaknesses of humanity? The witness Paret saw a parcel discovered. The rest of her evidence was hearsay. The witness Deleuil saw the exchange of bags and paper. The rest of his testimony—spectre included—was hearsay also. The climax of injustice was surely attained, when we see M. Auguier, that respectable, estimable, substantial merchant (he was a small tallow chandler) of France's proudest sea mart, submitted, on the uncorroborated word of a nameless spectre, to the "question"! Let ten thousand witnesses testify to that which is contrary to nature and the light of reason—their evidence is worthless and vain. Take an example. The traditions of the noble house of Lusignan allege that the fairy Melusina, who had the tail of a serpent, and bathed every Saturday in a marble cellar reserved for her use, had once revealed a treasure to some weak idiot, who was immediately robbed of it by another! Is it on a fable no less ridiculous that Auguier—the just, the respected family-father—the loyal citizen—the scrupulous purveyor—must be adjudged guilty! Never! Such justice might be current at Cathay—might be rampant in the yet unexplored islands of the Eastern Archipelago, might be whispered of even in Britain, but in France, gentlemen—no. One thousand times, no! Acquit, therefore, at once, this much injured man, and render him the compensation his wrongs demand.

It was now, however, the phantom's innings. Turning on the court the night side of nature, the ghost's advocate pointed out that the gist of Auguier's defence consisted of a senseless satire upon supernatural visitations. Was it, he asked, intended to contradict Holy Writ? to deny a truth attested by Scripture—by the Fathers of the Church—by general experience and testimony—and by the Faculty of Theology of Paris? "Desiring," says the recent decree of that enlightened body, "to satisfy pious scruples, we have, after very careful consideration of the subject, resolved, that the spirits of the departed may and do, by supernatural power and Divine license, reappear unto the living." The weight of probability (he maintained) inclined to the side of this singular apparition being the spirit of one so deceased—perhaps a remote ancestor of Mirabel—or one who, in this life, sympathised with honest endeavour, and wished to endow the struggling, toiling peasant with the means of rest and ease. The speaker here adduced a number of instances of these reappearances, and then addressed himself to the terrestrial facts. Madame Paret had proved that the treasure was found. Deleuil, that it had passed into the hands of Auguier. Other witnesses had proved that Auguier had used many artifices to obtain possession of the gold, cultivating a romantic attachment for this humble labourer, and seeking to inspire him with fears for his personal safety, so long as he retained so large a sum in his hands. Upon the whole, he urged—unless it had been possible to subpoena the very phantom itself—the claim of Mirabel could hardly address itself more strongly to the favourable judgment of the court.

The court, however, felt some hesitation, and at length required that the peasant Bernard should be produced, and undergo a very rigid examination. He stated that, on a certain day, Mirabel told him that a ghost had revealed to him the hidden treasure. That, on the following morning, they searched the spot, but found no money. That, on this, he laughed at Mirabel, snapped his fingers, and went away. That subsequently Mirabel declared he had discovered eighteen pieces of gold—then twelve—then thirty-five—but exhibited none of them. That Mirabel had, however, sent him twenty sols, to give to a priest, to say masses for the soul of the departed, to whom he owed so much, and that he had certainly spoken of handing the treasure to Auguier, and taking the receipt.

The matter was singularly obscure. There was no question that a large sum had, somehow, come into the possession of Mirabel. If he had really found it (and witnesses had proved the apparent discovery), who had revealed the precious deposit to this poor clown? The scale was inclining steadily towards the spectral side, when new and startling testimony appeared. To consider this, a new process was decreed—the main object of which was to discover, first of all, how and whence the money came into Mirabel's possession. Under the pressure of this inquiry, the witness Paret at length confessed—first, that she had never actually seen one coin of the supposed treasure; secondly, that she did not credit one word of Mirabel's story; thirdly, that, if she had deposed otherwise, it was at the earnest entreaty of Mirabel himself. Three new experts unanimously agreed that the document supposed to be written by Auguier, was a well executed forgery.

This, after twenty months, three processes, and the examination of fifty-two witnesses, was fatal to the ghost. He was put out of court. The final decree acquitted Auguier, and condemned Mirabel to the galleys for life.

Why had he done all this?—At an after period, he confessed that an enemy of Auguier's had devised the spectral fable, as a ground for an intended accusation, and to substantiate the latter had lent him (for exhibition) the sum of 20,000 livres. By an after process, the man alluded to, one Barthélemy, was sentenced to the galleys for life.

So far as records go, this singular case was the last in which, in French law-courts, the question of ghost or no ghost has been made the subject of sworn testimony and legal argument.

HENRY SPICER.

THE MAGNETESCOPE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—With reference to Mr. Spicer's observations in "LIGHT" on the Magnetoscope I may, perhaps, save experimenters some trouble if I narrate the result of my experience with the instrument some thirty years ago.

At that time the instrument in Mr. Rutter's hands created a considerable amount of excitement in Brighton and London society.

On one occasion I was invited to attend a meeting of medical men to witness the experiments with the instrument as performed by a physician of eminence who was enthusiastic in its praise. He undertook to prove that various metals on being taken into one hand, while with a finger of the other hand he touched the button attached to the pendulum, caused oscillations invariably of a definite kind—for instance, gold caused the pendulum to oscillate in one direction, iron caused oscillations in another direction, and arsenic in a third direction.

On witnessing those operations it occurred to me to ask the operator if the oscillations would be the same if he were ignorant of the nature of the metal placed in his hand; and he replied it made no difference. Whereupon the experiment was tried and immediate failure was the result. Then it became evident that the oscillations depended on the operator's unconscious muscular movements in obedience to his expectations.

It was afterwards shewn that if the instrument were placed at the end of a stiff table ten feet long, and the operator manipulated with his fingers at the other end of the table, the pendulum could be made to oscillate in any direction desired.

These experiments resulted in the rapid decline, death and burial of the Magnetoscope.

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Mr. Spicer's interesting description of the Magnetoscope is not exactly clear to me; perhaps he will kindly explain the following points:—1. Why is silk used to suspend the pendulum from the conducting arm, since silk is a non-conductor? 2. What purpose does the non-conducting arm serve, as the use of silk to both brings them on a par? 3. Since brass is a conductor, what prevents the fluid running to earth through the supporting pillar? or is it insulated?

If it is magnetism, I do not know of any substance which the magnetic fluid will not penetrate; then, of what use are non-conductors?

If it is "odyle" force, or so-called animal magnetism, I have never found any substance, from a silk handkerchief to a stone wall, prevent its action, and there is plenty of proof that its power can be exercised through a distance of many miles. I shall be glad if someone who has tried this instrument will give the readers of "LIGHT" their experience, in the interest of truth.—I am, yours truly,

J. F. YOUNG.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—May I ask Mr. Spicer, through the medium of your columns, if the Magnetoscope is to be purchased ready made, and if so where?—Yours truly,

W. W. C.

Dorking, February 13th, 1883.

"GHOSTS."—At the Fortnightly Discussion Meeting of the C.A.S., to be held at 7.30 on Monday week, 26th instant, at 38, Great Russell-street, Mr. F. Podmore will read a paper on "Ghosts." We trust that there will be a large gathering of members, and that the members will also endeavour to induce their friends to accompany them. These meetings are free to all who desire to attend.

SPIRITUALISM UNMASKED.

Challenge to Mr. Bishop.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—From an article in the Liverpool Mercury I extract the following:—

"One of the most extraordinary demonstrations of thought-reading perhaps ever witnessed was given under very wonderful conditions, and in the presence of thousands of people, in the open air on Saturday afternoon, by Mr. W. Irving Bishop. Some days ago Mr. William Ladyman, dentist, Daulby-street, wrote to Mr. Bishop, making the following proposition:—'As one of your committee on the occasion of your last visit here, I have had frequent inquiries as to the scope of your power of "thought-reading," and it has been doubted whether you could as successfully experiment in the open air. One of the questioners has gone so far as to place in my hands the sum of £10, asking me to communicate to you the following offer:—He declares himself willing to forfeit that sum if you will find a pin which shall be concealed in the street within a radius of 500 yards of your present residence. The experiment, he wishes, should take place twelve hours after the pin has been hidden. He will allow half an hour for the experiment, and has asked me to become the medium of the experiment. If you deposit a similar sum, he is willing that whichever party wins should give the money to a local charity.' Mr. Bishop replied, accepting the challenge, making the following conditions for the test:—'I shall be securely blindfolded, and a committee of well-known gentlemen will superintend the proceedings. The only connection I ask between the concealer of the pin and myself will be a slender copper wire, but he must form in his mind an accurate image of the pin and its hiding-place. An empty pincushion will be placed in the balcony of the hotel, and the task imposed upon me is to find the pin and return it to the cushion before half-past one.'"

After these conditions had been agreed to, the pin to be sought for was marked by the Rev. J. H. Skeeves (who seems to have taken great interest in the "unmasking" process), and Mr. Ladyman proceeded to hide it. At the appointed time Mr. Bishop started from his hotel in the presence of six or seven thousand spectators, and probably accompanied by his committee of "well-known gentlemen." After a headlong rush for a period of six minutes, Bishop found the pin in the balcony of the Neptune Hotel, the discovery being greeted with loud cheers by the crowd which had followed. In the evening, so I learn from the paper quoted, Bishop's performance was witnessed by an immense audience, and "many well-known savants were present." I have quoted at this length that your readers may understand the whole transaction by which Spiritualism was "unmasked," and I will now proceed to explain why I venture to trouble you with this narrative of Mr. Bishop's skill in thought-reading. It will at once strike your readers that the evidence presented is of the very weakest kind, and is such as no Spiritualist would accept in his investigation with a reputed medium. The great flaw that presents itself is—who is the gentleman who was so willing to trust his friend Mr. Ladyman with the hiding of the pin, and by which he advertised Bishop more than anything else could have done? Supposing we were to declare anonymously that we had seen an astounding phenomenon occur in the presence of a medium, would not Mr. Bishop be the first to challenge the evidence on the ground of the writers being unknown to him? Without at all imputing to the gentlemen connected with this experiment any conscious deception, it will strike one as being most extraordinary that a committee of well-known gentlemen, but unknown to Bishop, was not chosen to hide the pin, when the success of the phenomenon under such conditions would have conclusively proved to the thinking portion of the public that thought-reading was an actual fact. And as I read the article in question, I could not help feeling that, considering the advantages Bishop was to derive from the experiment, there is another and very simple explanation than that of the pin having been found by "thought-reading." Indeed, the explanation is so obvious that no one will be mystified as to what it is. But assuming it to have been a genuine exhibition of Bishop's mental power, I shall be pleased to make the following offer:—I will place in the hands of the Psychical Society the sum of £10, and that Society shall choose a committee of six of its members, to mark and hide a pin in a similar manner to that adopted by Mr. Ladyman. Bishop shall allow himself the like conditions of being blindfolded and a copper wire; and if he, under these circumstances, will guide any one of the six gentlemen to the spot where the pin is hidden, I will forfeit the sum above-named, and will publish the result in the newspapers. Should the Psychical Society and Mr. Bishop consent to this, and the latter succeed, he will at once see the importance it will give him in having been successful with a committee of scientific gentlemen, whose testimony no one will doubt, besides having clearly demonstrated that his power of thought-reading has stood the calm and deliberate test of a body of men who have already satisfied themselves of the existence of such a power.

The allusion in the Liverpool Mercury to Spiritualism being "unmasked" is unworthy further notice.—Yours faithfully,
W. E.
Onslow-gardens, S.W.

BISHOP WILBERFORCE SEES A GHOST.

Vanity Fair gives the following story as having been told by the late Bishop Wilberforce:—

"It happened that once I was staying in one of the old country houses, which had remained in the possession of an old Roman Catholic family. Wanting a book, I went down late one night into the library. I saw there an old gentleman sitting in a chair, who, on my taking a book, got up and passed to a door behind him. I begged him not to disturb himself, and went again upstairs. The next night I wanted the second volume, and again saw the old man. The next day I said to Lord—, 'I fear I have disturbed your chaplain or librarian,' and told him whom I had seen. Lord—replied, 'Oh, that room is haunted by an old priest.' I then determined to speak to him, and accordingly the same night I went down again, and when the figure rose I observed that it had on a clerical dress. I then said, 'Who are you? I am a Bishop of the Church of England; why are you here, and what want you?' The figure replied, 'I was a priest in this house, and having heard the last confession of one of the lords, I put it down on paper and hid it here. Death prevented my destroying it, and I have waited here watching lest it should be found. Swear that you will destroy it unread, and I will leave for ever this place.' I swore that I would do as he wished, and he pointed to some old books. I took one down, and the figure shook his head. I took down another and found a paper in it. I at once took it to the fireplace, lighted it with my candle, and disappeared, and, I believe, has never been seen again."

MISS WOOD'S MEDIUMSHIP.

We find the following paragraph in the Harbinger of Light (Melbourne):—

"We learn from 'LIGHT' that Miss Wood, the medium for spirit materialization, who was said to have been 'exposed' a few years ago, is now giving sances to members of the Central Association of Spiritualists, London, of an eminently satisfactory character."

This paragraph will be misleading if it is taken to have reference to recent sances. We have no desire to say a word to the injury of Miss Wood; and if her late sances at the rooms of the C.A.S. had really been "eminently satisfactory," it would have given us great pleasure to announce the fact. But her recent course of "test" sances—Miss Wood sitting near the curtains of the cabinet, but outside of it, and in view of the committee, the light never being sufficiently subdued to prevent her being seen—were absolutely without results. It is, however, due to Miss Wood that we should say that she has herself proposed another course of sittings, expressing confidence that they will be attended with success. For further information we refer our readers to a report of the last Council meeting of the C.A.S., given in the present number of "LIGHT."

AT THE POINT OF DEATH.—M. Constant Savy, who wrote on Spiritualism, thus relates in his "Pensées et Méditations" an extraordinary experience when he was apparently at the point of death:—"I felt very ill. I had no strength. It seemed to me that my life was making efforts to resist death, but in vain, and that life was about to escape. My soul detached itself little by little from the matter spread all over my frame. I felt it retiring from all those parts with which it is so intimately united, and as if I were concentrating myself upon one single point—the heart, and a thousand obscure cloudy thoughts about my future spirit-life occupied me. Little by little nature faded from before me, taking irregular and strange forms. I all but lost thought, and only retained my feeling, and this was love. But I could not manifest my love. My soul was centred in one single spot in my body yet I could not command it. It felt some distractions still, caused by bodily pains and the grief of those round me. My life was now only attached to matter by one of the many thousand links that had formerly bound it. Suddenly marking the passage from this world to the next there came thick darkness, then brilliant light; then I saw what spiritual light was and, in it, all I had loved, who had inspired my life, who seemed to dwell in me and float about me. They waited for me, and we completed each others' lives. The happiness penetrated me. Then I saw into the centre and secrets of earth—the mines, the floods, insects, and depths of volcanoes—nothing all over the earth seemed hidden from sight."

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

The first meeting of the newly elected Council of the C.A.S. was held at 38, Great Russell-street, on Tuesday evening last. There was a very full attendance. Mr. E. Dawson Rogers took the chair as a Vice-President of the Association, but retired from the room on an intimation from Mr. Morse that he was about to propose a resolution in the course of which his (Mr. E. Dawson Rogers') name would be mentioned.

Mr. Morell Theobald was then called to the chair, and proposed that Mr. E. Dawson Rogers should be elected President of the Association for the ensuing year. This was seconded by Mr. Morse, and carried unanimously.

Mr. E. Dawson Rogers having been recalled and informed of what had been done, thanked the Council for this expression of their kindly feeling, but said that as the position was one of no little responsibility he should like to take time before he decided whether he should accept it or not.

The Vice-Presidents were then re-elected, with the addition of the name of Mr. Morell Theobald.

The usual committees were appointed, and on the motion of Mr. Morell Theobald several members were chosen to constitute a special committee to consider and report on the financial position of the Association, and the best means of either increasing its funds or decreasing its expenditure.

A report was brought up from the committee constituting the circle for the recent sances with Miss Wood, but as it appeared that the report had not been seen and approved by all the members, it was referred back to the committee. The purport of the report was that the sances had been without results. In answer to inquiries it was stated that Miss Wood had proposed another series of sittings, and that the committee had assented; but that the date for their commencement had been deferred from time to time at Miss Wood's request, and the committee were still without information as to the period which would suit her.

Mr. Farmer brought up a number of valuable suggestions for active work by the Association, and moved the appointment of a committee to consider them, and, as far as possible, to take steps for giving them effect. This was seconded by Mr. Morell Theobald, and cordially adopted.

ST. ANDREWS HALL.

14, NEWMAN-STREET, OXFORD-STREET, LONDON.

The audience at this hall on Sunday last, when the subject of the lecture was "Humanity: Its Life," must have been profoundly interested alike by the form and the substance of the discourse, and it probably occurred to many of the regular visitors that the growing power of the manipulation of the medium by the unquestionably competent control is a tolerably effective demonstration of their own theory of evolution; for the clear and incisive style, the rich variety of illustration and argument, sustaining and adorning, but never confusing the dominant ideas, characteristic of every delivery, are increasingly evident as the series progresses. The Council of the Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum are rightly a little restive; they do not approve limiting the benefits of such exhaustive teaching to the area represented by the influence of the fluctuating personal attendance, and will never be satisfied until their resources enable them to issue verbatim reports of each lecture for broadcast distribution. To every individual who was present on Sunday last a bare selection of some of the points then raised must be in the nature of a personal aggravation, and cannot fail to provoke a sentiment of hostility towards the reporter who says so little and omits so much. Well, the subject on this occasion was introduced by a reproduction of the leading thought of the preceding lecture—that humanity is to be regarded as an expression of the will and purpose of the Divinity, and that any indicated condition of human progress represents simply the sum, at that stage, of the Divine revelation to the human consciousness. The life of this humanity, always throbbing and eager, and depending for its vigour and completeness upon the combined intellectual, moral, and physical development of the race, was then reviewed under the various and struggling aspects of its barbaric past, and traced to the glowing promise of its encouraging present. From the misery and strife of that more or less unhappy past were evolved in man those higher qualities which, while securing his release from oppression and wrong, and supplying a guarantee that further progress would be expedited precisely because it would start from the advanced position thus reached, permitted his appropriation of the wreck of those precedent conditions as the materials for his development. Progress worked for, fought for, is firmly grasped, and a relapse becomes impossible in the presence of the capacity for a better and nobler life, resulting from the conflict itself, with its associated assurance that as the road from the brutal animal past had been so successfully traversed, so should humanity continue the journey to its glorious angelic future—to its God. Anticipating, perhaps, the surprise of his hearers, accustomed to his invective against every form of war and its adjuncts, the lecturer explained why he put the representative of conflict, the warrior, in the front of the elementary conditions of the progress of the race. First, as a matter of fact, he was there, and that in itself would be a sufficient reason; but next and indisputably, there did emerge from the relentlessly fierce and cruel and bloodthirsty strife, everywhere prevalent in the past, a range of powers and a robustness of character which enabled man to vindicate his common right "To be, and to be happy in that being." Resulting from the establishment of social order by this agency of Force, the politician appeared, to secure, if possible, to every section of the community its fair share,—or, perhaps, to special classes, an unfair share,—of the blessings and advantages of public government. And between these two—between the warrior and the politician—there arose another order, exercising at first wisely, and then with cunning, a preponderating influence—retained in large measure to this day—the order of the priest, sanctifying the deeds of the warrior, standing, in all things, between this world and the next, claiming to be the interpreter of the Divine will, and giving thus a specific and ostensibly wholesome direction to the life of humanity. But do these representatives of ruling powers, in their earlier characteristics, express by their external relations the internal principles of this life? Clearly not. Still, the function of the priest is not a failure, although the character of the priesthood will change; nor is the politician or the warrior of the past a failure, for each and all, upon the lower plane of being, in relation to which we have so far regarded them, were certainly the exterior expression of interior qualities, and of powerful facts in life. But the genesis and exodus of man are not summed up in threescore years and ten. All external facts respond to interior spiritual necessities, and as these are fully realised in their truer nature, we come to rely more upon the intuitional tendencies of man, and perceive that the race is indeed the manifestation of the Divinity. From these three ruling factors are evolved other three. The sanguinary horrors of the trade of the warrior provoke rebellion. From rebellion is presently introduced the reformer, encouraging a love of freedom and a hatred of war as needful preliminary conditions for a true and fruitful life of humanity. The politician, already a patriot, then takes to larger views, and finds his country and kindred everywhere, when philosophy comes forward and teaches, that however full of blunders and miseries and apparent failures the life of humanity may have seemed to be when viewed from one pedestal (a process which was deprecated), there has not been, and cannot be, stagnation. Agitation of thought, said the lecturer—taking liberties with a phrase commonly introduced otherwise—is the beginning of wisdom, and the conflicts of philosophy constrain intellectual progress, assist the politician, and presently further the evolution of the Divine principle. Following the philosopher, we must note the seer, but not necessarily in the spiritual sense, which would limit his perception to celestial things perhaps. There are born into this world, from time to time, men capable of detecting, analysing, guiding, the dominant features of an age in every department; men who recognise some principle of being which the race does not or did not see; but of which they affirm the inherent Divinity, and its quality to minister to the progress and happiness of the world. With such capacity of insight it is only another step to perceive that the ultimate triumph of the truly spiritual shall be final and complete, when truth, honesty, purity, wisdom, and nobility of character generally will prove to be the enduring elements of human existence, until life shall compass a perfection of universal love, and in the brotherhood of man the world shall recognise the Fatherhood of God. This spiritual force, then, is the one essential element needful to perfect the life of humanity, and its prevalence is ultimately certain; for, although this is not quite so near as we should like it to be, it must be remembered that the actual qualities of the life of one generation are prolific of good to the next; and the seer perceives the reality of this, beneath the outward and apparently adverse surroundings which temporarily repress the expression of the Divine principle in man. As the advance is, in a measure, achieved, philosophy will apply her truths to all the affairs of life, will fight and struggle with intense earnestness, and then—may God protect and sustain the right! for the day of humanity and peace is at hand, when the truer religion shall disestablish every wrong, and bring its consolations to every striving soul; when liturgies and rituals shall disappear, and ambassadors between God and humanity receive their discharge. What a liberation for the conscience of humanity! what a larger life, combining all the higher qualities of the politician, the philosopher, and priest! Let us salute this advancing perfection of the life of humanity, this erect presentment of the Divine, proudly conscious that all its deeds are of love, that it is incapable of a lie or a fraudulent pretence in thought or act, and that its one absorbing purpose is the greatest good of the greatest number.—S. B.

The next address of the series, for Sunday, the 18th, is entitled "Humanity: its Death."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—The hall at Weirs Court, on Sunday evening last, was well attended, a goodly audience having assembled to hear an address from Mr. W. H. Robinson on "Some Proofs of a Future Life after Physical Death." The speaker, who read his discourse, handled the subject in a thoroughly able manner, clinching his arguments with most conclusive deductions. The address was highly appreciated by the company present, and was deservedly applauded. Mr. Kersey occupied the chair, and in the name of the members expressed a desire that Mr. Robinson should visit them again at an early date.

GATESHEAD.—Mr. S. Compton, an old spiritualistic worker in the North of England, addressed the friends at Gateshead, on Sunday evening last, upon his "Experiences in Spiritualism." Illustrating his doubts and fears as a Methodist in regard to some austerities of his former creeds, he proceeded to show how he was led by contact with Spiritualism to eschew the old landmarks and take a bold stand for the facts and philosophy of our movement, which he characterised in an interesting discourse as the most beautiful, and of all forms of truth the most appreciable, that had been given to the world. Mr. Burton occupied the chair, and announced that on Sunday next, February 18th, Mr. T. P. Barkas would lecture on "God in Nature."—NORTHUMBRIA.

SPIRITUALISM AND THOUGHT-READING IN LANCASHIRE.

The Rev. E. Heath, B.A., one of the curates of the parish church at Ulverston, has become a convert to Spiritualism, though he was formerly particularly incredulous on the subject. At a recent church entertainment at Ulverston, his co-curate, the Rev. V. G. McNally, gave some examples of thought-reading which were quite as successful as the performances of the same kind by Stuart Cumberland and Irving Bishop. Mr. McNally twice found, while blind-folded, an image and also a pin, which had been hidden during his absence in an ante-room, by members of a committee appointed by the audience. On Friday evening, the Rev. E. H. Sugden, B.A., a Wesleyan minister, gave a series of thought-reading experiments in the Wesleyan school at Cloughton, in a manner which proved him to be even more expert than Mr. Bishop. Both Mr. McNally and Mr. Sugden assert that the power of thought-reading is practically a universal gift; indeed, Mr. Bishop recently asserted in Liverpool that there was hardly a family in that city in which there was not some one endowed with the capacity. It seems a strange irony of circumstances that the clergy, who have been such bitter antagonists of Spiritualism, should be the pioneers in the demonstration as a fact of that which has been equally as incredible to the majority of mankind, and which indeed is closely allied to Spiritualism, and must lead to that all-important and highly-favourable result, for Spiritualists—the recognition by scientists, of the psychological element as a reality. The Liverpool newspapers lately have been teeming with correspondence on the subjects of Thought-reading and Spiritualism, and Mr. Bishop's exploits there have caused an immense sensation, and are leading people to ask themselves whether, if mankind at large, and scientific men in particular, have been so wrong as to the possibility of the power which Mr. Bishop exercises, they may not be equally wrong as to the possibility of spirit communion. On the whole, therefore, the expositions of such men as Bishop and Cumberland, accompanied though they are with attacks on Spiritualism, may prove to be a distinct gain to it. The Liverpool Post maintains that thought-reading is no more to be credited than Spiritualism, and asserts that no sane man can possibly believe that Bishop's recent extraordinary pin-finding manifestation in the streets of Liverpool was produced without collusion. There must then be a considerable number of insane people in Liverpool, considering how the public shewed their acceptance of Bishop's assurances that the exploit was genuine, by cheering him enthusiastically. The Liverpool Post does not see that by its remark it is furnishing an argument in favour of Spiritualism, since it plainly tells all who have had proof of thought-reading that as they have accepted the one they are logically bound to accept the other; and no doubt many of its readers will duly appreciate the hint.—(Communicated.)

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S. N.—Your kind suggestion shall have consideration.

W. E.—Apply to the secretary of the Central Association of Spiritualists, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

J. E. P.—Received just as we are going to press. Shall be able to publish your communication next week, we hope.

"SHELLS."—We have several letters on "Shells" in reply to the "Writers of 'The Perfect Way';" but their publication would simply lead to further controversy on a subject of which we feel that very many of our readers are already becoming somewhat weary.

MR. WASHINGTON IRVING BISHOP has recently been astonishing the people of Liverpool by his remarkable experiments in thought-reading, and, in addition, "exposing" Spiritualism. During his visit to that city a hot controversy took place in the newspapers, it having been alleged that Mr. Bishop had started his public career as a professional medium, a statement which he promptly and emphatically denied. Having had some intimation that he at one period professed to have the gift of mediumship, we shall be glad if our readers in the United States will kindly send us proof that such was the case, if it really was so.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

(With which is incorporated the British National Association of Spiritualists. Established 1873.)

38 GREAT RUSSELL ST., BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.
(Entrance in WOBURN STREET.)

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed for the purpose of uniting Spiritualists of every variety of opinion in an organized body, with a view of promoting the investigation of the facts of Spiritualism, and of aiding students and enquirers in their researches by providing them with the best means of investigation. The Association is governed by a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Council of thirty Members elected annually.

The Reference and Lending Libraries contain a large collection of the best works on Spiritualism and occult subjects. Spiritualist and other newspapers and periodicals from all parts of the world are regularly supplied for the Reading Room, to which Members have access daily.

The Secretary, or his representative, is in attendance to receive visitors, and answer enquiries; on Saturdays, from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.; on other days from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. On Sundays the Rooms are closed.

Spiritualists and others visiting the Metropolis are cordially invited to visit the Association and inspect the various objects of interest on view in the Reading Room and Library. Information is cheerfully afforded to enquirers on all questions affecting Spiritualism.

Members' Free Schools are held on Wednesday evenings, at 8 o'clock prompt subject to certain regulations, which can be ascertained on application.

Discussion Meetings are held fortnightly during the winter months. Admission free to Members and Subscribers, who can introduce one or more friends to each meeting. Programmes can be obtained on application during the winter season. Soirées, at which all friends are welcome, are held at intervals during the season. An admission fee is charged, including refreshments.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

The world is the poorer this disastrous year—so young, yet so full of sorrow and distress—for the withdrawal of many great men. Its opening hours saw the release of one who was great among statesmen, and whose singular honour it was to stand out in a national crisis as the saviour of his country. "Poor Doré" is gone. Why (parenthetically) do people speak of those who have advanced into a presumably higher state of being as "poor"? Poor in what? It is we who remain in this state, and lament our own great loss, who are poor; but they can hardly be the worse, and are, we trust, much better for their deliverance from the burden of the flesh. And now Wagner is gone. Probably no man of our generation more distinctly shewed the divine mark of Genius than he. Erratic it was—genius like his does not conform to petty rules, and is not governed by conventionalities; but none, surely, will deny that his was a master-mind, and that we are the richer for his work, as we are assuredly the poorer for his loss. Like all men of genius, he seems to have had his flashes of inspiration outside of that which he received in his own proper work. There all genius is inspiration. But he had his premonitions too. While directing a concert in honour of his wife's birthday, he suddenly laid down his bâton, saying, "I shall never direct an orchestra again, nor compose any more." Being asked his reason for so dire a prophecy, he replied, "I shall die before the spring comes," and now, before the flowers of earliest spring gladden us, his spirit is free. "His body lies in state, beneath its pall of cloth of gold." What of that master-spirit that has left the worn-out tenement?

Psychopathic notes continue to pour in. From the evident interest taken in the subject I feel sure that I may quote a case which has reached me from a private source, before I direct attention to the remarkable records of mesmeric healing, and of surgical operations during the mesmeric sleep of the patient, which are little known to the present generation. It is most surprising that records of the amputation of limbs, such as were recorded by observers whose qualifications are beyond doubt, and whose honesty is unimpeached, should have faded out as they have. The study of the reports of the Mesmeric Hospital is full of interest and instruction. There can be no fair cause for doubt that nature has endowed man, or some men at any rate, with a gift that is lamentably neglected. But before I go into this question, I will give a case of healing by a lady in private life, whose name I have no authority to make public. This lady is a Spiritualist, and attributes her gift to spirit-power, but from the great prejudice against the subject in her family, she spoke of it as "Mesmerism." I quote the case from among others in a private letter addressed to myself.

"We had a coachman who had been with us since he was a lad. Some seven or eight years ago, he had for several months been suffering from failing eye-sight. One morning in London he said to me with much emotion, that he feared he should have to give up his situation, his left eye having become so blind that it was quite useless to him, and he feared to drive me through the crowded streets of London, lest an accident should befall me. He added that he had had advice from several medical men to no purpose, and he had that morning consulted a chemist, who told him he feared it was a bad case, and he dared not interfere in it. My grown-up daughter was in the room, and I said in French to her, that sooner than lose a valuable and attached servant, I would try what I could do, if she would remain in the room. I then had him sit down, and made passes over his left eye, when he said, 'It feels like pins and needles going through it.' After a few minutes he said, 'Why it is not so dim as it was.' Feeling tired, I then told him to come again to me in the afternoon, when I again made passes and breathed over the eye, with increasing success. I regularly continued this for four or five days more and more successfully, until his left eye was not only completely restored, but his right eye thoroughly cleared also. He resumed his duties at once as coachman through the London season, and ever since; being still with us, with perfectly good eye-sight. I have since cured a fellow Spiritualist in a similar manner of a medically acknowledged cataract of a very bad type, and it has never returned."

A volume of Reports of the London Mesmeric Infirmary, 36, Weymouth-street, Portland-place, extending from 1849 to 1869, furnishes abundant and striking evidence of the value of mesmerism as a curative agent, and of its efficacy as an anæsthetic. Scattered up and down in the records of these twenty years, are cures of neuralgia, nervous pains and disorders, chorea, sciatica, and similar ailments. This one would look for, but other and more serious diseases yield to the same treatment. One remarkable case is that of inflammation of the shoulder-joint, in a boy of eleven years of age. The case was sent by Dr. Elliotson to Professor Ferguson, of King's College. He pronounced it one of slow inflammation, and recommended blistering, and cod liver oil. The shoulder was extremely tender to the touch, "the weight and dragging of the arm were insupportable," and the "disease threatened to produce devastation of the shoulder-joint, suppuration, exfoliation, and all the sad results of scrofulous disease of joints." Dr. Elliotson sent the patient to the Mesmeric Infirmary on the 22nd of March, 1854. Mr. Gardiner mesmerised the shoulder daily with instant effect. By the 13th of May the boy "could move the shoulder in all directions, allow it to hang down, and bear it to be pressed upon, and the arm to be moved in all directions by another person." Dr. Elliotson sent the patient to Mr. Ferguson, who wrote back that it was "indeed highly gratifying to see such a favourable change in a case which looked so alarming." There can be no mistake about such a cure as this.

Other cases of organic disease, or functional affections—I exclude nervous ailments for my present purpose—are very numerous. Inflammation of the eyes, asthma, abscesses, tumours, dropsy, paralysis of limbs, epilepsy, skin diseases, rheumatic and gouty affections, sprains, hemiplegia,—one case, in which the patient could not walk without the aid of two sticks, dragged his right leg, and could not bend it, was perfectly cured in six weeks—chronic bronchitis, hæmaturia, chronic pericarditis, quinsy, chronic ophthalmia with ulceration, and nebulous opacity of the cornea (a case of Mr. White Cooper's, of extreme severity, cured absolutely in six months by daily mesmerism)—these are among the diseases which are recorded as having been treated with perfect success. Many of the cases are remarkable in a high degree, and all are recorded with complete precision by properly qualified observers. I might quote dozens where unquestioned cures of unmistakable disease were wrought. But I may, perhaps, do better if I first point to one of several cases where surgical operations were performed painlessly on mesmerised patients. I have before me a pamphlet of Dr. Elliotson's, in which he records, among other cases, one which may serve as a specimen.

The patient was a labourer, six feet high and forty-two years of age, who had suffered for nearly five years from neglected disease of the left knee, "the interior of the joint of which was found after amputation to be deeply and extensively ulcerated." He was mesmerised by Sir (then Mr.) William Topham, and the limb was removed by Mr. W. Squire Ward, surgeon, of Wellow Hall. "Mr. Ward, after one earnest look at the man, slowly plunged his knife into the centre of the outside of the thigh, directly to the bone, and then made a clear incision round the bone to the opposite point on the inside of the thigh. . . . The placid look of the man's countenance never changed for an instant, his whole frame rested, uncontrolled, in perfect stillness and repose; not a muscle was seen to twitch. To the end of the operation, including the sawing of the bone, securing the arteries, and applying the bandages, occupying a period of upwards of twenty minutes, he lay like a statue." Nor was this perfect repose interfered with when Mr. Ward "twice touched pretty roughly and with the points of the forceps, so that he in fact pricked, the divided end of the sciatic nerve." After the man had been removed to another room he stated, in answer to Mr. Topham, "I never felt any pain at all; only once I felt as if I heard a kind of crunching." The crunching, no doubt, was the sawing of the thigh bone.

THE ROYAL GIFT OF HEALING.

The power of healing disease by a virtue conveyed through the hands has been known in all times and in all parts of the world, as testified by the histories of nations and by the narratives of nearly all travellers among primitive peoples. Exercised in the past by kings and priests, it was regarded as proper to them in their presumed divine character. Thus Shakespeare (Macbeth, Act 4 Sc. 3) puts this into the mouth of the king's physician:—

" * * * How he solicits Heaven
Himself best knows; but strangely visited people,
All swollen and ulcerous, pitiful to the eye,
The mere despair of surgery, he cures.
* * *
* * * For the succeeding royalty he leaves
The healing benediction."

But when subjects and laity were found to be similarly endowed it became clear that it was a gift belonging to our common humanity.

It is interesting, nevertheless, and instructive to learn what this power has done by royal hands.

In France history speaks of several kings conspicuous for the gift of healing, from Clovis downward. Philippe I. is named as one who lost the gift through the irregularities of his life. Some kings, we are told by Heylin in his Cosmographie, before exercising it prepared themselves by fasting. Philippe de Valois healed 1,400 sick people; Louis XIV. 1,600, using the formula with each "Le Roy te touche, Dieu te guerisse" ("The King touches, may God heal thee!")

In England several kings from the time of Edward the Confessor, used the power. The so-called miraculous gifts of some of them are spoken of by Jeremy Collier. Malmesbury relates that a woman afflicted with scrofula was cured by the king rubbing her neck with his fingers—a royal precedent for this mode of healing. John of Gaddesden, chief Court physician, when he found he could not cure certain patients submitted them to the king for touching. Clowes, Queen Elizabeth's physician, speaks of scrofula as a disease repugnant to nature, but curable by the royal touch. Evelyn, in his diary, March 23th, 1684, writes that: "So many were taken to be touched that each was required to have a certificate, and so great was the concourse of people with children at the surgeon's door for certificates that six or seven were crushed to death." The London Gazette for October, 1686, announced that the king would heal weekly, on Fridays. Wiseman, in his work on surgery, alludes to cures of King's Evil by the touch.

But as if to make it manifest that the efficacy of the touch was not specially royal, in the reign of the same king, Charles II., appeared Valentine Greatrakes, curing by the hand not only King's Evil but many other so-called intractable diseases. He published a book at Oxford, entitled, "An Account of Marvellous Cures Performed by the Stroking of the Hands, by Mr. Valentine Greatrakes." This book was dedicated to the Hon. Robert Boyle, and contained the testimonies of persons of eminence in Church and State. It was reprinted in 1723.

Among kings the power seems to have varied in degree as we, in the present day, find it vary among us subjects. Some of them seem to have been advised to strengthen the power by a preliminary fast; the fasting of one was of nine days' duration. What was a royal fast we are not informed; surely not abstaining from food; perhaps it was taking fish, eggs, brown bread, and milk, instead of red meats and wines. Greatrakes himself could not, perhaps, have had a better dietetic preparation for his healing work; and modern magnetisers and mesmerisers might fast with advantage in a similar way.

After Greatrakes, one named Leverett, a gardener, announced himself as a healer; but he was not equal to extensive work, for he complained that "after touching thirty or forty sick he felt as much goodness gone from him as if he had been digging eight roods of ground."

The kings who touched and rubbed, Greatrakes and Leverett, magnetisers, mesmerisers, and healers of subsequent and the present times, are they not all of one category? All of us may have the power to heal; some may be more largely endowed than others; each may have it of a particular degree and quality.

In many cases one touching or application is enough, but in very many others, repetitions more or less frequent are found necessary.

It astonishes many who have suffered from ailments which have come on quickly to find how quickly they have passed off under the action of the human magnetic or mesmeric force (fluid). This has been when they have been particularly reactive to the force, or susceptible. For illustration:—A lady, at times, comes to me, who is constitutionally subject to attacks of excessive morbid sensitiveness. I lay my hand, in mental prayer, upon her head, and tranquillity of the nervous system follows on the instant. If a suffering fellow-creature comes, I always pray mentally to the Heavenly Father for power to heal; for His is the power acting through us who make no claim to any special divine quality. A clergyman came with such derangement of the nervous system that his duties were impossible to him. A few mesmerisations restored his equilibrium, and he returned to his pulpit. Another came limping in with bad gouty pain; after a short treatment he rose, shook his limbs, and then danced about, saying, "This is not clerical, friend Didier, but it is joyful and thankful." A lady came recently with erysipelas of the face; her nose was very much swollen. Her troubles vanished at the end of one sitting. I have just received news from one who was pronounced to have his left lung consolidated in consequence of inflammation. I mesmerised him a few times during one month. He writes that he continues quite well.

Happier results from the too much disregarded human magnetism could not follow the historically-vaunted royal touch than those which abound in the experience of all mesmerisers.

In this work of healing beneficent spirits may co-operate, and some mesmerisers say they are conscious of it. This is quite credible and reasonable to those who believe, as I do, that there is an interblending of the spiritual with this sphere of being.

STRAY THOUGHTS ON CURRENT TOPICS.

The Value of Organisation.

It is a maxim familiar to us all that "Union is Strength"; and by virtue of belief in the maxim, and by social necessity, organisations have sprung into existence, whose objects have been the investigation of spiritualistic phenomena, the expounding of spiritual philosophy, and the dissemination of the literature of the movement.

Now I venture to assert that these objects are good and useful ones, and I have frequently been perplexed and pained at the inconsistency which, whilst working zealously for Spiritualism in a particular direction, unmercifully condemns all methods not associated with its own. Is not organisation strength? Is it not better than want of organisation? No man of sense will dispute the point.

That organisation is absolutely necessary was proved in the past, and is being proved to-day, and a statement of how Spiritualism has developed itself in this town will show some of the causes which led to the establishing of a society.

About three years ago Spiritualism in North Shields was under a cloud. It had but few followers, but few defenders, and I think only two or three "circles." Since then much progress has been made. A few pious men and women (as earnest as pious) commenced the investigation of its phenomena in a proper frame of mind. They soon became convinced of the reality of spirit-communion, and this great fact so gladdened their whole being, that since that hour they have steadily pursued their upward course untroubled by the threats of former companions, and unawed by the voice of priestly authority. The fear of death was dispelled; and with enlightened vision they beheld all things made new; the Gospel of Jesus being at last to them a message of love and peace. It has interested and pleased me exceedingly, and is a cause of profound thankfulness, to hear men and women rapidly approaching their allotted term of three score years and ten, say: "Thank God for the light and blessings which Spiritualism has brought me. I was like one walking in darkness; the teachings of the churches and chapels never gave me such hope of immortality, such a glimpse of the 'life beyond the river.' Now I can understand the Gospels, and can appreciate the teachings of Paul."

Sir, this is no exaggeration. These remarks I have heard again, again, and again, and it is well to let them come to the front sometimes as an answer to the oft-repeated inquiry:—"What good is there in Spiritualism?"

Well, several additional circles were established in our midst; but one, the chief circle, grew to such dimensions as to make the inmates of the small house in which it was held, somewhat alarmed for the comfort of the sitters. The sitters, too, with commendable consideration, began to fear that they were intruding on the domestic comfort of their hosts, and thus it came to pass that a suggestion was made to hire a room to be used solely for investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism and engaging in devotional exercises. Thus was the Society born.

Unprejudiced minds will admit the difficulty of holding séances in small rooms overcrowded with enthusiastic sitters. Under such conditions physical comfort is impossible, and harmony exceedingly difficult of acquiring. It may be said—"Break up the large circle, and hold séances in several homes instead of in one." Here we are confronted with difficulties known only to the poor. Some member of the circle who would gladly offer his premises for holding a weekly service, is precluded from doing so because he is possessed of only two rooms, and the partitions are so thin that the presence of unfamiliar men and women would disturb the sleeping children. Another has three rooms, but the aged parents who live with the family are prejudiced against Spiritualism, and filial respect moves the children to be silent on a theme they long to expound. Another member has a sick wife; a wife has a sick husband; a son dare not broach the subject to his parents; and in hundreds of other different ways, easy enough to conceive, many true-hearted Spiritualists are prevented from carrying out their wishes. Under these circumstances what is to be done? Break up circle-sitting? Forego spirit-communion? Or go from door to door asking permission to sit with the inmates? Or as another alternative, shall they purchase the weekly literature of the movement, and read of spirit-communion they must never enjoy; and of phenomenal wonders they are doomed never to witness? Really, sir, I have no patience with people who can view Spiritualism from no other standpoint than that which leads to the advancement of their own particular interests or hobbies. Organisation is absolutely necessary to diffuse abroad a knowledge of spiritual phenomena, philosophy, science, and religion, but like all things connected with and inter-penetrating human affairs, it is not an unalloyed blessing.

We Spiritualists may boast as we please about freedom of thought, and may profess to esteem a man for what he is intrinsically worth, rather than for his worldly possessions; but I have found, to my great regret, too much consideration given to those who are only great in worldly wealth. Spiritualists, as a rule, have not strength of mind sufficient to move them to elect to the highest offices men super-eminent in moral and spiritual qualities. The chief desire has seemed to be to elect men who occupy the best social positions, and are best able to subscribe to financial projects. And yet my experience has shewn me that the truest manhood of England is to be found amongst those who earn their living by the sweat of their brows.

My heart, Mr. Editor, went out in affection the other evening to one of these, a man earning about twenty-six or seven shillings a week, with which he supports himself, a wife, and several children. We had assembled for devotion, and my friend offered up a beautiful prayer, in which the following passage occurred:—"O Thou Infinite and All Merciful Father, we thank Thee for the blessings of this life, for Thy bounteousness and ever-loving care. Thou hast been with us and guarded us in the past; O be our Father, Friend, and Guide in days to come. Teach us to approach Thee with grateful hearts, and in a spirit of humility to ask the aid of Thy holy ones, the angels, who execute Thy will by ministering to the wants of their mortal brethren. And in every trial to which Thou mayest think fit to subject us, O teach us to recognise the hand of a watchful Parent teaching His children their strength and weakness; and thus may we grow in wisdom, blessed by the influence of Thy abiding love."

Sir, this prayer, coming from one barely able to keep body and soul together, struck me as a splendid example of true manhood; such manhood as, if a soldier, would conquer the world with a leader like Cromwell; if an inspired speaker, would work as Paul and Jesus did, and unhesitatingly die their deaths, if necessary; but if constrained by circumstances to the drudgery of a mechanical life, would strive to see in every gleam of light which brightened the darkness of his lot the smile of an angel, the presence of his God.

If societies are in need of representative Spiritualists, let them choose men of this stamp—men good in disposition, rather than remarkable for the swollen state of their dollar bags. Not that one should object to riches, or inveigh against the owners of England's broad acres, but if the richest man in the community be chosen to occupy the highest place of honour, let it be plainly seen by all that he is as good as he is rich. In conclusion, I would add, for the sake of peace and harmony let the term of office for which officers are elected be as brief as possible, so as to distribute the burdens and honours of societies as widely as possible. This will prevent complaint of overwork, or the presuming of one man above his fellows, and check the tendency of societies to split up into two hostile camps, like the great political parties of the State.

Yes, sir! organisation is a necessity of our cause, and let us aim to make it a success by teaching each unit to work for the interest of all, rather than for his own personal comfort or glorification.

THE OTHER SIDE.

Father, when my life is over, and I stand upon the shore,
With the dear world all behind me, and eternity before,
In that ocean, O my Father! must I plunge for evermore?

Father! life is sweet, and sweeter is the sense that I am Thine;
Can the love I bear Thee perish, or can space that love confine?
If my soul can die and lose Thee, how, Eternal, art Thou mine?

Could a finite thing created in the bounds of time and space,
Could it live and grow and love Thee, catch the glory of Thy face,
Fade and die, be gone for ever, have no being, know no place?

No, my soul will not believe it; Thou'rt in me and I in Thee.
I will listen to the message that my own soul brings to me,
Shamed that Faith should ask a token, doubt her own eternity.

When that ocean closes round me, let what will, O Lord, betide;
Though the dear world fade behind me, Thou wilt guard me,
Thou wilt guide;

Thou wilt still be with me, Father—with me on the other side.

SPIRIT INTERCOURSE AND ITS LESSONS.

By the Author of "The Life Beyond the Grave."

It is one of the popular delusions that Spiritualism begins and ends with table-rapping and other wonders, and it often takes some time before the new convert to Spiritualism can interest himself in anything higher. We are all naturally prone to be selfish, and our first question is usually "What personal advantage can I gain from this Spiritualism?" Thus inquirers run from one clairvoyant to another to have their fortunes told or to be advised how they can make money. Others go from séance to séance intent upon seeing some new marvel.

All who thus pursue Spiritualism from selfish motives invariably come to grief. The advice they receive turns out to be bad, or phenomena prove to be fraudulent which at first were beyond all doubt genuine. This is the reward of all who abuse Spiritualism. It was never intended to benefit us in material affairs nor yet to gratify a morbid curiosity, but to elevate our thoughts and purify and ennoble us; to lead us nearer to the Christ-life. It teaches us that there is a life beyond the grave, and what the nature and conditions of that life are; but its chief aim is to induce us to lead better lives here and thus better prepare ourselves for the life to come.

I have for twelve months or more attended weekly séances at which no physical phenomena whatever have been witnessed—nothing but clairvoyance and trance-mediumship, and séances of this kind seem to me best calculated to benefit the sitters.

For the benefit of non-Spiritualists it may be as well to observe that the medium is a respectable, pure-minded young woman, quite incapable of any dishonesty, and the spirits "possess" her precisely in the same way that spirits possessed men in the days of Christ and the Apostles, when we read of Christ carrying on a conversation with a possessing spirit. The spirit of the medium is either temporarily withdrawn from the body or mesmerised into a state of unconsciousness, and the spirit controlling simply uses her bodily organs for the purpose of speaking to us. Since, of course, the spirit has parted company with its own physical organs, it follows that in order to make itself heard in the world of matter it must temporarily borrow a material body from a medium. This is the rationale of trance-mediumship. The medium after the séance knows nothing whatever of what she has said or done.

At these weekly gatherings the teachings of the spirits have been of the highest and purest description, corresponding to the lofty morality taught by Christ; but without one scrap of "doctrine." Such lessons in charity, kindness, forbearance, forgiveness, unselfishness and purity, as we have received from these holy messengers, accompanied usually by soul-inspiring prayers to the Most High, could only come from the pure and the good in the spirit-world, and would for ever set at rest in the minds of all who heard them any doubts as to "whether Spiritualism is of God," or is not "forbidden in the Bible," &c.

In order to obtain pure and holy influences like these it is necessary to keep the circle select, and exclude all whose spirit surroundings are impure or likely to be inharmonious. Thus only can successful séances and truthful messages be obtained.

The greatest lesson which we have derived from these séances seems to be from observing how much time is devoted by the spirit guides of the medium to raising their darkened and unhappy fellow creatures on the other side. Scores of unhappy men and women ("spirits," of course, and invisible to us) have been brought to this circle and have listened in rapt attention (so we have been afterwards told) to the addresses delivered by the bright and lofty spirits who have controlled and spoken through the medium. Often when we have wondered how any good could be done to others by our small weekly gatherings, our spirit friends have said, "If you could see the tearful faces of those unhappy ones who gathered round, and listened to the words of comfort and hope the medium has uttered, and could read their thankful hearts and see what happiness has been bestowed, what hopes have been raised, what darkness of despair, has been illumined by these words of love, you would not think the time has been wasted although on your side you may have seen nothing."

We have had murderers, suicides, drunkards, thieves, libertines, and harlots brought to our gatherings and spiritually raised. At first they have been full of hatred, revenge, gloom and doubt, but under the sweet and loving influence of the bright spirits conducting the circle, their hearts have been gradually touched, and as their aspirations have become brighter they have one by one been allowed to control and speak through the medium, and have poured out their confessions of sin, suffering, and repentance, and have been invariably taught that they must pray to God for help and must then seek out those they have wronged and obtain their forgiveness; and that in order to raise themselves to a happier condition, they must, above all things, busy themselves in raising those beneath them or their late companions.

Invariably the first duty that a repentant sinner seems to be enjoined to engage in is to win over some of his late companions in evil. It seems to be one of the great laws of spirit-life that the high and bright spirits are really less fit and less able to raise the lower and darkened ones than are those who are nearest to their own level. The latter seem better able to understand their needs. How true this law is in our own world! The poor criminal can be more easily touched by a man who has been reformed from his own ranks—who has felt and suffered as he has and can sympathise more closely with him—than by the refined scholar from Oxford or Cambridge. Hence it is that working men prefer Methodist preachers and men from their own station in life. So it is in spirit-life; the high and bright ones always work through intermediaries, and thus it is that Christ is not personally visible to any in the spirit-world whom we communicate with, though his influence is felt everywhere.

The great work, therefore, in the next life whereby people "get on," is helping to raise those below them. Therein lies their happiness, and thereby alone do they improve their surroundings.

Another great lesson that our spirit circle has taught us is that every darkened one can be touched by the power of love. Thus, if it is a woman who has fallen and is grovelling in sin, in vile thoughts and evil companionship, there is almost always some purer and brighter one who is drawn by the all-powerful attraction of love to try and raise the unhappy one. With men it is almost invariably the one who is destined to be his counterpart, his eternal companion in spirit-life. Not until these are united in love (which can only be by the lower one being raised to the level of the brighter one) can they be perfectly happy. Occasionally it is a sister or a mother, but whoever it is, there is invariably some angel bending over the sinner trying to raise him or her.

The great lessons which our circle has taught us may be summarised as follows:—

That no mere creed is of the slightest avail in the next life in promoting our happiness. The one thing that can alone raise us in the next life is leading a good life here; and we cannot better illustrate a good life than by pointing to the exhortations of Christ in the Four Gospels.

That mere belief in Christ's Atonement will not in the least do away with the necessity of wiping out our sins, in personal repentance, in acts of compensation to the injured one, or in forgiveness for wrongs suffered; and not until every wrong has been thus atoned for by ourselves can we rise in the life beyond the grave.

THOUGHT-READING AS AN AMUSEMENT.

By F. Corder.

From "Cassell's Family Magazine."

The statement that this extraordinary power is attainable to some degree by almost every individual will probably be received with surprise and incredulity, yet such is the fact. Incomprehensible as this mysterious phenomenon is, it is so easily produced that it is singular that it has only so recently attracted notice. The marvels of mesmerism and clairvoyance (which seem to be in some sort related to this) are best left in the hands of scientific and duly qualified men, being dangerous things for the ignorant to meddle with; but thought-reading is a simple matter which can hurt no one, but may afford to many some hours of interesting and novel recreation. It is as a novel amusement for social evenings that we here intend to describe some of its simpler phenomena.

First, to enlighten such of our readers as have never seen any thought-reading, or heard it described, we will give an example. Two persons are equally concerned in the result; one of these fixes his mind wholly and absorbingly upon some object, say, which he either sees actually, or in his mind's eye. The success of the experiment depends much upon the thinker's power—a power sometimes to be acquired, and enormously to be developed by practice—of concentrating his mind upon the one idea.

The other person—the reader—who has his eyes usually bandaged, so that no external objects may distract his attention, grasps the thinker's hands (the two sitting face to face, and as closely as possible), and holds his own mind as blank as possible. If he have any gift of receptivity he will soon, sometimes instantly, see in his mind's eye the form of the object, more or less vaguely, and then perhaps all its details. The appearance of an object, written words, figures, colours, may all be discerned with marvellous accuracy after a little practice, the chief condition being that two people who by experiment find that they suit one another well, should develop their powers by practice, and not try much with others.

But now to clear the ground by some very simple preliminary experiments, which conclusively prove that one mind may affect another by the simple exercise of the will. Let one person, as subject, stand passively, with closed eyes and relaxed ankle-muscles, ready to fall in any direction. Let two others stand, one before and the other behind the subject, with outstretched arms, and rest the palms of their hands as lightly as possible against his sides, neither supporting nor pressing him. Now, if these two firmly and simultaneously will the subject to fall in a certain direction when he lets himself go, ten to one he will fall as they wish. The direction is best determined by a fourth person, who should stand in such a position as to be invisible to the subject, even if his eyes were open, and should indicate "forwards," "backwards," "right," or "left" by a silent gesture. Of course the sceptic will say that the subject is unconsciously pressed over on that side. Well, then let the sceptic try.

The second experiment is of the same nature, but brings us nearer to thought-reading proper. The subject is blindfolded and taken out of the room. The rest of the company then decide upon some act for him to perform—to touch or move a certain article of furniture or the like. Two steady-minded persons then fetch him in, and place each a hand on his shoulder, taking care neither to impede nor direct his movements. They keep their minds firmly fixed on wishing him to perform the appointed act. The success of the experiment will then be more or less complete according as those concerned are fitted for the business of Reading or Thinking. These two experiments form a fund of amusement for a family party which is not too juvenile or noisy; for we cannot too strongly impress upon would-be experimentalists that all matters of this kind require to be undertaken in a sober and unexcited frame of mind, levity and laughter being fatal to success.

In early experiments in actual thought-reading, the Thinker, who will probably find unexpected difficulty in concentrating his mind on one thing, had better think of actual and simple objects, placing them on a small table close to him, so that he sees nothing else. The Reader, too, will find a difficulty in allowing his mind to become blank at will, and may scarcely be able to refrain from guessing, or wondering, what the object may be. The slightest exercise of the brain in this way is probably fatal to success. A sheet of bright-coloured paper is said to be the easiest thing to guess, and a row of figures the most difficult, though our own experience does not quite corroborate this. When a good Reader and Thinker have been found, many astounding experiments may be successfully undertaken, a few of which we will here enumerate.

1. Completely unknown objects may be described, written words and even sentences discerned, the position of a hidden article indicated, or any desired act performed by the experienced Reader.

2. Some person may pinch or otherwise hurt the Thinker in any part, and the Reader will experience a feeling of pain in a corresponding place.

3. Any flavour, however delicate or peculiar, tasted by the Thinker can be detected by the Reader.

4. The preceding experiments, as well as many others, are rendered far more marvellous when accomplished without contact. In fact, after a little practice, a good Reader can succeed equally well when the Thinker is at a distance of some yards.

We must here particularly impress upon our readers one thing. Thought-reading is a misnomer. Mental picture-reading is the real name for this power. When, for instance, the Thinker has fixed upon a word or a number he must not keep the mere idea of it in his head, or repeat it perpetually to himself; he must see it in his mind's eye, as if written up in chalk letters, for it is only by the faculty of inner sight—if there is such a thing—that the Reader reads. Thought-reading is very fatiguing to both parties concerned, but especially to the Reader, who should beware of too long-continued exercise of his powers. We have spoken of both in the masculine gender for convenience, but according to our own experience, men make the best Thinkers and women the best Readers. This may not be an universal rule, however.

There remains but one thing more to say. Every one who sees these phenomena will ask—does ask—"What explanation do you—does science—offer for these marvels?" The answer is very simple, and may be given in one word—None.

THE MAGNETESCOPE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—With regard to the "Magnetoscope"—pronounced by your correspondent, Dr. Wyld, to be "dead and buried"—I am able to announce, with pleasure, that it has merely enjoyed what we hope may prove to have been an invigorating slumber; a work on the subject having been for some time in preparation, by a physician in Edinburgh, to whom all the memoranda, instruments, &c., of the late Dr. Leger, were delivered by that gentleman's executors.

Possibly, the meeting referred to by Dr. Wyld, as having taken place at Brighton, under the auspices of a physician of eminence, may mean the series of experiments made by Dr. Madden and W. Sharp, Esq., F.R.S., with a view of testing the influence of various substances—gold, iron, arsenic, &c., upon Dr. Leger's instrument.

Dr. Madden (a homoeopathic practitioner, at Brighton) had, at first, warmly advocated the invention, and performed with it, in public, many surprising experiments. Subsequently, however, a doubt arose in his mind whether the unconscious exercise of muscular power was not a larger element in the matter than had been believed.

The remarks and observations of the two gentlemen, though unfavourable to Dr. Leger's views, were made in a true philosophical spirit, were published by him in their own words, and welcomed as a means of eliciting a deeper attention to the analysis, and more careful appreciation of the surrounding circumstances. He merely complained that the experimentalists had not separated his chaff from his wheat, and, on the failure of one or two experiments, taken upon them to pronounce the whole unworthy of scientific investigation.

To meet their principal objections, Dr. Leger remodelled his instrument in such a manner as to preclude the possibility of its being influenced by muscular force; and this had not long been completed when his premature death withdrew the subject from public notice.

To the questions of your correspondent, Mr. J. T. Young, I can only say that if he will refer to the "Philosophical Transactions" for 1759, and the experiments of Robert Symmer, and Cigna, he may modify his opinion as to silk being a non-conductor.

The only use of the magnetoscope's non-conducting arm was (as explained in my former letter) to prove that the electric current alone supplied the motive power—the touch of the operator's finger on the immovable disc setting the pendulum or the conducting arm in violent motion, while the other remained still.

In reply to "W. W. C.," I cannot inform him where a magnetoscope, as remodelled by Dr. Leger, can be obtained, ready made. During that gentleman's life, the instruments were constructed and sold, under his direction, by an agent whose name I cannot recall. Their price was about two guineas.

HENRY SPICER.

MESMERIC CLAIRVOYANCE.—Professor Barrett has sent us particulars of another very interesting and well-authenticated case of clairvoyance. It will appear in our next issue.

C. A. S. CONVERSAZIONE.—The next conversazione at 38, Great Russell-street, will be held on the evening of Monday week, March 5th, when it is expected that some matters of interest will be brought before the meeting.

GHOSTS!—We remind our readers again of the circumstance that, at the Fortnightly Discussion Meeting to be held at 7.30, on Monday evening next, at the rooms of the C. A. S., 38, Great Russell-street, Mr. Podmore will read a paper on "Ghosts." Mr. Podmore has been so fortunate as to collect some valuable information on the subject, and his paper therefore may be expected to have a special interest.

GENERAL GHOST-LOGY.

"It is an interesting inquiry," writes the pious and eloquent author of the Protoplast, "how far we are warranted by profane and sacred history to believe in the visitation of departed spirits in visible form. Whatever may be said of the credulity of the vulgar, men of great intellect have, almost invariably, been believers in what are commonly called supernatural appearances; and I never met a person of any strength of mind who set aside the mass of evidence which has accumulated on the subject."

Even though these apparitions, occurring in close relation to passing events, may have their origin in the unhealthy action of the brain, yet they may be used by the Omnipotent for a manifested purpose and a special end. In this manner it may be surmised that the disturbed brain of the unhappy Saul produced an image of Samuel, the Almighty using this circumstance as a means to make known the coming judgment;—a more reasonable explanation than that the spirit of Samuel was directly sent—since, in the latter case, he would not have murmured at the mission—"Why hast thou disquieted me?" &c.

God still works wonders, but by natural means; nor need we be apprehensive that, in dwelling on these means, our faith in the illimitable power which created the laws by which it works will be weakened. As is the sameness of elementary matter to the chemist, who, while using the affinities of elementary substances for each other, never can transmute them, so, by whatever new and wondrous path we approach the Eternal Source, the end is the same—a something existent, insoluble, never to be demonstrated. The keen-sighted hero who discovered that Providence generally sided with the big battalions, was, after all, not much in error—merely overlooking the predestinating hand that beckoned those great battalions to the field.

Vast as is the amount of knowledge the labours of fifty centuries have gathered in, an infinite harvest yet remains to reap. Has any science even ventured to imagine a limit to its sphere of search? Is, for example, the animal kingdom exhausted? Combinations of matter, new to us, are constantly producing new forms of life. Even with some whose generations have long been denizens of this globe, we are yet imperfectly, if at all, acquainted.

So late as 1868, there was added to the Zoological Gardens, and still exists there, a huge animal—the hairy-eared, two-horned rhinoceros (R. Lasiotis), never previously known, and of which no part or portion was to be found in any museum, at home or abroad.

Mr. Henry Lee, writing of the marine monster known as the sea-serpent, of which twenty-three appearances (some testified on oath) have been recorded, concludes an able paper in these words:—

"I think it by no means impossible that gigantic animals, unknown to science, may have their habitat in the greater depths of the sea, only occasionally coming to the surface, and, further, that there may still exist, though supposed to be extinct, some of the old sea reptiles whose fossil remains tell of their magnitude and habits, as well as others of species unknown even to paleontologists."

And the popular physiologist, Dr. Andrew Wilson, asks:—

"Is there anything more improbable in the idea of a gigantic development of an ordinary marine snake into a veritable giant of its race, than in the production of cuttle fishes, which, until the last few years, remained unknown to the foremost pioneers of science?"

Another distinguished naturalist, long resident in Central Africa, has assured us that, in the trackless wastes and forests, stretching south and east, there will be unquestionably found animals hitherto unclassified by the zoologist, not excepting the "fabled" unicorn.

So, in the rich abundance of the vegetable kingdom, how little is revealed, compared with what lies hid, of the powers and properties of those innumerable structures, every one of which, we have reason to believe, has its especial adaptation to the ever-changing, ever-recurring needs of man! The treasury of nature seems never the poorer for the perpetual drain. So will it probably remain, until the laborious pursuit of knowledge is lost in the light of infinite wisdom. Yet it is good for us to gather up the fragments of that benign feast with which creation began, and he that would restrict the search by arrogant announcements that in such and such a walk there is nothing more to find, is false to his fellow-workers, false to nature, false to God.

Seeing then how limited is our acquaintance with things of lower nature, it is strange that any new suggestion having reference to that complex structure, man himself, and seeming capable of analysis, should be so frequently received with disfavour. The discoverer of a new organ in the material human frame would be hailed as a sort of benefactor to his kind. How much more does he deserve who demonstrates powers hitherto latent in the nobler part of man! On what principle is examination deprecated? If an assumed discovery be beneficent, how much may not be lost! If noxious, the bare denial of its existence is but a feeble remedy. Let those who desire to promote legitimate inquiry bear in mind that a broad distinction lies between cases of mere cerebral excitement and such as I have hitherto treated of. Hallucinations are as fully recognised, if they are not quite so common, as colds in the head. Few of those who might have noticed the twitch or toss of the head peculiar to an eminent counsel (it was, I believe, Mr. Bodkin), were aware that it was engendered by a perpetual vision of a raven on his left shoulder. A gentleman, not long since residing in Broadway, New York, transacted business daily under the immediate supervision of his deceased great-uncle, who, in a laced coat and ruffles, occupied a large easy chair, placed expressly to receive the honoured vision, without whose company, Mr. R. declared, he could not, after a time, accomplish his day's work in comfort.

Intense application has frequently produced delusions of this kind, and when no relaxation has been afforded to the over-taxed brain they have become permanent. Similar results have attended extreme grief, or long continued anxiety. Often, if a sense is not subjected to actual delusion, it is quickened to an inconceivable degree. I once heard a lady, in a mixed circle, relate a curious experience of her own, which bears upon this question.

She had one day attended afternoon service at a little country church in the neighbourhood of the house at which she was visiting. Owing to some private sorrow which oppressed her mind, she found unusual difficulty in following the sacred ritual. In spite of herself, the rebel thoughts would perpetually revert to worldly crosses and cares, when, happening to raise her eyes, she saw—clearly and sharply written on the white panels of the singers' gallery, which but the moment before were black, the text: "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." While yet gazing on the reassuring words, they began to fade away, and presently became completely invisible.

Pondering on this strange occurrence, and unwilling to doubt the evidence of her own eyes, she repaired to the church on the following day, and, placing herself in the same position as before, fixed her gaze intently on the gallery. Nothing was to be seen! She then ascended to the gallery itself, and examined the panel closely. Presently she was enabled to distinguish the forms of certain letters which had evidently once composed a text, since painted over. The closest scrutiny could not have revealed a continuous meaning, had not her impression of the previous day guided her to the conclusion that the text she had seen so distinctly had actually at one time been painted on the face of the gallery.

There are instances in which the collision of two ardent and impressible natures, dwelling, for the time, upon a common object, has produced similar phenomena. That very blunt and homely proverb, "One fool makes many" may be not wholly devoid of a certain philosophical significance.

It was, I think, in 1848, that an occurrence took place in a rural locality, though within ten miles of the metropolis, which came more immediately under my own observation. A large landed proprietor, not very far from London, had, for his head gamekeeper, a man named Hunt, a big powerful fellow, who had served in the army, and was rather noted in the village in which he lived for his daring, reckless character, evinced more than once in the petty wars of a preserve peculiarly exposed to the forays of the modern moss-troopers of London. Village scandal whispered that Mr. Hunt and his lady lived not always on the happiest terms; that the gentleman's habits were—to use a gentle term—indomestic, his affections flighty, his attentions discursive,—a certain rustic belle of the neighbourhood being, moreover, confidently pointed at as the principal cause of those family dissensions which were hurrying Mrs. Hunt to a premature grave. However that may have been, it did so happen that the poor woman became very ill, and, after a short interval, expired.

That rigid system of economy, hinted at by Hamlet as possibly pervading his royal mother's household, prevailed likewise in that of Mr. Hunt; for, within two days of his wife's decease, he and his inamorata were made one. They had been married about a month, when, one night, after retiring to rest, an eager tapping was heard outside the lattice. Imagining it was some traveller who had missed his road, the lady got up, went to the window, opened it, and dropped, with a piercing shriek, upon the floor.

"What now, girl! What's that for?" growled her lord.

"Your wife! your wife!" screamed the girl, wringing her hands, and pointing, as if fascinated, to the open window. "There! you can see her! There—there!"

"Nonsense, you frightened fool!" said her affable lord. "Go, look again, and shut the window, can't you?"

The woman, however, persisted, and although (being, as the neighbours afterwards assured us, a "plucky wench") she soon recovered some composure, nothing could induce her to close the window, or to return to bed. At last, with an angry oath, Hunt got up and approached the window. The next instant he staggered back, white as a sheet, and in strong convulsions! His wife, scarcely less agitated than himself, had to obtain assistance,—and it was some time before the man was sufficiently himself to tell his story. He had, he solemnly averred, seen his deceased wife standing within a foot of the lattice, in the dress she usually wore, and gazing full in his face!

So utterly was the man's courage prostrated by what he had seen, that he was, for hours, like one suddenly struck with frenzy. The scene was described as terrible, in the extreme, to those to whom Hunt's fearless character was most familiar. Seated in a chair, his gigantic frame quivering from head to foot in a sort of agony of horror—he perpetually wrung his hands, repeating:—

"My wife! my wife! She is come back to punish me for my sins! What shall I do? What shall I do?" &c.

Nor could the presence and reasonings of the neighbours, whom his new wife had called around them, prevail, for many hours, to restore him to anything like his former self. She, on the other hand, had completely regained her self-possession, and repeated, in a perfectly calm and collected manner, her profound conviction that it was the spirit of her deceased predecessor, and nothing else, that had occasioned their alarm. Six weeks later, Hunt was thrown from his horse, which, by trampling on his face and head, injured him so severely as to endanger his life—an accident of which the apparition was at once pronounced to have been the harbinger.

The story lingered in the village records for many a year, and I remember being invited, during a shooting visit to the neighbourhood, to visit the very cottage, and be introduced to the very lattice-window, made celebrated by the ghostly visitation.

In connection with the general subject of these illusions of eye or ear, I do not know that any incident has puzzled me more than that with which I will conclude this paper. It is simply inexplicable on the basis of any theory hitherto suggested, while to doubt it is to believe that several gentlemen of high intelligence and stainless honour have united in the invention and dissemination of a gross and most circumstantial falsehood.

Some twenty-five years since, curious rumours were afloat, relative to a certain old family seat, of which it is not permissible to state more than that it was situated near Frome, Somersetshire. Despite its ghostly reputation, however, it was never without occupants, nor did the rumours I have alluded to cause any diminution in the number of visitors who were constantly availing themselves of the owner's hospitality. The circumstance most frequently associated with the rumours aforesaid, was that on almost every night, at twelve o'clock, a certain something—only describable as a sound—entered one of the corridors at one end, and passed out at the other. It mattered not who might be present. At certain seasons, almost as regularly as night succeeded day, the strange sound recurred, and was precisely that which would have been occasioned by a lady wearing the high-heeled shoes of a former period (nay, of this!), and a full silk dress, sweeping through the corridor. Nothing was ever seen. It so happened that my brother met, at a dinner-party, one of the more recent ear-witnesses of this phenomenon, and the following account is almost in the latter's words:—

"I was visiting two years ago, at a house near Frome, when my attention was attracted, one day at dinner, to a conversation that was going on relative to the haunted character of B. House, near Frome. When informed of the details, I learned that a particular corridor in the mansion was, almost every night, the scene of an occurrence that had hitherto defied all explanation. One of the party present had himself been a guest at B., and, being sceptical and devoid of fear, requested permission to keep vigil in the haunted gallery. He did so, witnessed the phenomenon, and frankly owned that nothing on earth would induce him to repeat the experiment.

"My curiosity being thoroughly roused by the manifest belief accorded by all present to this gentleman's story, I obtained an introduction to the proprietor of B., and received from him a ready permission to pass a night, or more, if desired, in the haunted spot. I was empowered, moreover, to select any companion I chose, and accordingly invited an old friend, Mr. W. K.—who happened to be shooting in the neighbourhood—to accompany me. K., like myself, was disposed to incredulity, and was positively assured either that nothing unusual would occur on the night when two such sentries were on duty, or that we should have no great difficulty in unearthing the disturbing spirit.

"The family were from home, but, having authority to make any arrangements we pleased, K. and I proceeded to B., intending, at all events, to devote two days to the experiment. This was not to be carried out! We dined early, and, in order to make certain of the clearness of our heads, drank nothing but a little table-beer. It wanted yet several hours to midnight when we took up our position in the corridor. It was of considerable length, with a door at each extremity, and one or two at the side. As the watch was to be a prolonged one, and it was necessary to keep awake and alert, we had brought some cards, and now, combining business with pleasure, we placed our table so as completely to barricade the passage—our two chairs exactly filling up the space that remained, so that no mortal creature could possibly press through without disturbing us. We also placed two lighted candles on the floor, near the wall, at two or three feet from the table, on the side from which the mysterious footsteps always approached—and, with two life-preservers within reach, our preparations were complete.

"We played piquet, and then écarté, till the house-clock sounded midnight. Mechanically, we dropped the cards, and gazed along the dim corridor. No sounds followed, and after a minute or so, we took up our cards, when K. observed, with a yawn, that as the visitor never came after twelve we might as well finish the game and retire. I looked at my watch, and found that the house-clock was fast. It wanted yet three minutes, and we accordingly waited.

"Exactly at the time specified the door at the end seemed to open and re-close. A conviction, not easy to describe, was upon our minds that something had entered. Another instant and the silence was broken by a tapping sound, as of a light person, wearing high-heeled shoes, quietly approaching us up the gallery, each step more distinct than the last, as would be the case under ordinary circumstances. It was a firm, regular tread—light, yet determined—and was accompanied by a sound between a sweep, a rustle, and a whistle, not comparable to anything but the brushing of a stiff silken dress against the walls.

"How K. and I looked, as the sounds advanced, as it were, to storm us, I will not pretend to say. For myself, I was petrified with amazement; and neither of us, I believe, moved hand or foot. On—on—on—came the tap and rustle. They reached the lighted candles on the floor, and passed them without even disturbing the flame. Then the tapping ceased, but the invisible silken robe seemed to rise, brushing the wall on both sides close to our heads. Then the tapping re-commenced on the other side of the table, and, so receding, made its exit at the other door. There had not been even a shadow at which to grasp or strike. It was sound alone."

Such was the history; and I feel, as I have said, that any attempt to explain this phenomenon to my own satisfaction, and that of others, would be perfectly futile. It was understood that, on one occasion, a nurse in the family was compelled, one night, to pass through the corridor at the witching hour, leading with her a little girl who was deaf and dumb. While doing so the sounds passed. The child shrank back in the utmost terror, struggling and moaning to get away. Nor could she ever be induced to enter the corridor again without evincing the most frantic alarm.

The mansion of B. remains in the occupation of the same family; but certain modern improvements have greatly changed its aspect since the occurrence of the incident I have mentioned.

"CONFESSIONS OF A MEDIUM."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The footnote under Mr. Riko's article (I have his consent to name him), in your issue of the 3rd inst., induces me to ask permission for a few remarks in your columns; and I sincerely hope the impartiality of "LIGHT" will be such that my reasonable request will be granted.

Scientific men like Crookes, Zollner, and others, have rendered great service by demonstrating the reality of phenomena in a rational way. Others may be also useful in bringing their experience before the Spiritualists, and exposing the John King business of certain well-known individuals who advertise their names as mediums. And this, in our opinion, is what the author of the "Confessions" did.

It is not the question whether he acted properly in the past, when he came to the knowledge of the way in which the so-called manifestations were produced by the famous medium (F). The only questions to be considered are: Did the author tell the truth? and did not he turn to the right path in abandoning a career which fills every man of character with the utmost disgust?

That he tells nothing but the truth, as far as regards the Continent, we know. Correspondence from people belonging to the fashionable class in different places lies before us, and confirms the author's narrative in every detail; and are we to consider that while he tells the truth as regards the Continent he is lying in regard to England? We are not disposed here to accept such an explanation. That it is not agreeable for dupes to learn from the Press in what way the famous medium imposed upon their credulity we must admit; but let it be borne in mind that, even in this case, private interest ought to be sacrificed for public benefit.

Has not every inquirer for some time past observed how various mediums, one after the other, after having been exposed, have finished their career by leaving "the spirits" on the stage in the form of muslin, beards, and phosphor oil? Is this not the chief and only reason why the flood of miracles, by which spiritualistic organs were overflowed, has now been stopped? Let us have moral courage enough to answer in the affirmative.

And now, as regards the author's resolution to turn his back towards tricks and tricksters, and to warn the public against them. Should not every honest man applaud such a step? Was there left any other way for the author to settle the account with God and his own conscience?

When I, therefore, congratulate the author of "Confessions" on his work I am but expressing the feelings of a number of inquirers here; amongst whom the book is well-known and duly appreciated.—Enclosing my card, I remain, dear Sir, respectfully your subscriber,

The Hague.

CURE OF DIABETES.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I will feel greatly obliged to any of your correspondents who will furnish me with authentic information as to the cure of a genuine case of diabetes mellitus through any "mesmeric" or "healing" agency. The disease is recognised as incurable by the profession, running its own course according to circumstances. It appears to me that if one-tenth of what we hear of the cure of functional nervous diseases is true, diabetes ought to come within the range of possible cure; since it is pretty clear that, if the disease can be traced to disorder of nerve-centres at the top of the spinal cord, it is a near neighbour to diseases directly amenable to rital treatment.

If any gentleman has personal experience in this matter he will greatly oblige by communicating with the undersigned, as a friend and patient of his might thereby be benefited.

Trusting you can find space for my question,—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. E. P.

P.S.—Can anyone tell me if the Zoist records a cure of diabetes?

February 17th, 1883.

SPIRITUALISM AND INSANITY.—The psychological phenomena which present themselves in certain phases of mediumship, claim the attention and profound study of the scientific physician; for they suggest the cause and the remedy for a large class of mental derangements which hitherto have only been consigned to incurability in lunatic asylums.—Dr. Chazavain.

PERSONALITY AND THE UNIVERSAL MIND.

By John G. Purdon, M.B.T.C.D.

Sir Isaac Newton, in the queries at the end of his "Opticks," after offering what he considered to be fair and reasonable suggestions as to the ultimate constitution of the material universe, concludes as follows:—

"Now by the help of these Principles, all material Things seem to have been composed of the hard and solid Particles above mentioned, Various associated in the first Creation by the Counsel of an intelligent Agent. For it became him who created them to set them in order. And if he did so, it's unphilosophical to seek for any other Origin of the World, or to pretend that it might arise out of a Chaos by the mere Laws of Nature: though being once form'd, it may continue by those Laws for many Ages. For while Comets move in very eccentric Orbs in all manner of Positions, blind Fate could never make all the Planets move one and the same way in Orbs concentrick, some inconsiderable irregularities excepted, which may have arisen from the mutual Actions of Comets and Planets upon one another, and which will be apt to increase; till this System wants a Reformation. Such a wonderful Uniformity as the Planetary System must be allowed the Effect of Choice. And so must the Uniformity in the Bodies of Animals, they having generally a right and a left side shaped alike, and on either side of their Bodies two Legs behind, and either two Arms, or two Legs, or two Wings before upon their Shoulders, and between their Shoulders a Neck running down into a Back-bone, and a Head upon it; and in the Head two Ears, two Eyes, a Nose, a Mouth, and a Tongue, alike situated. Also the first Contrivance of these very artificial Parts of Animals, the Eyes, Ears, Brain, Muscles, Heart, Lungs, Midriff, Glands, Larynx, Hands, Wings, Swimming Bladders, natural Spectacles, and other Organs of Sense and Motion; and the Instinct of Brutes and Insects can be the effect of nothing else than the Wisdom and Skill of a powerful ever living Agent, who being in all Places, is more able by his Will to move the Bodies within his boundless uniform Sensorium, and thereby to form and reform the Parts of the Universe, than we are by our Will to move the Parts of our own Bodies. And yet we are not to consider the World as the Body of God, or the several parts thereof, as the Parts of God. He is an uniform Being, void of Organs, Members or Parts, and they are his Creatures subordinate to him, and subservient to his Will; and he is no more the Soul of them, than the Soul of a Man is the Soul of the Species of Things carried through the Organs of Sense into the place of its Sensation, where it perceives them by means of its immediate Presence, without the Intervention of any third thing. The Organs of Sense are not for enabling the Soul to perceive the Species of Things in its Sensorium, but only for conveying them thither; and God has no need of such Organs, he being everywhere present to the Things themselves. And since Space is divisible in infinitum, and Matter is not necessarily in all places, it may be also allowed that God is able to create Particles of Matter of several Sizes and Figures, and in several Proportions to Space, and perhaps of different Densities and Forces, and thereby to vary the Laws of Nature, and make Worlds of several sorts in several Parts of the Universe. At least, I see nothing of Contradiction in all this."

To the above I venture to add:—

Man's personality comes with and by the unity of apperception.

God's personality as a conception of the reason is subsequent to the establishment of the intuition of self.

The human organism with its inseparable mode of expressing motion (subjectively recognised as change in time), is the structural counterpart of the unity of apperception. But the organism as superficially viewed, i.e., when beheld as object by the aid of the outward eyes, supplying us only with results and not with process, we have given us but a surface view of the unity of apperception; and hence we are, as it were, outside of our own personality, regarding it as object—as one.

Hence, if the personality of God is not out of all relation with that of man (and we are taught by Revelation that it is not), God must intuit with what we would call, for want of a more exact mode of expression, the infinity of apperception; when, to continue and complete the analogy, His organism would be the integral, not of those objective facts and changes perceivable in Nature (which are but the inversions and transformations of our several organic conditions under the glamour of the sense organs and the forms of sensuous intuition), but of seles; that is to say, of a spiritual community, from our conditioned point of view. Thus the organism of God is an assembly of an infinite number of similar units, with subjective value in terms of an inner life—of life within a life; an idea which we can directly understand only by inclusion, or, symbolically, in the recognition of the fact that the human organism is compounded of a practically infinite number of separate units, which may be spiritual monads separately lost in that great statistical fact—the unity of apperception.

How a single personality may realise itself as the universal consent of an infinite number of others is a mystery which reveals itself best when there is a perturbation or conflict, and when, through alteration in the plan of opposing forces, a subject is seen to usurp the place of the legitimate ruler, or when in extreme cases that which was an ordered assembly becomes transformed into a legion of disorderly beings.

Our question is one of the substantiality of cause and the permanence of formal law. It can only be consistently handled after the analogy suggested by the mathematical form of the laws of thought. The person is the integral or sum from one aspect and the differential or constituent element from the other. It is in fact the unit of will; that is to say, will either to command or to obey. Infinities are not all of one order, but may be the infinitely great to that of a lower order, and the infinitely small to that of a higher order; since we must not forget that in mathematics all quantitative expression including infinity is relative. And so in considering the personality of God after the analogy of human personality, if we take all the perturbations of the latter into consideration we shall find in the changes which, as a permanent substantial reality (permanent within certain time limits, at any rate) it may undergo through its alternation as quantum from infinity to unity, and vice versa, a possible indication of the nature of that transcendent personality which yet was preserved when it became flesh and dwelt among us.

Newton does not in the above-quoted passages apply the term person to God, but he implies his belief that God is a person in the same sense that he himself is a man, and he rests content in the belief that the method of investigation pursued by him in the reduction of natural changes to law and order will be found, from the very constitution of the mind itself, to be applicable to all questions raised by the inquisitive faculty, which rests upon no less noble a basis than the principle of causality.

"As in Mathematics, so in natural Philosophy, the Investigation of difficult Things by the Method of Analysis ought ever to precede the Method of Composition. This Analysis consists in making Experiments and Observations, and in drawing general conclusions from them by Induction and admitting of no Objection against the Conclusions but such as are taken from Experiments or other certain Truths. For Hypotheses are not to be regarded in experimental Philosophy. And although the arguing from Experiments and Observations by Induction be no Demonstration of general Conclusions; yet it is the best way of arguing which the Nature of Things admits of, and may be looked upon as so much the stronger, by how much the Induction is more general. And if no Exception occur from Phenomena, the Conclusion may be pronounced generally. But if at any time afterwards any Exception shall occur from Experiments, it may then begin to be pronounced with such Exceptions as occur. By this way of Analysis we may proceed from Compounds to Ingredients, and from Motions to the Forces producing them; and in general from Effects to their Causes, and from particular Causes to more general ones, till the Argument end in the most general. This is the Method of Analysis: And the Synthesis consists in assuming the Causes discovered and established as Principles, and by their explaining the Phenomena produced from them, and proving the Explanations."

It is evident from this passage that Newton would have pushed forward into the region of causes as far as the limits of his thinking power would have permitted, if only Nature had supplied the data for his work. He would have trusted the inborn strength of the human mind to arrive at a correct induction and would not have hampered himself by fine-spun and childish disquisitions as to the proper significance of the term cause which has offered so many obstacles to the advancement of philosophy at the hands of verbose system-builders. By cause he meant Vera Causa, or true and sufficient means of accounting for a given phenomenon otherwise than by mere words and guesswork; an explanation which should justify its use through the results of its application, or be otherwise valueless. He regarded God as cause after the analogy of natural causes, and he did not scruple to consider Him Vera Causa of the universe, founding his belief upon the principle of causality though not in so many words.

God as spiritual cause has always manifested Himself through man; the question of the personality of God can only be approached through a full understanding of the nature of the personality of man, presented under its most generalised conditions; and this seems to be the task most germane to the genius of modern Spiritualism regarded as a branch of natural science.

TO A NOVICE IN SPIRITUALISM.

Extract from a Private Letter.

"As was to be expected the first book on Spiritualism did not altogether convince you. Wallace's little book of 200 pages makes a very admirable beginning, being a kind of alphabet of the subject, but he does not get much beyond preliminaries. From Wallace one gathers hardly more than that here is a subject at least worthy of careful investigation; one would not so readily gather that modern Spiritualism is a great philosophy and a great religion. But this is true. If you were living within easy reach of me I should be glad to talk you into, at least, some conception of its greatness. . . . You can have yet simply no conception whatever of the infinite scope, of the infinite beauty, of the infinite love, of this great religion, as revealed by its accredited seers and teachers, Andrew Jackson Davis being chief. It is as great as the world is, and as beautiful. It is the religion (being inclusive of all others) which will yet bind in its golden embrace all the nations of the earth.

"I will only add that there are two books which it would be very important that you should read. The first (simply as introductory to the other) is, 'Letters on Animal Magnetism,' by the late Professor Gregory, of Edinburgh University, a book almost as fascinating as a novel, giving an account (with examples) of the so-called superior or clairvoyant condition; the spiritual and bodily condition of Swedenborg and Davis. The second, one of the most wonderful books in the world, is, 'Nature's Divine Revelations,' by Andrew Jackson Davis, dictated from the higher condition. No man can read this book (unless, indeed, he be intellectually and morally undeveloped) without being unspokeably advantaged, both for time and for eternity.

"Concerning this great book, one writer truly said: 'Never have there been presented at one view a cosmogony so grand, a theology so sublime, and a future destiny for man so transcendent. In science, in religion, and in morality, it is a book which will be welcomed with rapture by the most enlightened, the loftiest, and the purest minds.' And concerning Davis when in the 'superior condition,' another writer (having personal knowledge of him) said: 'I have seen him in states of mental elevation which transcended all history or knowledge, states when earth had apparently no secret, and the future no marvel, which he did not see and know.'"

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL, 14, NEWMAN STREET, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

All who have followed intelligently the present series of lectures at this hall, will be prepared to learn that, in speaking on Sunday last upon the subject of "Humanity: Its Death," the controls of Mr. Morse again brought into prominence their own subtle and suggestive idea of the Divine qualities represented by Humanity, so that the arrest or eclipse or decay of these qualities, with the antecedent conditions and immediate consequences of the operation they thus variously described, and not the death of the human body, formed the basis of the brilliant and effective discourse delivered on that occasion before an exceptionally appreciative audience. Of the transition of man from the earth stage to the advanced spiritual capacity and surroundings of the after life, the lecturer said no more than sufficed to echo the sentiment of the hymns sung, and of the charming poetical outburst of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, so appropriately read during the service, that "There is no death." Let us, in like manner, at once dismiss from our present consideration that perfectly simple and natural process which can be a source of apprehension or disquiet only to those in whom the death of Humanity, in its truer sense, is unhappily, in large measure, already an accomplished fact. For the higher principles of humanity there is always the emphatic assurance of sustained life and continued progress. The ascent may, indeed, be regarded always as spiral in form, involving occasional appearances of decline; and there is too frequently arrest of growth, when life is obscured and darkness palpable; but the conditions which favour these death-like phenomena are, on the one hand, indicative simply of a momentary check in preparation for a vigorous rebound, and on the other, where more real, are less and less suggestive, as the ages roll onwards, of the presence of the substantial elements of decay. Periods of rest or interruption of progress are also recuperative in many ways. Out of prostration is born an energy always equal to the re-assertion of life, and without resistance and seeming disaster it is open to doubt whether an adequate development of spiritual power, needful for the perfection of being, is not distinctly retarded. With hushed voice we were then, as though individually, asked, "Does Humanity live, or is it dead now?" Death is present or near where blind fanaticism rules, where art and culture are ruthlessly repressed, and wealth, place, and power, or sensual enjoyment, absorbingly pursued; where military or political tyranny and wrong intercept and eventually crush out the finer and more beautiful qualities of our nature; but where order, justice, and love prevail, and intellectual proclivities are systematically encouraged, there the transmutation of the Divine qualities is going on, and Humanity lives and thrives in delightful luxuriance. The prevailing characteristics of social life to-day,—especially of Metropolitan life—are not very hopeful. Still, the healthful action of the higher principles of being is largely maintained by an ever-increasing army of Irreconcilables who, desecrating injustice, unfailingly and persistently, in season and out of season, protest against it manfully. God forbid that such protest, and the resulting disturbance of attenuated conditions, should ever fail to keep alive the steady flame of Humanity; it is a happy reflection that that only which is truly commensurate with the dignity of human life is enduring. The work of these reformers who would impetuously urge forward the qualities and needs of the better life, is usually very unpopular, frequently received with howls of indignation by the contented few, and with indifference by the ill-informed multitude, and when, as sometimes happens, we erect monuments to their memory, after having had time to discover how right they always were, it is not quite certain that we mean anything more than that we are glad thus to be done with them. These troublesome people, however, understand the gospel of self-sacrifice, acknowledge the bounden duty of everyone to help his neighbour, and while affirming the right of all to be happy can themselves find peace only in the happiness of others. If you, individually, are deficient in this feeling, the goodness of the life of Humanity is enfeebled in you—grows small by degrees and beautifully less—and presently, the crowd around you being similarly affected, the finer elements of human nature are extinguished: death has arrived. Remember always that the first principle of human development is to do good to others as you would have good done unto you. If this grand primary principle is disregarded, and we are left in unregulated possession of our intelligence and cunning only, the results cannot fail to be lamentable and terrible, the cohesion of society to become impossible, the brotherhood of man a myth, the spirit of Humanity a suicide, when of its own weakness the world will relapse into barbarism. Happily the providences of God are wiser than the judgments of men. It may not always seem so; but we habitually narrow our views and then distort the proportions of the picture; for it may well happen, and does not infrequently occur, that the consequences of the death of a section of Humanity are fruitful in blessing for the survivors, and form an instructive lesson to later generations everywhere; while to the unhappy examples of temporary failure there is provided subsequent opportunity, when translated to another sphere, to recover all the essential elements of the higher life. There are many diseases in the social and political and religious framework of the world to-day, and he is a wise physician who probes thoroughly, brings the symptoms to the surface, and thus expels the morbid elements. The first symptom of the approaching death of Humanity, at any period, is despotism in some form: that is the initial stage of decay, for it narrows the sympathies and hampers, restrains, and perverts life and thought. Then, seeing the spiritual condition of to-day, separately and strictly regarded, with its mixture of dry, dull formalism and imposing and delusive ritualism—with the multitude indifferent and very many careless, and the routine duties of all directed to cement social position—it is not surprising that Materialism is apparently triumphant, nor that the prevalent feeling should be that the Power, whatever it may be, which sustains us in this world, may be trusted to perform the same office in another: if there is another! The spirituality of the existing agencies for the furtherance of the religious life of the community is conspicuous by its absence, and the energies of their corporate work apparently directed mainly to the maintenance of their several creeds. Briefly and sorrowfully it must be said that the Church at large has forgotten its functions, has forsaken Heaven and closed, as far as they may be closed, the avenues for inspiration, denying in practice the intercommunion of the two worlds, excluding the spirit and exposing the dry bones of Humanity. The Church should, undoubtedly, represent the spiritual evolution of the race; if it is unequal to this, the death of Humanity is only a question of time. A Divine providence, however, interposes, and there is always, in arrest of decay, an evident incursion of spiritual forces; a fresh departure is certified and the true life is saved. In the form of modern Spiritualism a powerful and mighty upheaval is conspicuously at work in this direction now, supplying something more than convincing proofs of immortality; for it feeds the whole spiritual nature and brings the external daily life of man into harmony with the internal qualities of the Divine Humanity. As a faint strain of music, as a gleam of sunshine, is this heavenly messenger brightly and beautifully piercing the mist of selfishness and wrong, heralding the perfection of a serene life, displacing the mourning drapery by a garland of roses, and giving to all the assurance that if death is imminent anywhere there is also the promise of renewed life. On its bier, weeping friends, let us to-night leave this Humanity; our next address shall be directed to the more cheerful topic of its Resurrection.

QUEBEC HALL.

On Sunday evening Mr. MacDonnell drew a large audience to hear his address on "Mesmerism," and witness some experiments, which were quite successful and very interesting. The lecture, however, was neither so argumentative nor so philosophical as we expected, but was perhaps best suited to the room, as it gave a sketch of the origin of the science, and was accompanied by severe strictures on the opposition of the scientists of this and the past generations. After the address the speaker magnetized Mr. J. Hopecroft, who easily passed into the trance state, and held debate with several in the room. An unbeliever present proposed physical tests on the subject, which were refused, and the moral evidence of credibility of the witnesses insisted on. The evening proved to be highly interesting, and it was approaching ten o'clock when a conclusion was effected. We should be glad to hear Mr. MacDonnell again on some special department of this important question, and should like to see a wider range of experiments produced, as we are sure that his former studies and experience would enable him to speak with great advantage to students.

LIVERPOOL.

Last Sunday Mrs. Hardinge Britten delivered two orations in Rodney Hall, Rodney-street, being the opening services at this beautiful hall, where the Society will hold its meetings for the future. The subject in the morning was, "Mediumship and Mind-reading," and the discourse was listened to with breathless attention by a most appreciative audience. In the evening the hall was crowded, many being unable to gain admittance. The discourse was in reply to the Rev. J. H. Skewes' sermon on Spiritualism delivered at Holy Trinity Church on January 28th. The address, which, with questions and replies, occupied an hour and a-half in delivery, was listened to with the closest attention; and although many passages were of a very caustic character the audience seemed to be quite in sympathy with the speaker, whose inexorable logic left no loophole of escape for those who might have come to oppose or criticise. Mrs. Britten will speak for the Society on the first and third Sundays of each month for some time to come.—J.L.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—Mr. De Main, of Howden-le-Weir, lectured at the rooms of the N.E.S. on Sunday evening last, to a good audience. Treading on the old lines of transcendentalism, he gratified the audience with a telling address. Mr. Oyston of Howden-le-Weir, presided, and made during the evening some excellent remarks. It is pleasing to note that since the election of the new committee the attendance has greatly improved, the debt has been considerably reduced, and new members are steadily coming in. We observe that at the last meeting of the members of the Newcastle Literary and Philosophical Society, upon the motion of our celebrated townsman, Sir William Armstrong, our friend and fellow Spiritualist, Mr. Joseph Skipsey, the poet, was unanimously elected an honorary member of that institution. Our northern lyricist has of late earned a wide and well-merited reputation, spreading beyond his own country. Lately Messrs. Bogue and Son, of London, published an excellent edition of Mr. Skipsey's poems, which some short time ago we had the pleasure of reviewing in our Newcastle Press. They will rank with the best lyrics in our language. Some of them, especially "The Bereaved," "Hell Broth," "The Mystic Lyre," and others we might mention, have scarcely their equals in our language. We would recommend every Spiritualist to read them; they will amply repay perusal. We do not possess a poet in connection with Spiritualism who is in any way his equal.

GATESHEAD.—Last Sunday evening Mr. T. P. Barkas addressed a large and intelligent audience at the rooms of the G.S.E.S., on the occasion of the anniversary of the opening of their present place of meeting. The subject of the lecture was, "God in Nature." The lecturer endeavoured to show how man the finite was everywhere surrounded by infinity of extension and infinity of duration; and that he was furthermore surrounded by an infinity of intelligence, the which he considered a necessary existence, as the only possible answer to the "why" of the universe of law, everywhere pervading the universe of being. The address was interspersed with scientific illustrations, which gave great pleasure and instruction to the company. Mr. H. Burton occupied the chair. We are glad to announce that the Gateshead committee have resolved to hold their annual tea and concert on Easter Monday. We hope our Newcastle and country friends will do their best to encourage them by their generous support. Mr. H. Burton will lecture on Sunday evening next.

DISTRICT MEETINGS.—The North Shields Society had Mr. J. G. Grey, of Gateshead, on Sunday, when that gentleman lectured to a crowded meeting. The rooms at this place are getting far too small for the audiences, and the members are seriously entertaining the notion of removing to a larger hall as soon as they can get one.

HETTON-LE-HOLE was visited by Mr. J. W. Thompson, of Shildon, who lectured to a large audience on Sunday evening upon "Humanitarianism." The cause is prospering very much at this place.

CRAMLINGTON.—The cause of Spiritualism is spreading so rapidly here that the friends have been compelled to engage one of the largest lecture rooms in the locality. There is every prospect that our movement in the North is breaking forth to a new and vigorous life, as the dark clouds of the past few years are being rent, and a spiritual Spiritualism is being unfolded.

NORTHUMBRIA.

ROCHDALE

Sunday, the 11th inst., was a red-letter day for the Rochdale Spiritualists, the occasion being the visit of Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten. The morning was taken up by an experience meeting, which was held at the Society's regular meeting-room. Mr. and Mrs. Harper, of Birmingham, happened to be present, and both of them contributed to the edification of the meeting. Mrs. Harper referred to her experiments upon mesmerised subjects, who had demonstrated clearly that in that condition they had passed beyond her own will, and proved the transition of the spirit to places far distant, and evinced a knowledge which they did not possess in their normal state. Mr. Brown, from Middleton, a Spiritualist of twenty-four years' standing, also narrated some very interesting experiences. For the accommodation of the friends from a distance tea was provided, of which a considerable number availed themselves, and this arrangement proved beneficial to the Society in a pecuniary way, as well as a convenience to the visitors.

In the afternoon, at the Central Stores Assembly Room, Mr. Charles Parsons presided, and Mrs. Britten lectured on "The Church of the Future." During her discourse she said the Church failed to meet the demands made upon it for food to suit the requirements of the soul. It had not helped the people on the way to Heaven, nor had it made a wicked age any better; yet, there was a longing for spiritual bread; and people were wanting to know what the spiritual realm of existence is. Was there need of a Church? this was the first question. Some who called themselves Spiritualists, and who knew that the immortality of the soul is a fact, and who had listened to the message from the spirit-world, said there was no need of a Church. They were apt to say they had the light in their own homes and there was no need of Church organisation. But those who thus argued were wrong. The Church never had died and never would. It was man's spiritual home, and he could not do without it. We were all members of one Divine body. We could not separate ourselves from one another, and we needed the magnetism of the great assembly which was so requisite to bring down the true Pentecostal fire on our heads and make us speak the common language of love. Humanity must build up the one grand Church of the future, which must not be one of creeds, and dogmas, and ceremonials; each one must be a stone in the building, and do his or her share in bringing about the true Pentecostal spirit. The people made up what is known as public opinion, which is but the echo of God's voice, and should yet be the foundation of the Divine Church of the future.

In the evening Mrs. Britten spoke on six subjects, chosen by the audience, the first being a verse in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus relative to a gulf being fixed, thereby preventing what is termed communion with departed spirits. The passage was ably dealt with, Mrs. Britten pointing out its parabolic signification, and utterly repudiating the popular teaching. In dealing with "The efficacy of prayer," she first addressed herself to the popular sense of the term. She held that prayer was the aspiration of the whole heart, the recognition of the weakness of men and of the supremacy that is above and around us. The third subject was in the form of a question: "If Spiritualism is the only way to truth and happiness, why did it not come to light until thirty or forty years ago, and if it was so, what about those who had died before its revelation?" The lecturer said Spiritualists never claimed this; but that Spiritualism underlies every form of religion. The Church had been at fault because it offered the people the body without the soul, the husk without the wheat, the form without the substance.

Several other questions were asked and ably answered, and many in the audience spoke in high terms of the splendid oratory to which they had had the opportunity of listening.

Collections were made at the close of the lecture, the result in every way proving the advantage of the voluntary system over that of making a small charge as on former occasions. Spiritualism is beyond all doubt an established fact in Rochdale. It is well-known that many in the higher walks of society are secretly investigating, and sooner or later the brave ones, when they have ascertained the truth, will proclaim it at the front. (Communicated.)

We are glad to observe that the Christian Commonwealth finds it necessary to remind its readers that the Rev. Joseph Cook's statements are to be received with "considerable caution." We can hardly express our surprise that this warning should be necessary, when we remember Mr. Cook's extraordinary statements with reference to Spiritualism.

THE DEATH OF HERR WAGNER.—The correspondent of the Daily Telegraph in an article detailing the manner of this eminent composer's death, says that from many accounts that are now forthcoming Wagner had some premonition that his end was drawing nigh. When conducting some of his own music for the master and pupils of the Marcello Academy at Venice, which they were to perform on the occasion of Frau Wagner's birthday last Christmas, he exclaimed, "I cannot conduct any more, nor shall I ever compose again. 'Parsifal' will be my last work." This alarmed those present, who gathered round him, and asked him why he spoke so despondingly. "I shall die soon," he replied, "I have been convinced of it for some time, and am so now more than ever."

THE CONDUCT OF PUBLIC PHYSICAL SEANCES.

Circular issued by the Central Association of Spiritualists, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

Few Spiritualists can have failed to note, with regret, the deterioration which has of late years taken place in the conditions under which physical phenomena have been sought in public séances.

These conditions—so favourable to fraud on the part of dishonest mediums, and so calculated to excite suspicion in the minds of observers—have led to the most disastrous results. We are not speaking without full warrant when we say that there is hardly a public medium for physical manifestations in this country against whom, at one time or other, charges of imposture have not been brought. We fear that in some cases no reasonable doubt can be entertained that fraud of the grossest kind was really perpetrated; while in other cases there is reason to believe that—whatever may have been the appearance to inexperienced spectators—there was no conscious deception on the part of the medium.

But in either case the name of Spiritualism has been brought into discredit, and we are forcibly driven to the conclusion that other methods of procedure must be amended. We must demonstrate our abhorrence of imposture by disavowing and discouraging all conditions which do not plainly shut out even the suspicion of its impossibility.

Obviously these remarks can have little reference to family circles, which are naturally held sacred by those who regard them as affording opportunities for veritable "communion with the dead." But it is open to grave question whether—even in the case of family circles—inquirers should ever be permitted to make their first acquaintance with Spiritual phenomena by introduction to séances held for physical manifestations in the dark, or where a cabinet is used for the seclusion of the medium.

We are chiefly concerned, however, with what are known as public or promiscuous séances for physical manifestations.

These have been of late years generally marked by the following characteristics:—(1) The séance has been conducted in imperfect light, or in total darkness. (2) The medium has been isolated from the circle, by being placed either in a cabinet or behind a curtain. (3) The sitters have been, either wholly or in part, unacquainted with the subject and with each other. (4) There has not unfrequently been a manifest want of harmony, consequent upon differences of opinion as to the nature and value of the tests employed.

These conditions, usually found in combination, effectually preclude careful and dispassionate investigation; open wide an avenue to fraud; suggest suspicion of its presence even where it does not exist; and in many cases, we fear, expose the medium to very injurious influences.

Such conditions should be allowed to prevail no longer. "Mixed" circles should be as little mixed as possible—mere wonder-seekers, and men whose moral atmosphere is known to be impure, being carefully excluded. Above all, darkness should give way to light. In the early days of Spiritualism public dark circles were the exception, and there is no need for them now. There is abundant evidence that, with mediums of the present day, satisfactory phenomena, including even "form" manifestations, can be obtained without isolation—the medium, where a cabinet is used, being placed near, but outside of it, and in full view of the sitters. But even if this were not so, it is neither wise nor honourable to expose mediums to the risks which have been shewn to attend séances held under the conditions that have of late been prevalent; and it were far better that we should have no public manifestations of physical phenomena than that they should be sought under circumstances which, to say the least, inevitably conduce to suspicion.

In view of all these considerations, believing that fraud is not of the essence of this confessedly obscure subject, but rather an accident dependent on faulty conditions of research; feeling that Spiritualists have the remedy for the evil in their own hands, and that without its conscientious application they cannot hope to maintain a fair reputation before the world; we earnestly recommend—That in all public circles held for physical phenomena, the medium be so placed, and in such light, as to be continuously under observation by each member of the circle.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

It is interesting to find how careful the Committee of the Mesmeric Infirmary were to keep clear of anything that might prejudice the scientific world against their work: and how futile all their precautions were. They say in an early report (1854): "Above all we keep clear of supernaturalism . . . we allow nothing that is termed spirit-rapping or spirit table-turning (sic): although we express no opinion upon the subject, nor as to whether a power, hitherto overlooked, exists in us and other animals of causing movements in inanimate bodies independently of mechanical impulse, and a power in some conditions of the system of causing certain sounds." Very cautious, but quite fruitless! The men of science laughed mesmerism to scorn, as many of them have been laughing at Spiritualism:—

"'Tis above reason, cried the doctors on one side:
'Tis below reason, cried the others.
'Tis faith, cried one:
'Tis a fiddlestick, said the others.
'Tis possible, cried one:
'Tis impossible, said the others."

So the world wags: and half-a-century of added knowledge and broadened experience makes us very little better than our fathers in our reception of new truth.

The case of mesmeric healing that I have marked for summary is one of the "cure of a true cancer of the female breast" recorded by Dr. Elliotson, and published by him in The Zoist, No. 23, and separately in the form of a pamphlet, with an introduction by Dr. Engledue, of Southsea. This latter gentleman regards the case as "one of the most important and instructive in the annals of surgery." Dr. Elliotson calls it "one of the most splendid triumphs of mesmerism." "The disease," he says, "was malignant and structural, and such as the art of medicine has never been known to cure, nor the powers of nature to shake off." The disease, moreover, was hereditary: "her father's mother had died of cancer of the breast." When, on March 6th, 1843, the patient first consulted Dr. Elliotson, the disease had manifested itself by violent, darting pains, for a period of about eighteen months. The case was seen by various eminent surgeons—Sir Benj. Brodie, Mr. Liston, Mr. Samuel Cooper, among them—and "the breast was unanimously doomed to extirpation." Dr. Elliotson, himself, does not seem to have expected more from mesmeric treatment than "to render the patient insensible to the pain of the surgical operation." It would be tedious to pursue the course of the case, complicated as it was by the prejudice of other surgeons whom well meaning friends called in. But, briefly, "the tumour underwent such changes, day after day, and month after month, just in proportion as the efforts of the mesmeriser were continued: and finally it became absorbed: and not only so, but the constitutional symptoms, which were of an aggravated character, yielded; the darting pains ceased, sleep returned, the sallow complexion vanished, the swollen arm returned to its natural size, and the situation of the patient became in every respect more and more satisfactory."

We have the best evidence that this amelioration was due to mesmerism, for "on one occasion, during the absence of Dr. Elliotson on the Continent, the treatment was nearly discontinued for two months." What was the result? Dr. Elliotson testifies that on his return he "found a very painful and bleeding sore, and what was worse the darting pain had returned, and the diseased mass had grown firmly to the ribs." This relapse took place after two years' treatment. Again she was mesmerised daily and again the mass began to diminish. . . . During 1847 the disease "steadily gave way. The mass had become not only much less but detached from the ribs and movable again." And at length, in September, 1848, the report is—"The cancerous mass is now completely dissipated; the breast is perfectly flat, and all the skin thicker and firmer than before the disease existed. Not the smallest lump is to be found, nor is there the slightest tenderness." Dr. Engledue asks very cogently: "Is there not here a manifestation of cause and effect! Have we not the same evidence here that we have when a beneficial effect follows the exhibition of a drug?" It would be curious to hear a negative answer logically defended. But alas! logic was conspicuously absent, then and now, from the arguments (if they can be so called) with which men of science and theologians were wont to meet what they equally feared and detested. Dr. F. Hawkins, in the Harveian Oration before the College of Physicians, in 1848, was not ashamed to denounce "the impostors called mesmerists" in words which shall not defile these pages. And even Mr. Syme's certificate to the reality of the cure, in the case narrated above, produced little effect. Dr. Hugh McNeile, "great and good man," according to his own estimate of himself in after years, seemed to think that mesmerism must be supernatural, and so, diabolic! But he naïvely adds, "I have seen nothing of it; nor do I think it right to tempt God by going to see it." Yet he does not fear to "tempt God" by slander from the pulpit in His house those whose only crime it was to follow in the beneficent steps of Him who "went about doing good, and healing all manner of diseases."

Some of the most interesting accounts in the Reports are those of clairvoyance, in which the patient diagnoses his own case, predicts the recurrence or disappearance of symptoms, and the date of perfect cure. There are many such recorded, and it is of them that Dr. (afterwards Sir Thomas) Watson, than whom no abler and more philosophic physician, none more respected by the profession, ever, perhaps, lived, offered the following judgment. I quote it as added evidence of the difficulty of getting fair play for new truth even from those whose minds are pervaded by philosophic calm, and as some consolation to those who now chafe with impatience against the difficulty of getting acceptance of what they regard as an important and noble truth. Dr. Watson says in his "Lectures" *:—"All the transcendental phenomena, the miraculous (sic) diagnoses and revelations, the clairvoyance, the prophecies, I class with the spirit-rappings and the table-turnings, as evidence of imposture on the one side and of miserable credulity on the other, and as alike scandalous in an age and country which vaunt themselves to be enlightened." This, observe, from a philosopher writing in measured and dignified language for the instruction of others about a subject which he could not have investigated, and of which he is proved out of his own mouth to be ludicrously ignorant! If philosophers rave thus, what wonder if ordinary mortals talk even more wildly!

* Statement of Dr. Engledue.

† Statement of Dr. Engledue, quoting Dr. Elliotson.

A far more philosophical utterance from one who has not less claim to the title of philosopher, I may be pardoned for contrasting with that just quoted. Archbishop Whately studied mesmerism, knew what he was writing about, and had breadth of mind sufficient to overcome inherited prejudice. How few alas! in his position would have had the fairness, the bravery, and the justice to write thus about a subject so unpopular:—

"I myself was for many years reluctant to believe in mesmerism; but I was at length overcome by facts. Any amount of detected mistake or imposture will no more go to disprove a well-established fact than the detection of a number of pieces of counterfeit coins will prove a genuine shilling and sovereign not to be genuine silver and gold. To suppose that we are all so mad as to believe that things are taking place before our eyes which do not, and all mad in the same way, is utterly incredible. No one, I am convinced, who has seen what I have seen, or the half of it, can remain unconvinced that mesmerism is a real and powerful agent. Those who profess complete disbelief, therefore, must belong, I conceive, to one of two classes: first, those who have made but a slight and scanty inquiry, or none at all, and shun full investigation, lest they should be convinced—which is what they do not wish; and secondly, those who have inquired more fully, and really are convinced, but are afraid to own it, for fear of being laughed at, or of being sent 'to Coventry' by a kind of Trades' Union conspiracy."

The books to which I have referred in these Notes will be found (through the kindness of Captain James, who has handed them to me for presentation to the Society,) in the library of the Society for Psychical Research. They will well repay perusal.

CURE OF DIABETES. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In reply to the letter of "J.E.P.," requesting to know if anyone can tell him if diabetes can be cured by mesmerism or other means, I may say that I have myself cured several cases of diabetes mellitus by nitrate of uranium, and by phosphorus in small doses.

It is true the cures were not permanent, but in several cases all signs of the disease disappeared for years.

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

P.S.—While writing, I may add, in reference to M. Didier's interesting paper on "Healing by the Royal Touch," that in olden times the king was generally supposed to be either an Initiate or one anointed of the Lord, and thus one through whom flowed the Divine influence of healing.—G.W.

SIR,—Seeing in "LIGHT" a letter headed "Cure of Diabetes," I beg to inform you that I have cured several cases, and one very serious. You will see a case reported on p. 18 of my little book, "Curative Mesmerism." The patient was declared incurable. I mesmerised her during six weeks, and the improvement was so great that she began to gain flesh and strength to walk. I attended the whole family for years; the patient, her husband, their children, and their grandchildren.

I think you will find cases also reported in the Zoist.—Yours truly,

ADOLPHE DIDIER.

GENERAL GHOST-LOGY.

Apart from the respective theories of renovated images, mental hallucinations, and magnetic influence, which embrace among them the greater portion of the phantom world, there lies one description of incident to which no explanation seems, with the least plausibility, to apply, viz., that which has, to all appearance, a local habitation, and is, past all question, associated with that particular spot by means of events which have never come to the knowledge of the seer.

The late Lady P. told me that in her youth she happened to be visiting with her mother at an old moated mansion, not far from Warwick. Not being as yet promoted to the honours of the late dinner-table, she was, one evening, awaiting in a large room above the drawing-room, in company with three other young ladies, the accustomed summons to dessert. Their fire having become low, she took up a shovel, and proceeded towards a closet near the other end of the room, where the coals were kept. She had made but a few steps in that direction when, to her utter astonishment, the figure of a tall man suddenly stood before her. Her companions, at her cry of surprise, ran to her side, and likewise saw the figure.

There was something—as they afterwards declared—in the appearance of the intruder that convinced them he was not of flesh and blood; nevertheless, Lady P. (she was then Miss B.)—a child of remarkable spirit and courage—made a step forward, and actually offered to strike at the apparition with the shovel in her hand! The figure seemed to nod gravely in answer to the menace, but never moved from its place. For a minute the parties stood gazing on each other, until, to the relief of the juvenile allies, help arrived in the very material form of John, the footman, who announced dessert.

A general scream invited John to approach, for the phantom foe still stood his ground, and it was impossible to reach the door without passing him. John accordingly entered upon the field, and, thus taken in flank, the enemy disappeared. The young ladies eagerly related what they had seen, when the man evinced no surprise, merely telling them that they were in what had always been called the "haunted room." The circumstance being made known in the drawing-room, the host and hostess expressed much regret that they had been introduced to the room in question, which had been rarely used on account of its painful associations, the steward of a family who formerly occupied the mansion having shot a fellow-servant there, and concealed the body of his victim in the coal-closet. It was a curious circumstance that the pistol which had effected the murderous deed had ever since been suffered to hang over the mantel-piece in the room. It was many years before the distinct impression stamped by the vision on Miss B.'s mind—even to the very features of the spectral visitant—faded away.

Here is another example of that singular class of incident which seems to be permitted to re-act the remote past, simply for the information of some person, or persons, themselves wholly unconnected with the circumstances thus revealed.

A lady, not long since resident in London, but whose family had, for many years, had connections with Canada, related that an aunt of hers, Miss Caroline C., was one of a large family living at Montreal, and, at the period of our story, a handsome, healthy girl, by no means dreamy or imaginative, possessed of a remarkably clear intelligence, and (we are pledged to state all the facts) an uncommonly robust appetite, inasmuch as it has been left on record in the family that this fortunate young lady could eat eight or nine eggs for breakfast "quite comfortably." (I note this circumstance as in some sort material, proving as it does that in Miss Caroline's system no undue preponderance existed on the spiritual side). The mansion tenanted by her father, Colonel C., had been built by a Dutch or French settler, and was a quaint old place, covered with lichens and creepers. It had a large, old-fashioned garden, divided by a low wall from an orchard well stocked with apple, peach, and cherry-trees. On the other three sides of the orchard ran an old, half-decayed oak paling, and beyond this frowned the old forest, yet untouched by the arm of man. Growing close to the paling stood a very large cherry-tree loaded in the season with luscious fruit, and this spot Miss Caroline had adopted as her study, reclining for many hours on the soft grass, which cushioned a little mound at the very foot of the tree.

One summer morning, in 1800, while the children were at play, and Caroline, the staid elder sister—then about fifteen—was lying on her favourite bank deep in (the times were not fastidious) "Roderick Random," a strange, sudden impulse, such as she had never before experienced, caused her to look up, as if in answer to a call. Yet all was still, the very voices of the children having died away into the woodland. Glancing along the paling, Caroline observed, with great surprise, a young lady, apparently about seventeen or eighteen, step suddenly upon the paling, and trip along that narrow bridge towards her. As this, however, was a feat constantly practised by her sisters, Caroline's predominating feeling was rather one of curiosity as to who the stranger might be. The dress of the latter was very peculiar. She was in white, wearing what was formerly in fashion as a negligé, and over her shoulders a long blue scarf. She had light, wavy hair and a fair and pretty face. As she held her dress up slightly, while stepping along, Caroline saw that her tiny feet were encased in red morocco high-heeled slippers. She walked lightly and steadily, gazing straight before her, until she reached the cherry-tree, and was close to the astonished watcher. Then she stopped, looked up among the overhanging branches, calmly unwound her blue scarf, flung one end over an arm of the tree, secured it there, made a loop at the other end, and slipping the latter over her head, leaped from the paling! Caroline uttered a piercing shriek, and fainted. Her cry brought children and servants to her aid, and she was soon restored to consciousness, when her first eager question was for the poor suicide. The hearers looked at her in amazement. She related all that had passed, but it was, of course, attributed to a dream or illusion. There was not a sign of girl or scarf to be seen, nor, as it appeared on inquiry, had any person resembling the figure described been noticed by anyone in the neighbourhood.

Some weeks later the story happened to be mentioned at a mansion in the vicinity, in the presence of an old negress, who, though past ninety, had all her faculties about her, and evinced an extraordinary interest in the narrative, dropping so many mysterious hints in reference to the subject that they finally reached the ears of Colonel C. That gentleman, determined to sift the matter fully, called on the family with whom the negress lived, and extracted from the "good old chronicler,"—who, like Nestor, had for three generations "walked hand in hand with time,"—the following singular explanation:—

Colonel C.'s house had, seventy years before, belonged to a German, one Waldstein. Among his daughters was one of great personal attractions, with beautiful light hair, and noted, besides, for the perfection of her little feet. A French officer, on a visit to her father, struck with her beauty and innocent, winning ways, offered marriage, but added that, according to French law, he must obtain the formal consent of his parents, who, belonging to a proud and noble line, were, it was feared, not unlikely to refuse it. On this errand, the young soldier hastened back to France. What he did—or did not do—there, was never accurately learned. For he never communicated directly again with her to whom he had vowed his life. Only an unhappy rumour was conveyed to her, under circumstances which commanded belief, that he had married the young daughter of a house as noble as his own. When the poor girl's lingering trust in the promise-breaker was thus at last extinguished, she spoke not a word. She walked with a frightful calmness, into the garden. None followed her, for they believed their darling had gone, as other proud-mourners have done, to weep alone. But that light, quiet step passed through the familiar garden into the orchard, to the very tree under whose shade she had so often sat hand in hand with him. Upon its branches she hanged herself with the blue scarf she wore, and on that spot, where the grass grew so soft and fine, the old negress averred that she saw her buried, in the dress in which she died.

One circumstance remains to be mentioned, that adds not a little to the painful interest of the story. The young seer, Caroline C., herself died within two years of the vision, under circumstances mournful enough, and—save in the act of self-destruction—not dissimilar from what has been just narrated. Could the vision have been intended as a warning? a prophecy? Such a mystery sets at nought the boldest philosophical speculations. It is equally impossible to conceive that the scene of despair was perpetually re-enacting, or that but one individual, in a period of seventy years, should have derived, from natural causes, the capacity of witnessing it. If, on the other hand, we treat it as a special interposition, and remember that there is on record no wholly fruitless miracle, how should the warning have been suffered to fail?

An occurrence of a kindred sort, much nearer our own time, created much interest in Paris, obtaining greater notoriety from its association with the name of the amiable Archbishop of Paris, Monseigneur Sibour, subsequently assassinated by a half-mad priest.

A young German lady arrived, with a party of friends, at one of the most renowned hotels in Paris, and chanced to occupy a first-floor bed-chamber furnished with unusual magnificence. Here she lay awake long after the hotel was wrapt in slumber, contemplating, by the glimmer of her ecailleuse, the costly objects around, when suddenly the folding doors, which she had secured, flew open; the chamber was filled with a bright light, as of day, and in the midst of this there appeared a young man, tall and handsome, and attired in the undress uniform of the French navy, having his hair arranged in the peculiar mode, à la Titus. Taking a chair from the bedside, he placed it in the very centre of the room, sat down, took from his pocket a pistol, with a remarkable red butt, put it to his forehead, and, firing, fell back apparently dead! Simultaneously with the explosion, the room became dark and still, but a low, soft voice seemed to utter, "Say an Ave Maria for his soul." The young lady had fallen back, not insensible, but in a more painful state—a kind of cataleptic trance—and thus remained, fully conscious of all she imagined to have occurred, yet unable to move tongue or hand, until her maid, at seven o'clock on the following morning, knocked at the door. Even then she was unable to reply, and it was not till an hour later that the maid, in company with another domestic, repeated the summons. Still no answer, and for yet another hour the poor girl was delivered over to her agonised thoughts. At nine o'clock the doors were forced, and at the same moment the power of speech and movement returned. She shrieked out that a man had shot himself there some hours before, and still lay upon the floor.

Observing nothing unusual, the attendants concluded that it was an illusion consequent upon some terrible dream. She was removed to an adjacent room, and with difficulty persuaded that what she had seen and so minutely described had no reality. Half an hour later, the hotel proprietor, seeking an interview with a gentleman of the party, declared that the scene so strangely re-enacted had actually occurred three nights before. A young French officer had engaged the best room in the hotel, and there terminated his life, using for the purpose a pistol of the peculiar appearance described. The body and the weapon were still at the Morgue, waiting identification, and the gentleman, proceeding thither, saw both—the head of the unfortunate young man exhibiting the Titus crop, and the wound in the forehead, as in the vision.

The Archbishop of Paris, struck with the extraordinary nature of the story, shortly after called upon the young lady, and directing her attention to the expression used by the mysterious voice, urged upon her with much fervour (but, it is believed, without success) the advisability of embracing that faith to whose teaching it appeared to point.

A letter from Mr. S. C. Hall, in the last number of "LIGHT," recalls to my memory a singular circumstance which, some thirty years ago, made a great impression on the minds of those who, like myself, were too well acquainted with the original narrator (a gentleman who held a high position in the Bank of England) to doubt his veracity. Without, at this moment, dwelling on the question whether the lower created animals are admitted to a future life, I will simply relate my friend's experience, as he himself imparted it.

He had, at one period of his life, a Pomeranian wolfhound—a noble creature, between whom and his master there existed a strong attachment. In the brief holidays Mr. St. C.'s official duties permitted him to take, he had been invariably accompanied by his four-footed friend—until one autumn, when the prospect of a two months' leave suggesting a longer journey than usual, he resolved to go abroad. Finding it inconvenient to take his favourite with him, and somewhat apprehensive as to the animal's behaviour when its naturally fierce temper should be, perhaps, irritated by confinement and its master's absence, it occurred to him to request a friend connected with the Zoological Society, Regent's Park, to place the animal in the Gardens until he should return. A commodious cage was at once devoted to "Luath," and his master bade him farewell.

Mr. St. C.'s absence lasted a month longer than he had foreseen, and it was late in November when he returned to his home, near Muswell Hill, Highgate. On the morning after his return, while shaving close to a window which looked upon the garden, he suddenly saw—to his great astonishment—the enormous head and outspread paws of "Luath" rise up above the garden wall and, after an apparent struggle to keep hold, drop out of sight; again and again was the action repeated, until the dog, seemingly disheartened, after a last violent effort sank back, and was seen no more. By this time, the gardener, who had been summoned, arrived with the key and opened the door—no Luath was to be seen. As soon as he was dressed, St. C. ran down, himself—hoping to whistle back his favourite, who could not be far off; a thin sheet of snow was on the ground, but, on this, St. C. noticed with surprise, there was not a trace of Luath's huge paws. On that day, Mr. St. C. was detained late at his official duties, but, on the next, he called at the "Zoo," and at once taxed the custodian with allowing his dog to escape.

"He has escaped indeed, sir," said the man "but it was no fault of ours. He was all right till a day or two ago, but yesterday morning we found him dead."

"Nonsense, man! I saw him, myself, yesterday," exclaimed St. C.

"You can see him now, sir," was the reply, "if you'll walk this way. Bill's a burying of him. He was very fond of the dog, was Bill."

They went to the spot, and were in time to see the noble Pomeranian laid in the just completed grave.

Has any one ever yet heard of the ghost of a dog? Such an alleged phenomenon was the cause of much excitement and uneasiness at fashionable Wiesbaden about twenty years ago. The circumstances were singular enough to be worth recital.

A pretty little girl (the daughter of one of the residents), well-known in the neighbourhood from being constantly seen playing in the beautiful public gardens of the place, died, after a few weeks' illness, having been much soothed and solaced, during that painful interval, by the companionship of a favourite doll. The latter, who had received the name of "Flore," was scarcely less familiar to the juvenile community than was her poor little mistress. It seemed painful to separate the two. At all events, a feeling, perfectly intelligible to kindly hearts, induced the friends of the deceased child to place the doll in the coffin, in the position it had been used to occupy on the bosom of the little sleeper; and thus they were interred in the neighbouring cemetery of Biberich. Some weeks elapsed, and then a mysterious whisper went abroad that—wonderful as it was—Eulalie (the little girl) and Flore had reappeared in the public walks and gardens! This rumour quickly narrowed down to the apparition of Flore alone. But here it made so determined a stand as to awaken the attention of the older and wiser members of the community. Not a day now passed without one or other of the juvenile playmates bringing home an eager story of Flore's having been distinctly seen—if not fairly "interviewed"—sometimes sitting, bolt upright, under a rose-bush, sometimes propped against a garden chair, with her head mournfully drooping on one shoulder, sometimes borne in the arms of a certain dark-looking child, whose demeanour appeared to have discouraged any friendly advances, who disdained skipping-rope, and had proved impervious to the seductive influence of hoop.

With some difficulty, the story was traced back to this circumstance, that, about three weeks after the funeral, an intimate friend of Eulalie happened to be walking in the gardens, when her attention was attracted by two other children who were quarrelling. With the curiosity of her years the little girl hurried up to ascertain the cause of the dispute. It was a doll. No sooner had her eyes lit upon it than she uttered a scream, flew back to her nurse, and, pulling her towards the spot, bade her look at the ghost of Flore, who had been buried with little Eulalie! The nurse complied, but, less familiar with Flore's specialities than her charge, declined to offer any decided opinion on the subject, excepting that it was certainly no ghost, and wore a different cap and bonnet from those in which Flore made her last terrestrial appearance. The little girl, nevertheless, positively maintained that it was indeed Flore, and no other; or, if not Flore, then undoubtedly her ghost—and this conviction she repeated to every acquaintance they encountered during the remainder of the walk. It became, in fact, the child's fixed idea, and, as the almost daily sight of the mysterious doll began seriously to affect her health and spirits, the parents, as the readiest means of dispelling the illusion, resolved to make a complete inquiry into the matter.

As they knew something of the family to whom the doll-carrier belonged (that of a gentleman from the Cape of Good Hope), there was not much difficulty in getting the toy in question submitted to their scrutiny. It appeared that the little girl was able to mention some certain trifling peculiarities, either in the dress or structure of the doll, which were not visible without a close examination. These were found to correspond minutely with her description. There was literally no longer room for question. It was Flore herself, rediviva! The ghost thus laid, it became necessary to ascertain the cause of the singular resuscitation of Flore's corporal frame, and, by agreement, the police were intrusted with the investigation. It was soon ascertained that the doll had been purchased by the toy-shop keeper, of whom the present possessor had bought it, from a travelling dealer, whose habitat was unknown. An application was then made to the authorities, for an order to examine the coffin of the deceased child. It was found empty! The inquiry resulted in the detection of a miscreant who had used certain means he possessed of access at all hours to the cemetery, for the purpose of stripping the bodies of the recently buried of anything of value that remained upon them, and disposing of these articles to the travelling pedlars. The wretch was condemned to the inadequate penalty of a year's imprisonment.

THE DOUBTS & DIFFICULTIES OF INQUIRERS.

By John S. Farmer,

Author of "A New Basis of Belief in Immortality," "How to Investigate Spiritualism," &c., &c., &c.

[Since the publication of my little pamphlet, "How to Investigate Spiritualism," numerous inquiries have been addressed to me upon various points which seemed to suggest a difficulty or a doubt to the questioner. Until now, I have answered these queries privately by letter, but as my time is limited, and furthermore, as the same questions arise again and again, it has occurred to me that were I to publish them in "LIGHT" I should not only save myself unnecessary labour, but also in all probability considerably extend the usefulness of my answers. Hence the appearance of matter that may seem very elementary indeed to many readers. This statement is, however, not made as an apology; surely such, for obvious reasons, is not needed.]

The various points dealt with have been actually raised, and they therefore fairly represent the difficulties which some inquirers have experienced. I have endeavoured to make my replies as clear and as succinct as possible, and trust they may prove of practical benefit to those who are only just entering upon the study of what, if rightly understood and used, should prove an inestimable boon. I need hardly say that it will afford me much pleasure to explain or answer to the best of my ability any other difficulties or questions that may arise in the minds of those who are honestly and reverently investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism. Such inquiries may be addressed to the care of the Editor of "LIGHT," 4, New Bridge-street, Ludgate-circus, London, E.C.]

(1) Is it in all cases necessary that a circle should be formed in order to produce the phenomena, or is it possible to investigate matters by one's self? If so, how? If not, what is the smallest number of persons who may expect results?

The inquirer in this case said that he was "ignorant even of the A B C of Spiritualism" but professed to be "greatly desirous of testing the truth of the phenomena which have been explained by the spiritual hypothesis." In a subsequent letter he informed me that his great difficulty lay in the fact of his being a stranger in the town from which he wrote, and that consequently he knew of no friends who would join him in forming a circle. In such a case as this the best plan would probably be for the investigator to experimentalise with a view to ascertaining whether he was personally a psychic, in which event it would not be unlikely that phenomena would occur even with no other person present. The least tedious way of arriving at this would be by using a Psychograph or Writing Planchette. An hour a day should be devoted to the trial, for say a month, at the end of which period, if no indications of external power were perceptible, the investigator would have reasonable ground for supposing that he was not a psychic, or rather that he was not possessed of sufficient power as a sensitive to make it of any practical value for strictly personal and private investigation. Failure to obtain results in the time mentioned could not, however, be taken as absolute evidence that the power did not exist. With a protracted trial it is not improbable that success would attend the efforts of the inquirer. Few, however, have the time, and fewer still the patience, to devote to the investigation. Still I have known instances where successful results have not been obtained until after the lapse of two years although such cases have been exceptional. In the event of the trial being made with the Planchette, a considerable amount of weariness may be avoided if the inquirer peruses a book or paper while he is sitting with his hand (right or left as preferred) on the little instrument in question. Such a course, too, is useful in producing a frame of mind somewhat favourable to success, viz., an attitude of expectancy. In many instances the Psychograph will after a time begin to move across the paper, tracing at first lines and strokes with no apparent meaning in them. Do not trouble about that—the meaning of it all will appear in good time. Do not interrupt until fluency of motion is attained, when the power moving the instrument may be questioned. Often directions will then be given how best to facilitate the manifestations; also messages on personal and other topics. Address the "power," or "force," or "intelligence"—whatever you may prefer to call it—in the same way as you would any stranger you met, listening courteously, but keeping your eyes and ears open. Above all, use your reason. Never for one moment surrender it.

If, however, the inquirer can induce one or two friends to join him the chances of success are increased in proportion. The plan suggested for "table movements" and "rappings" could then be tried. It is impossible to say what number is best for a circle. Sometimes two or three would obtain better results than seven or eight; it is a matter of experiment, and a great deal depends upon those forming the circle. As a rule, however, eight or nine is a very good number, although, as I have said, the party may be limited to three or four or five persons with good effect.

(2) Your pamphlet speaks of a danger to which inquirers are exposed of obsession by spirits. Is not the determination to face this, even after having been informed of its existence, evidence that the mind so determining has sufficient strength to resist the attacks of such spirits?

The danger spoken of is very real, but by no means common. Obsession is the exception and not the rule, as a result of intercourse with spirits; and to be forewarned is to a large extent to be forearmed. Many of the cases which have come under my notice have arisen through surrender of the reason on the part of the obsessed, or from a failure to rightly understand the legitimate uses of spirit communion. But the fact of the possibility of Spiritualism being capable of abuse is no argument against it. Money, food, drink—every earthly thing—may be similarly mis-used. Those, however, who approach the subject in a right and reverent spirit of inquiry, earnestly desiring to arrive at the truth, carefully sifting everything and testing all that comes by the same sound common-sense that is brought to bear upon affairs of everyday life and thought, need have little fear of evil. Certainly there are temptations; these, however, meet us everywhere, and those which come to us through Spiritualism can be as successfully struggled against, and overcome as those which are otherwise caused. Prima facie, the determination to face the possible danger would be evidence of strength to resist the attacks of such spirits.

(3) Supposing communication with spirits once established, is it characteristic of them to manifest themselves when unexpected, and at possibly inconvenient times?

No. As a rule they only manifest their presence when communion is sought. Here I refer, of course, solely to what are known as ecoked phenomena. Spontaneous manifestations, however, such as hauntings, &c., are subject to different laws, and oftentimes occur when least expected, and for no apparent reason. But generally speaking no inconvenience such as that suggested is experienced.

MRS. KATE FOX JENCKEN has left London for St. Petersburg, at the invitation of the Hon. Alexander Aksakof. She will, in all probability, be absent about two months.

A CONVERSATION will be held at 38, Great Russell-street, on Monday evening next, at 7.30. The evening will be devoted to social intercourse, music, and recitations. The charge for admission will be one shilling. We look for a large gathering of members and friends.

GHOSTS.—At the Fortnightly Discussion Meeting, held in the Rooms of the C.A.S., 38, Great Russell-street, on Monday evening last, under the presidency of Mr. Desmond G. Fitzgerald, Mr. Frank Podmore gave, before a large audience, a number of well authenticated ghost stories, which had been collected by the Haunted House Committee of the S.P.R., accompanying the narratives with critical remarks. Some of these stories we hope to have the opportunity of publishing in future numbers of "LIGHT."

MRS. HARDINGE BRITTON will lecture on the first and third Sundays of March and April and the first Sunday in May at Liverpool; on Sunday, March 11th, and Monday, March 12th, at Leeds; on Sunday and Monday, March 25th and 26th, at Bradford; on Sunday, April 8th, at Sowerby Bridge; on Sundays, 22nd and 29th April, at Newcastle; and on May 13th and 20th, at Cardiff. Mrs. Britton can give a few more lectures in the South and West during May, if early application is made to her at The Limes, Humphrey-street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

CASE V.

MESMERIC CLAIRVOYANCE.

Shortly after my correspondence with the Rev. Thomas Myers, another still more remarkable case of so-called clairvoyance reached me. I first heard of this case through a friend in Staffordshire, from whom I obtained the name and address of his informant; this person, however, proved to have had the facts second or third hand, and rather resented my asking from whom he had heard them.

A personal interview ultimately led him to give me his authority, and I was referred to Shrewsbury. Here other difficulties arose, and were overcome upon making a strict promise that I would not mention the name of my informant. (This is but a slight but typical instance of the difficulties that surround these inquiries.)

Having traced the story home I wrote to the address given me. In reply I received a courteous letter from the rector of a large parish in Cumberland, saying that he had no idea how the facts had reached me, but that they were certainly very much as I had narrated them to him. He had learnt to mesmerise through his old friend the Rev. Chauncy Hare Townshend, and had found it so beneficial in many cases that he had tried the effect of it on a young lady residing in his family, a Miss F., * and she had proved clairvoyant. Up to this time he had little belief in clairvoyance, but was now convinced. Upon asking for his own account of the story I had heard, he promised to give it to me if I would not mention any names, nor the name of his rectory, as he would be inundated with letters and unreasonable requests of all kinds. This promise, of course, I gave, and accordingly received the following letter:—

"February 3rd, 1877.

"MY DEAR SIR,—The particulars of the case are shortly these: Miss F.'s sister married and settled at Shrewsbury. Her husband had a favourite dog stolen from him. M., as I will call his wife, wrote to her sister to ask her to get me to mesmerise her, and send her to look for it. I did so, and she succeeded in finding it. I attempted to take down her description of the road from their house to the place where the dog was; but there were so many turnings and windings, and landmarks, that I could make nothing of it; so I gave her a sheet of paper and a pencil, and told her to draw me a plan of the road. This she did, and by the help of it, M.'s husband, with the assistance of the police, traced out and recovered his dog. It was found, as she had described it to me, fastened up in a cupboard, with several other dogs, in the house of a noted dog-stealer, and would have been sent to Liverpool, in the course of a few hours—as she had also forewarned me—to be disposed of.

* To avoid confusion it must be borne in mind that this Miss F. is not related to, nor so far as I know, has ever heard of, the Miss F. mentioned in the preceding cases.

"I ought to have mentioned that when she drew the plan she had never been to Shrewsbury, nor nearer to it than Crewe.

"Marvellous as this seems, it is a mere nothing to some of her performances. She had been a great invalid for years, and had suffered many things from many physicians before I tried what effect mesmerism would have upon her. She tells me that when she was a child—I was not then acquainted with her—she was very sensitive and highly nervous, and when she is in a mesmeric state she attributes her remarkable powers of vision partly to this, but still more to two severe attacks of brain fever. As far as my experience goes, I do not think there is ever any real clairvoyance unless the brain has been acted upon in a similar manner.

"You ask me if I can give you any good instance of thought-reading. I have Miss F.'s permission to give you the following:—A few months after M.'s marriage, her sister, when in a mesmeric state, told me that there was an envelope addressed to her, lying upon the chimney-piece in her sister's drawing-room, at Shrewsbury, and that she (her sister M.) was thinking how she could tell her that she was enroute. I told her this when I awoke her, but she would not believe it, and I bet her sixpence that the letter would arrive the next morning. I won my bet, and bought a walking-stick with the sixpence.

"You must not suppose that the strange gift of Miss F.'s has been used for no higher purpose than finding a missing dog. Having, I am thankful to say, derived great benefit from mesmerism, she has used it for the benefit of others. More than one person is now alive and in good health who owed their recovery to her having been enabled to ascertain the real seat of their disease, and the proper remedy for it. Unless in the case of her own and my family, and intimate friends, I have never allowed her to undertake a case until the doctor had given it up as hopeless.

"It may also interest you to know that Miss F.'s powers of vision depend a good deal upon the state of the weather. When there is a high wind and the air is charged with electricity, she sees with greater difficulty. When there is a snowstorm in addition, she cannot see at all; at whatever distance it may be, it entirely obstructs her vision in that direction.—I am, dear sir, yours truly, H.C."

I now wrote to Shrewsbury, and obtained the following letter from M., Miss F.'s sister* :—

"Neither my sister nor Mr. C. had been in Shrewsbury, but by the description she gave, where we should find the dog, we soon knew it must be the White Horse-passage, in Frankwell. My sister has gone, in a mesmeric state, much further than here; she has gone to several places on the Continent, and by the description she has given (which has been most accurate), Mr. C., who had been abroad to the places she described, knew exactly what street she was talking about. She has also been able to see the state of health of several persons when she was mesmerised, and has prescribed for them, and I know of two, who, acting upon her prescription, recovered and have never been so well in their lives as they are now. My sister was first mesmerised by Mrs. Fowler, an American M.D., when she was under Sir James Simpson, in Edinburgh. She had been very poorly, when Mrs. Fowler afterwards came to Mr. C.'s house and so she thought she would like to be mesmerised again. She (Mrs. F.) said that if my sister could only be mesmerised every day, for a short time, it would strengthen her more than anything else. So Mr. C. had some lessons on mesmerising from Mrs. Fowler, and has since then occasionally mesmerised her. My sister does not now take these long journeys in her mesmeric sleep, as it makes her feel weak and languid for a day or two afterwards."

As I was extremely sceptical about the possibility of clairvoyance, believing that some simple explanation would be found, I was most anxious to test this case further. Accordingly I wrote to the Rev. Mr. C., saying that I would come over to Cumberland the following Easter, if he would permit me to be present when he mesmerised Miss F., and allow me to submit the case to some simple and unobjectionable scientific test; or, failing this permission, whether he would try an experiment proposed by myself or

* I was unable to go to Shrewsbury to investigate the matter at the time, but on a visit I made there subsequently for this purpose I found the main facts confirmed, except as to the police, on which there was some doubt. Unfortunately, Miss F.'s sister was away at the time. I hope to go to Shrewsbury again this summer to complete the inquiry.

by any better known man of science. In reply I received the following:—

"What you propose is simply impossible. Miss F. would no more allow herself to be made a subject for scientific investigation than I would consent to act as showman. If you think the particulars I have given you worth repeating, you must rely upon my veracity, as your readers must upon yours. Those who know nothing of mesmerism, will, of course, look upon my statement as a mere romance, and even amongst those who have investigated the subject, it can only be among the very limited number of persons who have had an opportunity of verifying an undoubted case of clairvoyance, that it can hope to find acceptance.

"For your own information I may mention that having acted as chairman of the Petty Sessions here for upwards of five and thirty years I have at all events had considerable experience in sifting evidence. I am no believer in table-turning, spirit-rapping, or spiritual manifestations of any kind. I have never witnessed any experiments of the kind that could not have been as well, if not better, performed by a second-rate conjurer. It is not, however, upon this that my incredulity is founded, but upon the miserable results that even the most successful operations lay claim to. Had mesmerism obtained no better results than those which may be witnessed any day in these exhibitions of the ignorant charlatans who make a living out of it, I should hardly have thought it a subject worth investigating.—Believe me, my dear Sir, yours truly, H. C."

The last sentence in this letter is very much what Dr. Elliotson, Professor Gregory, and other believers in clairvoyance, would have written in their day. But from a scientific point of view, such a position is wholly untenable. Clairvoyance and Spiritualism are both, on a priori grounds, incredible to an educated man. Belief in either one or the other is simply determined by our estimate of the value of the evidence, and whether we listen to the evidence or not. In like manner, the telephone was on a priori grounds incredible to a scientific mind, and would have been laughed at by the learned and proved impossible to the present moment, if its discoverer had found the public unwilling to put their ear to the instrument. Thereupon, whether the scientific fact was credible or incredible, belief followed irresistibly:—if the ear was applied properly, and the person was not deaf.

Though evidence on behalf of clairvoyance is not yet abundant enough to entitle it to general belief, it is accumulating, and there can be little doubt that thoughtful sceptics will be more inclined to listen to this evidence when they have admitted the truth of thought-transference,—a point that will be reached before very long.

THE PIONEER.

Every age on him who strays
From its broad and beaten ways
Pours its seven-fold vial.
Happy he whose inward ear
Angel-whisperings can hear,
O'er the rabble's laughter;
And, while hatred's faggots burn,
Glimpses through the smoke discern
Of the good hereafter.

Knowing this, that never yet
Share of truth was vainly set
In this world's wide fallow;
After-hands shall sow the seed,
After-hands from hill and mead
Reap the harvest yellow.

Thus, with somewhat of the seer,
Must the moral pioneer
From the future borrow;
Clothe the waste with dream of grain,
And on the midnight sky of rain
Paint the golden morrow.

"ATTEMPTS AT TRUTH."

By St. George Stock.

This volume is a collection of essays on some topics of philosophical interest by a well-informed, clear-thinking, and frequently powerful writer of rising reputation. Its chief interest for the readers of this paper, as such, consists in the prominence given to Spiritualism, and in the able vindication of its claims to intellectual recognition. That authors, editors, and publishers are no longer afraid to entertain a subject which has been so long in the demi-monde of speculation and research, is a very encouraging and significant symptom. The "conspiracy of silence" is breaking up, and we may expect soon, if not immediately, that a fair literary field will be opened to representatives before whose knowledge and ability a host of prejudices and misconceptions will have to retreat.

An adequate review of these treatises would carry us too deeply and extensively into the subjects comprised in them. Nor would it be easy to condense an author who has himself the merit of condensing and bringing to a logical focus most of the controversies he deals with. Mr. St. George Stock is nearly always on the highest level of the argument, which he answers, or states, at its best, and in its latest recognised development. His analysis is invariably intelligible, and usually complete, and now and then we have to thank him for striking contributions of original thought. And nowhere do we find the results of modern speculation in several important departments set forth with more succinct clearness, or in a more agreeable literary style. Especially is this the case with the first three essays, concerning the problems of morality, and the opposite tendencies of thought which ultimate in the Intuitionist and Utilitarian schools. It is always difficult to assign a critical mind like our author's a place in either. Indeed, as regards the standard, or test of right, they are brought as near to a reconciliation as possible. When, in the progress of the controversy between the two schools, the Utilitarians had divested their notion of happiness of everything that makes it a definite conception in the minds of the mass of mankind, and when they had raised it from a realisable possession of existing generations into an ideal for the race, they gained an easy victory for a scarcely controvertible position in establishing the claim of this spiritualised beatitude to be the summum bonum of humanity. It is "the Everlasting Yes" in "Sartor Resartus." "Thou mayest do without 'happiness,' and instead thereof find blessedness." For then, as Mr. Stock points out, "ideally, happiness and virtue are inseparable; happiness standing to virtue in the relation of whole to part. Hence the attempt logically to explain the conception of virtue by that of happiness must be acknowledged futile." A result which certainly does not entitle the Utilitarian to the somewhat inconsistent conclusion of the author that "in spite of all difficulties utility, or conduciveness to happiness in the highest sense, must be regarded as what makes the difference between right and wrong, until some one has shewn what else it can be." If we cannot logically explain the conception of virtue by that of happiness, one is at a loss to see how the latter can maintain its ground as the test of the former. As regards the sanction, Mr. Stock frankly confesses that the admission of a standard cannot of itself give the sense of obligation. In considering the question whether the moral motive is self-regarding, he goes on the old lines of thought, and does not sufficiently advert to the great reconciliation of the two views afforded by the principle of a common humanity. To neglect of this—a conception still associated with mysticism, save in its unintelligible presentation by the Positivists—must be ascribed all apparent paradoxes of the subject, of which our author gives so clear a view. The identification of happiness with the dictates of a deeper and more universal nature in each individual is the true solution of the question whether "self-sacrifice," such as that of St. Paul,† is possible, or if possible, whence springing. "Exclusive individuality," says Professor Edward Caird,‡ "cannot be the highest category for those who see that the only being who is really individual is also universal." The real battle of the sanction in future will not be between the Intuitionist and the Utilitarian, but between the doctrine of the universal self within the individual and the association school reinforced by the principle of heredity.

† Quoted at p. 20. "I could wish that I myself were accused from Christ that my brethren of Israel might be saved." It is as if St. Paul had said, "My true self is not my distinct personality, but my race and nation." All sympathy is pro tanto a testimony to this more universal self. The same superiority of sympathetic to individual consciousness is exhibited in the following declaration in the Srimat Bhagavat: "Before God, I do not pray for transcendental powers or Mukti ('deliverance' or salvation); my prayer is that I may really be possessed of the suffering of all that they may be free from it."

Passing to the essay entitled, "Hume on Miracles," we find a clear recognition and statement of the capital fallacy by which the great sceptic's argument is vitiated. In the just observation that Hume confounded "the absence of experience in favour of a fact with the presence of experience against it," Mr. Stock has been anticipated by Mr. Wallace and others. That the definition of a "miracle" as "a violation of the laws of nature" begs the question in dispute, limiting "Nature" to a partial experience, and that Hume gets his "uniformity of experience" by ignoring the very evidence which that assumed uniformity is then employed to invalidate, are also answers well stated elsewhere, though never better than by Mr. Stock. And it is a correct and instructive criticism that Hume seems never to have doubted the evidential value of "miracles," if admitted, as authentications of the Divine origin of a religion. "To accept the Christian miracles was with him to accept the Christian religion, and to accept the miracle at Alexandria would have been to accept the Egyptian religion." It may fairly be suspected that an unphilosophical animus betrayed the calmest of reasoners into an impulsive and unwary polemic; a suspicion countenanced by the evident enjoyment with which Hume professes his obligation to a Christian bishop* for a refutation of the supposed foundation of Christianity.

The interesting account, from classical authorities, of the "Mediumship of the Emperor Vespasian," may be read along with "A Text from the Delphi Oracle" as contributions from antiquity which become credible in the light of modern experience. "After all deductions have been made," says Mr. Stock, "we need not doubt but that much in Herodotus and other ancient authors, which has hitherto been regarded as grotesque fable, will regain its place as sober history." But we must remonstrate with the author on his indulgence of Spiritualists in their extravagant abuse of the term "mediumship," by making it applicable to every kind of occult experience. All the phenomena of clairvoyance, double consciousness, prophetic dreaming, thought-reading, apparitional projection, the mystic and thaumaturgic powers of will, desire, and imagination in their exalted states are indifferently subsumed under a term which tacitly excludes the whole science of the human spirit or soul, ignoring all its transcendental energies, and limiting its spiritual privileges to a passive relation with disembodied entities. The healing by Vespasian is no more to be ascribed to "mediumship" than is the power of the mesmerist to work on the imagination of his subject.

The author's clever and acute review of a book or pamphlet, by Dr. George Sexton, entitled, "God and Immortality viewed in relation to Modern Spiritualism," need not long detain us. Demonstrators of the existence of God and immortality of the type of Dr. Sexton and "Mr. Gillespie, of Torbanchill," are in evil case when they attract the notice of such as Mr. St. George Stock. It would have been more satisfactory had the latter discussed the question of Force=Will with Schopenhauer instead of with Dr. Sexton. But when Mr. Stock, like many others, speaks of God as being a necessity of the heart but not of logic, we are disposed to protest against even a general proposition of this sort being put forward without any statement of what is meant by "God." As a First Cause in the temporal order of phenomena, the least philosophy puts the conception out of court. As a conscious intelligence or person, apart from universal manifestation, the idea is scarcely less unphilosophical, since the definition of universal manifestation would include every consciousness. But logic, or rather the necessity of reason, does compel us to suppose the ultimate source of manifestation, its unity, the one in the many, and the many in the one.

It seems we are not to speak disrespectfully of Mr. Gillespie, to whom Mr. Stock devotes twenty-five pages. Mr. Gillespie's demonstration of the Deity won applause from Sir William Hamilton and Lord Brougham; and Mr. Stock himself, after knocking, as we should suppose, all logical vitality out of it, describes the book as "a great service to philosophy." It may be so: we have not read it; but judging from the analysis of it in this essay, we are reminded rather of the most barren of scholastic abstractions than of the wealth of real thought which modern philosophy has brought to bear on the great subject discussed. Mr. Stock's style relieves the tedium of such considerations, but we still yawn over them as out of date and unprofitable. It is possibly the present writer's defect of intelligence that made him unable quite diligently to finish the perusal of this particular essay.

Mr. Stock's own speculative position may, perhaps, best be collected from the powerful essay on "Theism," which has already attracted public attention and criticism. Looking on the religious hypothesis first as an explanation of the physical universe, he says, "To begin with, we have no reason to suppose that there was a First Cause at all. Secondly, if there was a First Cause, we have no reason to suppose that it was mind rather than matter." Conscious rather than unconscious, we think would be a better statement of the alternative. The existence of evil is the next consideration. "The Theist will, of course, say that evil is appointed in the good providence of God for some wise end. But if all is to come right in the end, one hardly sees why it should have gone wrong in the beginning." That is the old difficulty, which was opposed by the followers of the Sankhya philosophy in India, to the existence of the Demiurgus, in almost the same terms, a thousand years ago, as the modern atheist now uses. The Vedantist cut the knot by denying original creation: the periodical re-emanations from Isvara being necessitated by antecedent causes; an explanation not available to Western theology. The truth is that what is called Atheism is in every age a testimony to the very principle which it seems to deny. "Not he is godless," says Lucretius, "who rejects the gods of the crowd, but he who accepts them." If there is a transcendent ideal seeking manifestation in human consciousness, it must first work as the negation of false or inadequate conceptions. It is only when Atheism, unable to rest in mere negation, becomes in turn its constructive, and as the substitute for the Creator offers us its hypothetical atoms, with their assumed motions and accidental directions, in explanation of the intelligence, law, and order, no less than of whatever still seems or is chaotic in the universe, that its impotence and folly are apparent. The true object of religious faith is not a conception of the understanding, though it must needs make provisional use of such conception, for faith is verily, as the Apostle taught, both evidence and substance. In the words of an American writer, "The object of worship is more than object; it pre-existed in the worshipper, and prompted the aim and the prayer."* Yet it is true that when faith loses an old home in the understanding it is, as it were, bodiless for a time. Only in the ensuing sadness and desolation are its root and necessity then still known. All this pregnant presentiment our author ascribes to the weakness of "the heart" in rebellion against the terrible logic of the reason. Yet it is in language of eloquent sympathy, which none can read without feeling that it is also the language of experience, that he describes this disconsolate moment: "It may freely be admitted that the prospect before us, when this doctrine is taken away, will at first seem a dreary one to minds trained in the tender nursery of an anthropomorphic faith, and that the substitute we are warranted in offering the emotions will appear cold and cheerless till use has taught them to find their home in it. Not at once can the change be effected; in hours of dejection and sickness the strongest spirit will crave its old support, and even if in the daylight we are content with truth, still in the night-season the heart may reach out after God, after some power more present, to help and to save them, 'the righteous and salutary law of natural selection,' till in its loneliness and despondency it is ready to join in the woman's querulous cry, 'They have taken away the Lord, and we know not where they have laid Him.'" Yet the "querulous cry" was answered by announcement of the resurrection. Will "the substitute we are warranted in offering" serve for that? Perhaps not quite, as Mr. Stock states and leaves it. "There is not a God yet, but there is one coming." "While it is absurd to say that love is the law of things, we do seem justified in declaring that love is the goal to which Nature wades through blood." "What can a belief in a Benevolent Creator mean, when put to the test, except a conviction of the ultimate triumph of good? This conviction is faith—a faith not unfounded, and full of consolation." Not unfounded if the ideal is already substantial, informing, actuating, working out a necessary manifestation in nature and in us. But the foundation is precarious in the extreme if the only reality of the ideal is placed in the future of the phenomenal and temporal order. What has been termed teleological, as contrasted with fortuitous, evolution is applicable alike to the moral and to the physical world. In both cases the inherent tendency to development can exist only on the presupposition of the "idea" which it is to express, of this idea as real, complete, and energetic from the first, and as the substance of its phenomenal manifestation. Admit the potent principle of good, omnipotent in time, but on that very condition manifest in progress, and not in consummation, and the essential verity of Theism is restored. And that is the witness of faith which the understanding—not "the heart"—personifies, and which is not finally subverted when the understanding subverts its own conception. But even that conception remains valid, in Greek, if not in modern form. For "the One," which was also "the Good" transcendent, immanent, exempt, takes on* the conscious and the personal in the second and third of the Platonic triads. In this philosophy, as its best modern exponent (Taylor) points out, "fabrication is nothing more than procession," and the Demiurgus, (himself far from supreme in the grand scale) is the "father" of the mundane Gods or "whole" souls ("Planetary" of occult philosophy?), and mediately of individual, or "partial" souls. Thus, if evil is mere negation, limitation, we see it to be inseparably incident to progressive or temporal, that is, partial manifestation, and to the sense of individuality; and so our problem becomes, not why did God produce an imperfect world, but why is there a world at all. That is the difficulty as it presents itself to the Eastern mind; and the doctrine of Maya is an answer more profoundly conceived than is commonly supposed. It is Western idealism with an important addition. The recognition that all that comes before the consciousness as "object" is phenomenal, is thoroughly established in our own philosophies; but in Indian systems Maya is sometimes actually identified with Avidya—Ignorance—and that is the clue to its meaning. For the phenomenal is not illusion till it is mistaken for the real. Nor is it the speculative correction of this mistake—mere philosophical idealism—that will suffice, though this doubtless is indispensable. The phenomenal must cease to have power over us, we must cease to dwell in it with consciousness and desire as our nature, before it really loses its character as illusion, and we can survey it as the enlightened observer on a mountain top looks down on the panorama of curling clouds, which on the plain below were his darkness and perplexity.

"Theism," says Mr. Stock, "is necessarily optimistic." This may be true of theistic theories, which are the attempts of the religious consciousness to find accommodation in the understanding; but it is so little true of the faith thus imperfectly expressed that its living action in the will implies the very reverse. It is not the creative, but the re-creative, God to which religion directs us. Nay, the favourite commonplaces of all religious teaching are not the beauty and perfection, but the vanity and "insufficiency" of "outward" things; the world and the flesh are so far from being recognised as defensible in honour of their Creator, that they are associated in spiritual estimation with the principle of evil itself. The constant ideal, union with God, if it means anything, is a return to the deepest subjectivity, for which the phenomenal world has no practical existence. As regards the latter, it would be more correct to say that pessimism is the religious, than that optimism is the theistic assumption.

It is, however, less with the subjective truth of religion than with its intellectual presentations that Mr. Stock is concerned in this essay. The fine and eloquent passage—too long to quote—with which it concludes, introduces us to his conception of Spiritualism as the religion of the future. We have done, he thinks, with Christianity, with Theism itself. As political progress tends to democracy, so the corresponding spiritual movement will emphasise the solidarity and brotherhood of man, but * This expression must serve here, though it is not a correct statement of the delicate process as exhibited in the Parmenides. It is deplorable that the Platonic theology is not now studied by the light of the Hegelian philosophy. Dr. Hutchison Stirling ("Secret of Hegel") has recognised the connection. Indeed, it is only necessary to quote the following passage from Thomas Taylor's Introduction to his translation of the Parmenides (1793, before Hegel had been heard of as an author), to make that connection immediately apparent: "For the intelligible, as we have already observed, must hold the first rank, and must consist of being, life, and intellect: i.e., must abide, proceed, and return; at the same time that it is characterized, or subsists principally, according to permanent being. But in the next place, that which is both intelligible and intellectual succeeds, which must likewise be triple, but must principally subsist according to life or intelligence. And in the third place the intellectual order must succeed which is triply consorted." But why remark on Taylor's priority to Hegel, when we have in Proclus, if not quite intelligibly in Plato himself, the whole process unfolded in concrete richness, which in the German philosopher appears rather as a logical skeleton?

* Perhaps we may rejoice to find a worthy successor in the eminent and accomplished American Platonist, Professor Wilder.

will suppress the Divine pateroity. There may be some who will consider the analogy of nature a safer guide to transcendental truth than the transient phases of social institutions. It is the conception of the State, and not of the mob, that gives dignity to democracy. It is well to demolish our idols, but it is better to substantiate our ideals. To reduce these to nominal abstractions, to deny their hypostasis, is to disbelieve in spirit, whose static manifestation, or logos, alone is "personal."

The consideration of the claims of Spiritualism, as set forth by Mr. Stock, and other topics comprised in this volume, must be reserved for a second article. C. C. M.

SPIRITUALISM AND THE RUSSIAN PRESS.

(From a letter in the Revue Spirite by Count Stecki.)

It is well-known that there are many earnest disciples of Spiritualism in high society in Russia. It is equally well-known that to the majority of the upper classes it is a subject of indifference, if not of dislike, from its being misunderstood. The Government being despotic must have the Press under subjection of a censorship. This censorship is in two departments, the civil and the ecclesiastical. From the latter, Spiritualism has always met with open hostility. The civil department is tolerant of foreign literature, even spiritualist, but it does not allow translations into Russian of some works; the ecclesiastical will not allow any translations of spiritualist books. Original writings in favour of Spiritualism have always been under ban.

Some years ago my late friend, General Boltine, wrote a letter in answer to one full of misrepresentations, which appeared in one of our leading journals. Before his answer could be inserted it had to pass the censorship. It came back to him prohibited under the seal of the "Holy Synod," on the grounds that it questioned dogmas of "Holy Church" in respect of the devil and everlasting damnation, and favoured the doctrines of one Allan Kardec. The writer was advised to address himself to his proper father confessor instead of the public Press.

I also had my experience. A pamphlet, published in St. Petersburg, marked by perversion of facts, provoked me to writing one in reply. The ecclesiastical censorship refused leave to publish it for reasons assigned, which I hoped to be able to set aside at a personal hearing. This hearing I obtained through the intervention of one in an influential quarter. I explained that my pamphlet was merely a criticism without the presentation of positive views of my own. I was listened to and then politely told that the office had established a rule not to allow authors who wrote against Spiritualism to be criticised.

This was subsequent to General Boltine's experience and occurred ten years ago. Imagine, then, my surprise, when I—residing now in my province—entering a bookseller's in its capital town, saw on the counter a little book by Bonnihoff, "What is Spiritualism?" in Russian, with the imprint St. Petersburg, 1882! and announcing in a preface that similar little works on the subject are to follow. He refers in it to larger works in foreign languages, among them to R. Dale Owen's, now translated and published in Russian!

It is clear that some influences, unknown to us, are being—doubtless in the order of Providence—brought to bear to set the Press of this part of the world free.

Twenty years ago, General Boltine translated into Russian the two chief works of Allan Kardec. As he was not permitted to publish them, he used to lend them to those who did not know French. I look forward now to their being printed. There are so many Spiritualists in the provinces that a large edition would soon be taken up.

MRS. FLETCHER.—Miller's Psychometric Circular (New York) says:—"Mrs. Willis Fletcher, whose illness has excited so deep an interest and solicitude in all circles where Spiritualism is known, has not improved since our last. All that her medical attendant or her nearest friends can say of her is that she still remains on the border line, hovering between life and death. Mrs. Fletcher has completed 'Twelve Months in an English Prison,' which will be issued at an early date, in which will be found a graphic account of the marvellous manifestations that have occurred through her mediumship during her eventful life."

INSPIRATION.—By the study of a certain class of psychical facts we may learn that we receive ideas from the spiritual world; that much of what we take to be the result of intellectual application and cogitation is due to sympathetic co-operation from the other side of the veil.—L. de Montaut.

* Dr. Tillotson, in his argument against the Real Presence. That argument, which asserts the superior evidences of the senses even to express revelation, was as fallacious in its application as Hume's. For according to the scholastic metaphysics of the Church of Rome, transubstantiation does not involve a change in the "accidents" or sensible qualities.

* "Oriental Religions, and their Relation to Universal Religion." By Samuel Johnson. (Trübner, 1873.)—A work of much literary and philosophical merit, which deserves to be better known in this country than perhaps it is.

LETTER FROM AMERICA.

I am a seeker after truth first and I am a Spiritualist next, and I am a very firm one too, because a truth-seeker. It is a very pleasant thought to me in these latter days, after a quarter of a century of experience in and with the spiritual manifestations, to see the collateral proof of what I have experienced and am experiencing, coming into light from so many unexpected and religious and social sources. Every now and then some one whose conversion was hardly to have been expected from his having sincerely at the testimony of earlier believers, becomes convinced of the fact that the manifestations are realities and are what they claim to be. Often some of these late converts say, "Now, the world can't help believing, for I know it to be so!" They will soon find, as we earlier ones have found, that modern Spiritualism is a matter of experience and not yet a matter of argument, so slowly does a new light permeate the atmosphere of old established thought.

I sometimes thoughtfully sit in my easy chair, or at the writing table in my library, and feel happy to think that I was one of the early birds, and thus have enjoyed my worm. I have sometimes wondered, during some lean period—for I have had lean periods—or when frauds abounded—for, unfortunately, there have been frauds, and very likely on both sides of the line—if I would not have fallen from grace, so to speak, but for epochs from time to time occurring in my experience, which proved that I still rested on the truth. I guess, however, that I should have stuck, even if, like Saul, I had lost my connection, and found no open vision, for when at first convinced I saw it was not only true, but, what was fully as important to me, I felt that it ought to be true, and creation would have lacked the finishing touch if the spirit did not survive the body. But who cares anything for my cogitations? especially when I have said what few can deny, that the subject is, or seems to be, wholly a matter of experience and not a matter of argument.

An occurrence in my domestic life was a great advantage to me and mine, and I can never be too thankful for it. I often wonder why I should have been so favoured, and I have good reason to think the fact was a spiritual movement, the divinity "shaping my ends." The occurrence referred to was the introduction into my family of a young girl, as a wet nurse, who lived with me in that capacity for near two years. She proved to be the most remarkable medium that I ever met. I did not then know she was a medium, or the meaning of the word medium, and when the manifestations began, or attracted my attention, she was not aware that she had any influence in them. To give even a statement of the various forms or phases of manifestations would occupy too much of your space, but no one can imagine how much the experience I had with this young woman, of the name of Anne, educated me on this interesting subject, and though I may never write out in detail this episode in my life, it has become a part of my intellectual being in spiritualistic matters, and so finds expression in my articles which have so frequently appeared in spiritual papers, at least, in this part of the world.

Perhaps, with the foregoing as an introduction, it might interest some if I narrate an incident that opened up the fact of Anne's mediumship, which led to so much satisfaction and instruction for a year or two afterwards. I am sorry to say intemperance shortened her life, she dying a few months after leaving our home.

One afternoon there was a row in our kitchen, and going to the door to see what it all meant, it opened, and Anne rushed in, and a rolling followed, thrown up the stairs from below. I went down and found a very mad cook, who was going to leave unless Anne did, as she would not live in the house with her. She said Anne had several times given the table a shove on which she was working, to her great annoyance; and then had denied doing it. At this time she was mixing bread on the board on it, and the shove almost knocked the batch on to the floor. Anne not only denied it, but gave her the lie, and she would not stand it. I smoothed the matter as well as I could, telling the cook that the little baby would starve if I sent Anne away, and she must put up with her as we had to. I touched her feelings and made peace, but requested Anne to keep upstairs and out of the kitchen, and her cocoa should be sent up to her, &c. I, of course, thought Anne, as was the fact, was the source of the trouble.

About a week after this, as I returned home one evening, I found my wife quite frightened, and she said she never wanted to be left alone at home again. It seems the table at which Mrs. W. and Anne were sitting sewing, moved and almost upset the kerosine lamp standing on it, and Anne being chocked for her carelessness, said in an impudent manner that she did not do it. The table kept moving and cook was called up, which made matters worse, and there was no cessation till the latter said a charm, thus: "In the name of Christ, stop!" she making a cross, and then everything was quiet. I should say at this time that Anne was a little in liquor; she would now and then get it somehow, and when so conditioned, her manifestations were treble in power, but that is not the point now.

When I saw the state of the case on my return that evening, I sat with Anne at the table and found her to be a rapping and tipping medium. I had to explain it to her. She did not suppose at first she was concerned in it. She said she was not a Spiritualist, but she was a Catholic, evidently not knowing the import or meaning of the word.

At a convenient time after this first sitting, I took Anne into the kitchen, and told the cook to go to the table and stand in the same position she occupied when she and Anne had their quarrel, and Anne to take her position, which she did, at the end of the table. The hands or arms of both were then on the table, and I said, "If any spirits are here, I wish they would move the table," and immediately, enough to startle us all, this large pine, unpainted table leaped two feet. Thus was explained our row in the kitchen, which by this explanation led to very pleasant results in the many months that followed.

This to be sure is not a very high-toned or dignified story to tell, and to some it may seem derogatory to the character of departed spirits. I learned, however, that Peter and Andrew, the husband and father of Anne, though spirits, were very low fellows here, and equally low on the other side, but they made an entrance for many of my own near and dear ones to come, and the manifestations were clearly characteristic of the social and intellectual position of the two classes of spirits as measured by their earthly standard; and then again, including both classes, the source, and not the phenomena, is the point of chief interest. Crabs and scorpions, you know, become sublime when hung up as signs of the zodiac. I have looked at all spiritual manifestations as signs in the zodiac, not to measure stellar distances or starry objects, but to connect us with the nearest world to this—the spirit-world.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON &amp; THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL, 14, NEWMAN STREET, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

The subject of the lecture at this hall, on Sunday evening last—"Humanity: its Resurrection,"—as expounded by the guides of Mr. Morse, was in the nature of a sustained and glowing peroration of the series, whose earlier divisions upon the Birth, Life, and Death of Humanity have been, by the kindness of the editor, already reported at some length in this column. The human body is not in question; the associated spiritual body is not specifically in question. What a mass of distressing controversy is thus avoided. The glorious theme is simply the restoration and amplification of the Divine qualities in man. These qualities constitute Humanity; their renewal and development its resurrection—or, in the sense of the first lecture, its worthier birth. There is a symmetry and compactness and vigour of thought, blended with a delicate but pronounced vein of spirituality, throughout these discourses which, outside of possible differences of opinion upon the facts, cannot fail to invigorate the mind, sustain the heart, and brighten the life. On this occasion we were invited to bestow one last regretful glance upon the dead form of Humanity, so pathetically exhibited on the preceding Sunday by the portrayed arrest or decay of the Divine principles of our being, and were again reminded that among the prominent sources of that disaster were Ignorance, Superstition, and that aggravated form of Selfishness—the Shibboleth of the day—which tramples upon all claims found in conflict with personal greed of wealth, or place, or power. If, perchance, this apparently miserable relic of Humanity does, in however feeble a degree, retain always the capacity to renew or re-awaken the vital spark, in what direction are we to look for the necessary agencies of resurrection? It is painfully evident that it would be worse than useless to appeal to present social, intellectual, or moral conditions, for there is so little to approve in any of these, already responsible for arrest of life, that we are even denied the poor consolation, often pressed upon us, of making "the best of things as they are," precisely because, in their essence and influence alike, they are so utterly and radically vicious as to be insusceptible of beneficial use or application. Indeed a process of elimination of these conditions must take precedence of other action before the inherent recuperative powers of the unquestionably good qualities of the abstract Humanity can find room for active and fruitful operation; before we can talk of the cultivation of agencies which tend towards, and harmonise with, the unfoldment of the higher inner qualities of our nature. Each living soul has to be convinced of the dignity of its own selfhood, and that out of its own innate resources must come the necessary force for the restoration of life. The need of the situation, then, is to be expressed by one little word, abused, misunderstood, and commonly underestimated, it may be, but daily and happily becoming a more powerful factor for good—Education. Not an education which consists in supplying tools of which the use is unexplained, but that slow and methodical process of educing from the very nature of every man and woman every quality of which that nature can give expression, for so surely as the universe contains within itself the needful resources for the exhibition of its phenomena, so does the soul of man for every greatness it exhibits. And the education, thus initiated, must cover the morality, science, and religion of the world. When, however, the problem is seriously and earnestly approached, in this exhaustive way, there face you, with intensified bitterness, the formidable external dangers variously disguised as vested interests. One has such an interest, or alleges that he has, in the management of your soul; another in the trimming to conventional pattern of your intellect; a third regulates social morals and can only be disregarded at the risk of a threatened disintegrating pollution of the very sources of gregarious life; and each cries aloud with the intensity of apprehension of loss of personal emoluments. We charge you nevertheless to recognise and reverence the higher instincts of your nature; cultivate, nourish—in a word, educate—them; for so long as they are practically neglected, or, while truly dishonoured, are only superficially acknowledged, so long does the pale form of outraged Humanity remain upon its bier, so long shall its resurrection be delayed; but once introduce a personal education of the searching character suggested, and there shall promptly ensue an encouraging evidence of renewal of life—feeble, it may be, in its earlier effects, gentle as the operation of a ray of light in the still evening air upon the palpitating leaf, when even the insect throbs and moves not, but there is a perceptible quiver in the previously rigid limbs, and the eyes open, if languidly, yet brightly and hopefully, as stars asserting their gradually unfolding powers under Heaven's departing daylight. Then the chamber of death grows luminous, the so-recent dead, erstwhile denied the living sunlight, arises from its icebound sleep, and the consciousness of erect and triumphant selfhood signalises the glorious restoration of the godlike capacity which can never die. That true and earnest and soulful reverence for self—the form of selfishness as previously applauded, guaranteeing regard for other selves, asserting the Fatherhood of God for all, and constraining to good deeds worthy of such parentage—is awakened anew, and the real and abiding resurrection is at hand. Education, then, must be applied to the whole being, to the moral, the intellectual, and the spiritual departments of life equally. Moral progress should reflect every endearing sentiment which binds Humanity in worlds, in families, and kinship, and the prime causes of crime should be investigated, and diligent and persistent efforts made to remove them, when the contrasting weakness of mere punishment will become increasingly apparent, and be rightly discredited. Morality is not reached by the simple and vicarious process of punishing immorality, and the assertion of this principle must not be confined to the study, but proclaimed from the house-tops. Let the intellect also be perseveringly cultivated—educated—for the more a man knows of himself, and of natural laws; the more he is trained, to the nature of his understanding, to think for himself, and then and thence resolves his knowledge into the practical direction of life—the better must it be for the community, the better for the resurrection of Humanity. In a word, intellectual progress means the capacity to use knowledge, and its ready application to the redress of wrong. Upon religion, let it be said, without controversy upon sectarian pretensions, that that alone is good, and true, and ennobling, which brings Humanity into intimate relations with its God. In its innermost meaning religion concerns the conscience of every human being, and must find its response in the individual nature; one God, one heritage, one Divine character in man, under laws absolute and complete in every department of existence. To acknowledge this thoroughly is to interpret the Divine beneficence rightly. The religion of the future will be something more than belief, and will be built up upon the assurance of knowledge. The grand and culminating truth of immortality has been brought home convincingly to the human conscience, because mortal man, under exceptional conditions—or rather under exceptional manifestation of conditions—has penetrated the veil, and then spoken of that which he has truly and really seen. When the resurrection of Humanity is fully achieved, as it will be when all its faculties are fully developed, this otherwise exceptional privilege shall be found to be the common inheritance of man, for we do not hesitate to affirm to you that the day will come when every individual representative of Humanity shall discover his power to intromit his spiritual self into the higher spheres, and learn and know, with the assurance of personal experience, of the bright and brilliant future of the developed Humanity. The religion of the future, then, must educe the spiritual faculties and forces, revive the dormant and discredited powers of human life, which shall then be found to be related to every other form of life, acknowledging God as the common parent of all. The present generation must be content to live, and toil, and struggle, and hope for this consummation, and find its prompt reward in the consciousness that Humanity is built up by the many labours of every age and people, each contributing its mite, and in the certainty that no good or kindly action ever fails of fruition. The resurrection of Humanity will be realised only as the result of grand deeds and noble purposes, the principles and essence of which are within each one of us. Mingling with the efforts of others, let us individually claim a place in the work of this revival, and in aiding the construction of an abiding temple of Humanity, honour the resurrection of the Divine qualities of man.

On Sunday, the 4th March, when the subject of the lecture will be "Spiritualism: its Dangers," every visitor to this hall will be presented with slip abstracts of the four discourses forming the "Humanity" series.—S.B.

EXETER.

As there are many persons in this city seeking and obtaining "Light" concerning their spiritual surroundings and interests, it will not be inappropriate to communicate a few particulars of our work to a paper bearing that title. Our one object is to spread a knowledge of Spiritualism, its facts, revelations, and teachings, and to unite all seekers after truth for spiritual communion, and the development of mediumship, which is the one basis of intercourse between the two worlds. Hence we have, as the result of systematic and persistent effort, a growing, promising spiritual church, with a centre of operations close to the Cathedral. Our church is, of course, but an infant as yet, requiring careful nursing and constant attention; but it gives evidence of remarkable vitality and energy. The following are some particulars of last week's work.

MONDAY EVENING.—Thirteen present. After devotional exercises by the writer, the circle was arranged by the guides of Miss T. This lady is an excellent physical medium, and renders invaluable assistance in the circles by arranging the sitters and magnetising the mediums. Two new sitters at this circle were powerfully influenced; they give promise of becoming good mediums.

TUESDAY EVENING.—Select circle. Eight present. Miss G. is being rapidly developed as a speaker, and Mr. White deeply entranced is clairvoyant, and describes some of the spirits around.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.—Newton St. Cyrs.—Nine present. The writer gave an address on "The Importance of Moral and Spiritual Culture as a Qualification for Mediumship." The guides of Mrs. C. also gave an address.

THURSDAY EVENING.—Select circle. Ten present. This was a highly spiritual meeting, and there were five mediums different stages of development, all being in harmony.

FRIDAY EVENING.—General meeting. Fourteen present. The whole evening was occupied with devotional exercises and teaching, conducted by the writer.

The Sunday meetings at the Hall, morning and evening, were exceedingly good, and several mediums took part in the proceedings. OMEGA.

PALMOUTH.

Mr. E. W. Wallis, the inspirational speaker, has recently paid a visit to this town, his public labours extending from February 11th to 18th inclusive. During his stay he discoursed upon the following topics:—"The Gospel of Glad Tidings and the Gospel of Spiritualism;" "Man's Three Saviours;" "The Temperance Movement;" "Is Spiritualism Lawful and Right?" "Sin: Its Cause and Cure;" "Man's Double Duty, to Gain the World and Save His Soul;" "The Religion of Knowledge: Its Benefits;" and "The Reality of Spirit-Life." The audiences were excellent and appreciative, and listened with great attention to the lectures, which, with the answers to questions put at the close of the week-night meetings, seemed to afford great satisfaction. The Rev. Mr. Douglas, who has frequently taken a very active part against the cause here, has at last been obliged to seek a new field for his labours. The cause has taken firmer root as a consequence of his opposition in the past.—R.G.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—On Sunday evening last Mr. Mahoney addressed the friends at Newcastle on "Spiritualism: its Relationship to Politics, Science, and Religion." The lecturer handled his subject in the able and terse manner so characteristic of him as a speaker. Mr. Thompson, the president, occupied the chair. The next two weeks, March 4th, 5th, 11th, and 12th. Mrs. E. W. Wallis, of Nottingham, will occupy the Newcastle platform. We hope our friends in the two boroughs will rally round and give her a hearty welcome on this her first visit to the North in the capacity of a public lecturer.

GATESHEAD.—Last Sunday evening the president of the Gateshead Society, Mr. H. Burton, lectured to the friends in Gateshead. Commencing his lecture with the intimation that Mr. Jno. Walton, one of the first vice-presidents of the Society, had during the last week, after a protracted and severe illness, passed on to the higher life, he stated that in consequence of this, although he had intended to address them upon some other theme, he would speak to them on "Death and the Future Life." The lecturer having noticed in a few appropriate remarks the event just spoken of, passed on to the consideration of the primitive ideas of a future life; and how these had expanded until we reached the base of modern theology, yet withal how the future life was but a speculation, a belief, and how in this age with a growing materialism, and a craving for facts, we had bridged the gulf of doubt by the demonstration presented by modern Spiritualism. Mr. Bambridge occupied the chair. Next Sunday Mr. Thompson, of Shildon, will lecture, and on Easter Monday the annual tea and concert will be held in the large hall.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Party, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning, Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübke, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H.I.H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H.S.H. the Prince of Solms; H.S.H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H.S.H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavaire, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unsparingly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism and also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER, AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Party, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

It has been raining very hard of late, and, as a sad consequence, agricultural interests have suffered. The Bishop of St. Albans has been moved, very properly from his point of view, to request his people to join in prayer that the "plague of rain and waters" may cease. There will be difference of opinion as to the effect of these well-intentioned prayers, but none as to the spirit which prompts them. A slender acquaintance with, and recognition of, the action of natural law is not incompatible with a pious desire to remove a cause of national distress. But the Bishop's arguments are the odd part of his utterance. "We cannot doubt," his lordship says, "that our sins have brought these sorrows and distresses upon us. We thought vainly a few years since that we could double the productiveness of the earth by our skill and contrivance. We had become vain in our imaginations, and our foolish heart was darkened. We forgot—indeed, many among us do openly deny—that it was He, the Living God, who gave us rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with joy and gladness. So He hath withdrawn from us the fertilising warmth of sunshine and hath sent upon us a plague of immoderate rain and waters. . . . I trust that all godly people will entreat the Lord while He may be found." Now what would be thought of such an argument as this if applied to ordinary events? We have done all we can, says the Bishop, to increase the productiveness of our land. Patent manures, and high farming have done this; surely a beneficent work! But no! we meddled with the special work of God, and He has revenged Himself by all this rain. Let us abandon our steam ploughs, and our patent manures (why not our spades, and bush-harrows too?), and revert to the principles of the primitive savage, and his medicine man! It is hard not to smile, it is impossible not to marvel, at this latest episcopal utterance. How hard must it be for minds, so constituted and trained, to receive ideas which would brush away all that crude conception of God and His dealings, of nature and her laws, as a broom sweeps a cobweb from some dark corner into which daylight has not penetrated! Our intelligent attempts to make the best of our land have provoked God, as the Babel architects once before provoked Him, and He has, therefore, rained on us, to shew us that we ought to have sat still and left the land alone. And so we are to stop and pray to Him "while He may be found," for, apparently, there is a time when the rain must go on in spite of us, and then we shall be drowned. Alas! alas! a strange study of Divine methods and human duty!

W. Emmette Coleman, whose writings are always thoughtful and suggestive, contributes to the Index (Boston U.S.A.) a review of a series of discourses on "The Gospel of Law," by S. J. Stewart, of Boston. The Bishop of St. Albans would, I fear, regard Mr. Coleman as one who imports a dangerous amount of mere human common sense into his religion. He is an apostle of progress, of development, and of growth. He thinks that the "last fifty years mark an important epoch in the world's religious development," chiefly on account of the application of the scientific method in "determining the genesis, growth, and decadence of the theological faiths of humanity." He speaks of comparative theology as "a sister science to comparative mythology, and comparative philology"; and—but I forbear! The essay is excellent, and will bear both perusal and elaboration. Many of its points are extremely suggestive; and the writer makes a manly protest against the crude and ignorant and often coarse and blasphemous nonsense which issues from the infidel press. Such crudities influence no one, except perhaps to repel him. But such works as that under review are well calculated to present truth in a simple garb, and to assail with effect such sophistries as those of the good Bishop of St. Albans.

Another shock to the episcopal views! "What is Religion?" is a pamphlet of the kind that Mr. Coleman desiderates. It is an outspoken but by no means irreverent or offensive vindication of freedom of thought in reference even to the most sacred subjects. The tenor of the writer's arguments may be gathered from one of his conclusions. "Speaking generally, our highest good consists in that healthy and harmonious development of the intellectual, moral, and physical faculties which best fits us for the duties and enjoyments of life." This life, he contends, is a life of action and of energy, and the man who is "up and doing, with a heart for any fate," cultivating his own spiritual and physical gifts, benefiting his fellows, adding to the store of human happiness and knowledge, is more to be commended than "those highly praised agnostic thinkers, who look back to 'those things which are behind,' instead of 'reaching forward to those things which are before,' and who cast, wistfully regretful glances on what they deem 'a creed outworn,' instead of filling eyes and heart with the glory of ascertained truth." There has always seemed to me a lack of robustness in much of the religious thought of the age, which is not inconsistent with its rather formless and gelatinous aestheticism in art, and its dilettante dawdling and half-hearted dabbling in things that need other and more vigorous treatment. Sad and sorrowful retrospect is rather the note of an age that loves its sage greens and Whistler yellows, and that can with difficulty brace itself up to a sustained interest in anything. C.N.'s views of religion may act as a useful tonic to the younger dawdlers of this type for whom life is already too terrible, and who see its hollowness and emptiness all around them, the saddening reflection of their own inward spirit. If they can exorcise that spirit they will find the truth of the Berkeleyan maxim, that the external universe is but the reflection of our own mental state: and such thoughts as C.N.'s, if they can only nerve themselves to read them, may lead to higher and nobler views of life and duty.

"Are supernatural matters worthy of scientific research?" is a question that has been vexing the Penzance Debating

* "What is Religion?" By C.N., Annotated by Dr. R. Lewis. London: W. Stewart and Co.

Society. The Rev. W. Lach-Szyrma, vicar of Newlyn, thinks they are. One Mr. Doble thinks not, for reasons which he was rash enough to give:—"First, on the ground that scientific laws excluded a whole order of these phenomena simply by the nature of things—that the phenomena were found in flat contradiction to scientific laws, and must, therefore, be rejected; and secondly, on the ground that the rest of the phenomena—whether they were true or not did not matter—belonged to the sphere of the human mind, and the human mind was altogether beyond the pale of scientific examination." Another gentleman produced "The Confessions of a Medium"; some statements in which his intelligence caused him at once to "stamp as a lie." Then the Northumberland House Lion, and its wagging tail, a venerable jest, was once more trotted out; and some very foolish stories appear to have been told. In the end, Psychical Research triumphed by more than two to one; and the London Society may consider that it has Western sanction on its work. Perhaps the Penzance Debating Society is limited to talk, and it is hard to blame it for fulfilling its mission. But can it not set to work as the London Dialectical Society did, and collect facts, if only to shew Mr. Doble that his ideas about scientific laws, and his knowledge of their action, are susceptible of improvement? No amount of talk will touch him, but a few facts might possibly set him thinking and change the current of his ideas.

Dr. Bell's is a quaint old book,* interesting in the extreme to those who desire to look back from the experiments of to-day to times long past, when similar investigations were being made. There is nothing new under the sun, and here we have an experiment which, when Slade made it, was thought to be new. He influenced a magnet by making passes over the glass which shut it in its case. Others have since done the same. Here, however, we have a record which shews that the thing was done nearly a century ago. "Mrs. H., an Irish lady, in London, did, in 1786, before many ladies and gentlemen, move the needle of the compass by approaching her thumb to it."

Nor is thought-transference a new thing. In the same book I find a case of some ladies and gentlemen who had agreed to fix their minds on some subject, and who then went to a somnambule, and asked her what they had thought? "She said she had answered them in their own language (i.e., mentally), it was a pity they did not understand her: but she asked for a pen and ink, and wrote what they had thought. This phenomenon is very common." "Of this (says quaint old Dr. Bell) we must content ourselves with admiring the wonderful effects of nature: that condition, which Providence seems to present to the learned in order to confound them, and shew the narrow compass of human understanding!"

Again, the luminous appearance presented to the clairvoyant by magnets and magnetised objects, as well as by the hands of the mesmeriser, was observed by the same Dr. Bell. He says, "In Dublin I put a nobleman asleep before several of his friends. After he was awake we caused the room to be made dark. I shewed him a glass conductor (previously magnetised) which to him appeared very luminous, like an electric spiral tube. He also saw my hand all luminous. I rubbed the nose of a gentleman present, which he saw luminous! I also rubbed one of his fingers from the basis to the end, which he distinguished from the rest by its luminous appearance. These experiments never fail; as has been proved by many." Various other instances are given. Dr. Bell believed that sensitives in a dark room not only saw "sparks of fire issuing out of the fingers, but also a luminous vapour flying all around the body (of the mesmeriser) like phosphorus." This is that luminous vapour which so many observers see at dark seances, which was successfully photographed by Mr. Beattie, at Clifton, which probably is the material of the invisible forms photographed by Hudson, Mumler, and others, and which is finally solidified into the "materialised form," respecting which we hear and see so much and know so little. At the time when I was a regular attendant at seances, I could not only see this luminous cloud reaching from the table to the ceiling, but could by its movements, and by the motion of similar floating masses outside the circle, tell in what direction some manifestation—audible or visible, or palpable to some sense—might be expected.

I have received a copy of "A book written by the spirits of the so-called dead with their own materialised hands by the process of independent slate-writing: Compiled by C. G. Helleberg, Cincinnati, 1883." It is hard to treat seriously the communications contained in this volume. The method by which they were given places them in the category of communications given abnormally by spirits, for they were, it is stated, obtained within closed slates by the process of psychography, or independent writing. But when we come to consider what manner of spirits they can be who can have indited these messages, it must be confessed that the opinion of the Swedenborgian Minister on some that are subscribed by the name of Swedenborg is much to the point. "I have no doubt in the world" (writes the Rev. John Goddard, acknowledging Mr. Helleberg's letter) "that there is such a thing as communication with spirits . . . nor have I any doubt whatever that they are a very low order of spirits, and scarcely ever those whom they personate. It is clear that Swedenborg never sent any such communications as these. To believe otherwise would be to believe that intelligent men in the other world lose their wits instead of increasing in wisdom." Beside the Swedenborg messages—an outrage on a great man's name—much of the book is taken up with an account of a wedding in spirit-life, with minute descriptions of the dress of bride and bridegroom, and their various attendants. It is gravely printed that "our son Emil, the bridegroom, had knee-breeches of royal purple, with a beautiful white toga frosted with gold, and gold tassels and a purple and gold crown set with diamonds!" The honeymoon was spent in Mars, where the wedding party arrived in time to see "a party of excursionists on a visit to our planet earth!" There is no evidence that the book is an elaborate joke. Indeed the photograph of the author shews a face of mild and simple enthusiasm which speaks volumes for his credulity, but does not lead us to put much faith in his power of seeing a joke. A very small sense of the ludicrous should have protected him from making of Spiritualism and his own faith a mere laughing-stock. Not the least regrettable fact in connection with Spiritualism is the mass of literature that issues from the press, calculated only to bring ridicule and contempt on a truth that has suffered many things from many men, but most of all from its too credulous and enthusiastic devotees.

THE CURE OF DIABETES. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I beg through you to thank Dr. Wyld and M. Adolphe Didier for their kind attention to my question concerning diabetes. I have also to acknowledge the receipt of a card sent through you from Paris.

I am glad to find that the disease in question is, as I expected to find, to some considerable extent amenable to vital treatment.

In return for Dr. Wyld's courtesy, I may remark that I have found that wonderful drug, the salicylate of soda, useful in the case referred to. In conclusion, I must express my individual satisfaction at the tone of the "Notes" by "M.A. (Oxon.)" on the subject of vital treatment, which meet the facts of so many cases in a way to which no medical man who loves the truth need object.—I remain, sir, your obedient servant, 3rd March, 1883.

"ATTEMPTS AT TRUTH."

By St. George Stock.

Mr. Stock rests the claim of Spiritualism to be regarded as a religion upon the fact that it has established a belief concerning man's future after physical death by direct evidence from "the other side." Now on this it must be remarked that Spiritualism does not herein supersede or conflict with the old religion, as Mr. Stock seems to suppose, for the reason, strange as it may sound at first, that the old religion gives us no information whatever on the subject. Christianity, like the higher Buddhism, concerns itself exclusively with the conditions of the Divine or regenerate life—salvation. It is the fact that there is not in it, as there is in Buddhism, a lower or supplementary doctrine of the future life—as the mere natural sequence of the present—and that as to this the Gospels and Church traditions contain no distinct intimations, that has led to the preposterous error which Mr. Stock adverts to as if it belonged to the religion itself. The doctrine of the Divine, or blessed, life has been mistaken for a doctrine of the future life. And so our present little life had to be regarded as the critical moment of eternity for each of us, and all mankind had to be divided, just as they happened to be at death, into two great classes of the saved and the damned. Mr. Stock thus illustrates the ludicrous consequence. "Let us suppose, for instance, that Mrs. Brown is dead. What becomes of her soul? Here below she was an honest old creature enough. She had her faults, of course, and was horribly vulgar, and, withal, intensely unspiritual. Is she to effloresce at once into a spotless angel? It is the only supposition our feelings will admit." Brahminism and Buddhism make provision for Mrs. Brown, or at all events for Mrs. Brown's Karma; but Christianity makes none. It is an extraordinary omission, perhaps; but not more extraordinary than the fact, to which Mr. Stock refers, that Judaism, during all its earlier history, had a doctrine of God without any doctrine of immortality whatever. There have been plenty of speculations in the Church about the "intermediate state," but they are speculations only, and have never crystallised into dogma. Now the idea that we are to go on living, or are to live again and again, does not belong to religion unless it results from, and is part of, a spiritual science revealing the whole truth about man, and shewing wherein the principle of his immortality consists. Such a doctrine is necessarily religious, because it establishes the dictates of conscience and of the holiest aspirations as conditions of our own essential and eternal well-being. It thus supplies the sanction which the moral philosopher of either school fails to demonstrate. But the evidence of Spiritualism at its best falls far short of such a science. Mr. Stock himself declares in the admirable essay entitled, "Materialism and Modern Spiritualism," that "the dispute between materialists and their antagonists would not be in the least decided by the triumph of modern Spiritualism." "We may well conceive spirits maintaining that the disintegration of their spirit-bodies would result in annihilation." "The materialist in our present world looks without him, and denies the existence of what others find within; and precisely the same dispute may arise on every successive plane of existence." In fact, modern Spiritualism, apart from inspirational utterances which have no evidential authority, is simply a proof of life under other corporal conditions. "The doctrine of a spirit-body—of a quasi-material envelope underlying the physical organism, and serving as the vehicle or garb of the spirit on decay of its old covering, is the great contribution of modern Spiritualism to philosophy." And though it is absurd to suppose that scientific materialism as taught in this world and in this age can survive the shock of such a proof, it is quite true that the root of the controversy is not really touched by it. Mr. Roden Noel has also been at some pains to make this evident. But religion is the doctrine of immortality, the way of release from all precarious conditions of life. Mr. Stock supplements the claim of "Spiritualism"—a misnomer we have always used reluctantly—by its recognition of moral continuity in the life hereafter, its great gospel, "birth into another sphere of existence, a sphere in which every human being is exactly that which himself and society have made him, and where his worth is measured solely by what he can bring with him beyond the tomb." But directly we have got rid of the confusion between the regenerate life and the future life, and of the supposition that Christianity is a doctrine of the latter, that idea follows as a matter of course. It does not belong to the proof, but to the very conception of a continued individual existence in which the identity is not assumed into a higher principle. John Stuart Mill put it forward as the only rational hypothesis. It belongs specially to Spiritualism because Spiritualists are the only people in the West (with the exception of a philosopher here and there) who stand between misconceived Christianity and the physical materialists. If our clergy understood their own faith, if they were not, as a rule, as ignorant of it as the congregations committed to their charge, instead of denouncing Spiritualism as a hostile power, they would define and explain its useful but subordinate function, and thus prevent pretensions which alone can make it an offence to religion. Not all Mr. Stock's eloquence—and he is sometimes very eloquent—on the magnificent prospect of moral development through the spheres of existence can discover to us the guarantee of that development, the "Power, not ourselves, that makes for Righteousness," the immanent principle of Divinity in the universe, which, logic notwithstanding, men must and will call God. The "new religion" will not do. Says an acute judge of speculative tendencies,* "the good Germans try very hard to be atheists, but they never succeed." And Mr. Stock's conscientious attempts in the same direction seem equally to fail. For does he not expressly recognise that "the real question at issue is not merely between matter, as we now understand that term, and spirit, but between the outer and the inner, between the mere external organism, whether physical or psychical, and a something unorganised, inaccessible, unknown, the spark of Deity within us, the breath of the most High God"? That is the eternal problem with which religion has to deal practically, as philosophy has to deal with it speculatively. Religion is sometimes superficially relegated to the emotional nature of man, as philosophy to his intellect. The true relation is that of Will to Thought. Religion is being, or coming to be, of that which philosophy can discern only in idea. But the will imposes on the understanding a task which the latter in vain endeavours or affects to disclaim. By its means, Religion makes religions. The Sphinx will have her riddle read. And since the spirit of a belief sinks deeply into its form, and becomes materialised therein, every process of re-solution has to encounter the charge of atheism, just as the loss of the body seems death to those who have no faith in life. The Absolute, it is true, will not be denied in favour of any concrete personality. Not, therefore, is it a barren abstraction, but the principle which in conscious manifestation, appears as love and reason, the life of all that lives. "The living and active moral order is God," says Fichte, "we need no other God, and can comprehend no other." "If it is believed that we must, in addition to the above order, think of a personal being, by whom this law was given, this order administered, still in this personal essence we must again presuppose that order, as willing, mode of action, holy power, or under any other abstract notion, and so this last would remain always the First and Highest, the Absolute, as sought and presupposed."† But as observed in our former article, the personal God which we can no longer identify as Absolute Being and First Principle, may survive for us as First Manifestation, the Logos, and also as First Distributor, the Holy Spirit. The First Cause alone, the Father, remains for ever hidden in the inscrutable mystery of being. Enough for us that His existence is necessary manifestation, restoring to us all that for the moment we seemed to lose. And so, after all the logical torment of the understanding, the still small voice of religion is heard again, re-instating her adoring formula, "the Holy, Blessed, and Glorious Trinity." But of the source and principle of our own life, and will, and reason, that microcosmic trinity in unity, "modern Spiritualism" can discover to us nothing. Be its message of conscious, personal survival ever so true, it offers no satisfaction to the highest aspirations of the soul, and is thus altogether destitute of a religious character. Nevertheless, we would not underrate what Mr. Stock well calls "the importance of the facts of Spiritualism in the science of religion," little as these can in themselves amount to such a science. The proof of inspiration, of the possibility, therefore, of revelations of truth from beings more enlightened than ourselves, is of immense value in this respect. So, also, the light thus thrown on the question of prayer, and "Special Providences." The "miracle" question, again, seems pretty well settled by this modern experience. In "The Bearings of Spiritualism," Mr. Stock brings into the compass of a few pages considerations with which every Spiritualist should be familiar who would be ready with a defence against ignorant prejudices and misconceptions. To the author, the triumph of Spiritualism seems assured, but as to its phenomenal future, he offers us three very suggestive alternatives. "It has allied itself with certain advanced opinions, and with a high conception of human life. Perchance it will succeed in establishing these on a popular basis, the perturbation of natural laws by those powers which it has fostered into abnormal activity being destined then to cease. Or, perchance these powers, now that they have been so largely called into play, will not again be remitted, but become henceforward the heritage of our race. Perchance again the lamp is already lit, which is to guide the feet of humanity through a dark era yet to come." We would suggest a fourth view, which is that modern conditions of publicity are favourable to the contagious development of influences which have been always in operation, and that suitable temperaments have more opportunities than heretofore. In one of Mr. Epes Sargent's works there is a probable theory that the great witch persecutions nearly stamped out for several generations the hereditary germs of mediumship, now recovering their natural rate of propagation. It would be rash to assume a great spiritual design in these manifestations until all such possibilities have been duly weighed.

† This latter passage is not cited in Fichte's own words, but from an excellent summary of his philosophy in Tolk's translation of Chalybaeus's "Historical Survey of Speculative Philosophy from Kant to Hegel" (Longman's, 1854), a book very little known now, but quite equal in merit to Schwegler's more celebrated work.

In a future article, attention may be called to the other essays in this volume, which are excellent specimens of philosophical criticism. We take leave of Mr. Stock for the present, not only with considerable admiration for the author, but also with feelings of personal esteem for the man who commits literary reputation and intellectual position to vindication of truth, so unpopular, so misunderstood, and so calumniated as is Spiritualism. If too much is now claimed for it, that is rather the fault of those who have denied it legitimate recognition.

GENERAL GHOST-OLGY.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—A short time since you kindly recorded phenomena witnessed by my friend Mr. W., of Old Catton, Norwich. In the course of further conversation with him he told me the following incident. In the house in which he now lives a gentleman was born, who continued to reside in it until it was taken by the family of my friend. This gentleman (whom we will call Smith) made one or two calls at the house subsequently, but although known to my friend was not intimate with him—and ultimately he passed out of sight altogether. About three years ago my friend was retiring to rest, and upon putting out his lamp, found his bedroom filled with a subdued light, and seated on a chair in the room appeared the figure of Mr. Smith, looking very pale and distressed. Mr. W. addressed the apparition, which replied, "William Edward Smith is in trouble," and gradually faded from view. What the trouble was my friend has of course never been able to gather.

One seems to be constantly coming across cases of a similar character. Reading to a friend, a few weeks since, one or two of the articles in "LIGHT," he told me the following story. On the night of July 5th, 1865, as my friend's father and mother were retiring to rest they heard three distinct sobs or moans as of a person dying. A light was obtained, and the room and passage were thoroughly searched—of course with no result. No sooner had the light been again put out than the sobs were again distinctly heard. This time the hour was noted, 10.50, my friend's mother remarking that she believed it meant that her brother was dead. The next post brought the news that her brother, David McKenzie Annison, had died at Chatham Hospital, July 5th, 1865, at 10.50 p.m. Several members of the family had been sailors, and in the case of two, who had been drowned, apparitions at the moment of death had been witnessed, on both occasions accompanied by a distinct sound of the straining of cordage and sail gear.

To-day, while looking through a most interesting old volume, "Cosmographica Universales," published at Basle, 1559, and profusely illustrated, I came across a picture of some mining operations in Germany, and in one part of the picture was a figure holding a forked divining rod, over which were the words "Virgula Divina." ## PERSONALITY AND THE UNIVERSAL MIND.

It seems pretty evident that if we consent to surrender the Personality of God, any attempt to retain Him as a Being to be loved, worshipped, and obeyed must end in simple fetishism, the idol becoming one of the imagination, if no longer of the senses, since the being who can commune with our own soul through similarity of nature and constitution is absent in either case; a test so radical as to need no further remark. The Personality of man is therefore the central starting-point of the matured religious instinct, when it has passed from what Cousin would call the chronological into the logical stage. It is easy for the positivist philosopher to say that we are now in his stage, that of the search for law, and the relegation of causes, including God Himself, to the limbo of evaporated absurdities. We want no other intuitive knowledge of Cause than that which comes with our knowledge of Self—with the simple healthy Will which is the invariable accompaniment of a healthy body. If the positivist or materialist philosopher states that he does not lift his arm, but that the sum of the forces of the universe at that instant have such a resultant, he is playing with words and trifling with a serious subject; but if he pretends not to understand what is meant by the Will being the expression of a self-acting cause, it will be necessary to descend to first principles and ask him how many men were engaged in the movement of his arm, and if he says he does not know, he is by his own definition a pathological specimen to be studied, or an object of physical research, likely to furnish valuable information of a purely biological, though no longer of a reliable metaphysical, character. If, however, he acknowledges that but one man was so engaged, since the arm forms part of but one body, he may be informed that he understands just as much about person as any living man, and that the subjective side of that one body, known by him alone to be one, furnishes him with a proximate knowledge of the fact of personality, a knowledge which forms a sufficiently broad basis for the construction of a consistent theory of spiritual causes.

It is quite true the individual man can never get outside the radius of his sphere of personality; in fact, such a supposition would involve an absurdity, since we make the term "man" to correspond with person, and not with body, which latter, taken alone, exists merely in the region of appearances, and is in itself a fact that lies no deeper than the sense surface in which it is contained; for it is in fact no more than a passive agent of expression or term to convey an idea in the language of the senses, when inspired with living force from within. But while we limit personality and its subject in reciprocal bonds we do no more than present it, body and soul, under the form of directed quantity; for we do not fix the limits of its sphere, but permit it to change its radius, and this we do for the purpose of using, after the manner of analogy, established physical principles to supply us with fruitful ideas and save us from roundabout and confusing verbiage.

If after the analogy of natural actions we define Personality as the whole of God's work to a given end, the science of quantity will supply us with the means of understanding how, from the same elemental constitution, different results may be produced, or modifications of the final expression introduced by variation of the order and position of the constituents in the fixed form of arrangement. But the completed conception of a personality expressing itself through an organism necessarily involving the due estimation of all branches of continuity in the empirical consciousness of that organism, it can only be to the looker-on that a breach takes place in the personality when the organism becomes the property of an invading spirit or assertive personality different from the proper owner and responsible ruler. We may, therefore, say with truth that, as regards the body considered as quantum, a mere formal change in the arrangement of parts may be quite sufficient to produce for us, the observers, an apparently radical change, equivalent to the possession of the body and displacement of the personality by a departed spirit. Whereas, for all we can say to the contrary, the manifestations of possession may be no more than the modified linguistic (in a generalised sense) expression, in accordance with modified possibilities of realisation of the thoughts passing between intelligent beings, i.e., the true possessor of the body and others subsumed under his unmodified personality in some inscrutable manner, the personality of the individual being as necessary a factor of interpretation as the life of the body; the appearance of possession not at all depending upon the expulsion of the owner, but upon his enchainment under imposed conditions.

This view gets over the tremendous difficulty of having to account for what becomes of the Personality when the body of the medium or possessed individual is, somehow or other, from physical peculiarities of that body, placed at the service of other spirits (to adopt the simplest hypothesis), since it employs the life and personality together to explain how communication may be established between the inhabitants of this world and the world of spirits. There is here no breach of continuity against which thought revolts, as there would be if the owner's spirit left the body and another foreign spirit took possession of it; the revolt not being against a world of spirits or other worlds, but against foolish ways of talking about them. The reader must be cautious not to impute to me the opinion that the person of the medium or possessed is morally answerable for the detailed effects of the possession, which to me is but translation; though I do hold that he is responsible when he voluntarily puts himself in danger.

Newton pointed out how the Infinite Being might feel all things and will all things through the means of "His boundless uniform sensorium," to which no localising organs are adjusted since they are not required; and similarly it seems to me that the Almighty may include in His boundless undifferentiated Personality all those souls which are His creatures and subordinate to Him, but which added up for ever could never constitute Him, since He is not quantum; a form relative to the constitution of the human intellect alone. The problem of our relation to God as organised beings naturally suggests the consideration of God as Himself organised, that is to say, as manifesting His Will and directing the Universe. It is, therefore, in establishing an identity between the forms of vital and cosmical existence that man can recognise himself as the being possessed of a double nature, related to his Creator upon the one side and to the lower order of existence on the other. Our business is to justify the attitude which embraces this belief at a glance and in one single thought, a part of ourselves, with vital relationship between its several elements; and to substitute it for the laboured system of surface relationships, which are sufficient to some minds to prove the stability and oneness of the universe to depend upon inanimate forces alone, with perhaps a vague hope of something else which they cannot understand and which they call the Unknowable.

The Personality of God with me will, therefore, mean the oneness of God after the manner of the oneness of a man, and the organism of God will mean the oneness of the universe after the analogy of the oneness of the organism which manifests the will and nature of a man. We believe in the Wisdom and Love of God; we must also believe in their union in Use, which is distinctly human, and a Subject which we can analyse by the methods appropriate to the human intelligence and which have proved themselves to be so powerful in extracting the arcana in other departments of natural knowledge.

A REVEREND "THOUGHT READER."—The Rev. E. H. Sugden has been exhibiting his powers as a "thought-reader" before a large audience at Bradford, after the fashion of Mr. Irving Bishop and Mr. Stuart Cumberland. Having been blind-folded in another room, he returned to the hall where certain objects had been hidden in his absence, and taking the hand of the hider he found the secreted articles in most cases without much difficulty. In the same way he successfully followed a chalk track that had been drawn on the floor; and correctly indicated the number of a bank-note. At the conclusion of his experiments, the rev. gentleman said the whole secret of the affair was that the thought-reader obtained a direction in space from the person whose hand he held. He followed the line of least resistance in every instance. It was necessary to push the hand of the medium first one way and then another to discover this direction, but the mind so worked upon the muscles as almost inevitably to give the required indication. The whole thing was done in the purest unconsciousness. He selected the medium's left hand in preference to the right because that hand was the most automatic.—If the rev. gentleman's object was simply to show that Mr. Irving Bishop's "thought-reading" is nothing better than a trick, we are content to leave him and Mr. Irving Bishop to settle the matter between them. If his purpose was to suggest that all thought-reading is of the same character, he had better place himself at once at the feet of the Committee of the Society for Psychical Research, from whom he may learn something that will enlighten and surprise him.

WAS IT SPIRITS?

SIR,—In your issue of November 11th, 1882, there was published a letter signed "Inquirer" respecting some untruthful communications which the writer had received from his spirit-guides respecting some young men who went to America; and, as I have something to say on the subject, you will, perhaps, permit me to re-publish the annexed extract from the letter in question:—

"Two young men in whom I was interested went to America. Nothing had been heard of them for a long time. My spirit friends, however, told me all about them. One had been killed by Indians in the Far West; the survivor went with a Robert Gordon to Australia, where both were very prosperous. Gordon, I was informed, was a native of a town in the North of Scotland, and I was favoured with his father's address and occupation. I wrote to him, and my letter was returned—'Not known.' I then applied to a bank agent on whom I could rely; but with the same result. About seven months afterwards one of the young men wrote they were both well; and it was ascertained that they had not left America, and had never heard of Robert Gordon. Four families whom I had induced to become Spiritualists were so disgusted with this imposition, as well as others, that they renounced Spiritualism as the work of the devil, and are its most bitter opponents. It appears to me that very little reliance can be placed on the truth of spirit messengers; but, notwithstanding the deceit practised upon us, we know that there is a life beyond the grave; but where it is, what it is, and indeed, of almost everything relating to it, we are in the most profound ignorance."

Now, sir, I doubt if spirits out of the body had anything to do with such a communication. I am rather of opinion that the false information proceeded from the mind of the unconscious medium; or, if it did come from disembodied spirits, that the channel of communication was so imperfect as to be utterly misleading. I do not see, however, because false information was given about the young men in America by the communicants in or out of the body, why some four families whom the writer had induced to become Spiritualists should renounce it and regard it "as the work of the devil." Surely such persons could not have made themselves acquainted with the facts and philosophy of Spiritualism before becoming converts to it, or they could not possibly have been so easily turned against it.

Whatever was the source of the intelligence from which "Inquirer" derived his information, it was plain that it either could not give correct information, or by some means was prevented from doing so. It may, however, surprise and interest "Inquirer" to know that a portion of the communication was correct. The reference to Robert Gordon, at least, was so. There was such a person as Robert Gordon, who belonged to the North of Scotland, and did proceed to Australia. This man is personally known to me, and lived with his wife and young son here in Sandhurst. He is at present in Melbourne, and is a printer by trade, and his wife and child still live here. Gordon's father was named John Gordon, and lived at Banff, and was justice of the peace there; but emigrated to Australia in June, 1850. He died in New South Wales on the 17th August, 1855. His son, Robert, paid a visit to his relations in the North of Scotland in 1877, returning to Australia again in January, 1880, by the Northumberland. These are facts for which I can vouch, being thoroughly conversant with them. So "Inquirer" will perceive that from whatever source the communication came, the Robert Gordon referred to in it was no myth. I may add that his grandfather's name was Robert Gordon, and that he lived at a place in the North of Scotland called Croughly. My unknown friend will also perceive why Robert's father was unknown at the address given, having been absent from it for so many years.

I am a Spiritualist who does not believe in every communication received from entranced mediums coming from spirits. I think it very probable spirits out of the body have nothing to do with many of them. And if the mediums through whom some of these come are not test mediums for such messages, ten to one but that what is so received will prove, on being put to the test, unreliable.

There is no evidence, however, to prove that spirits out of the body are responsible for such deceiving messages; and until we know more of the laws controlling such communication, we should not rashly sit in judgment or jump at conclusions which a greater knowledge of these occult forces of nature might prove to be erroneous.

With compliments to your correspondent and yourself,—I am, dear sir, yours most respectfully,
W. D. C. DENOVAN.

A HAUNTED HOUSE.

The following narrative of personal experiences in a haunted house has been contributed by a clergyman, who may be confidently relied upon for the strict accuracy of his interesting record. He does not wish his name to be made public, but he has kindly consented that it should be given to any inquirer who is seriously interested in the investigation of occurrences of the character described.

I have been asked to furnish some account of my experiences in a haunted house, which occurred some twenty years ago.

My father was a private schoolmaster, and in my tenth year his school outgrew the accommodation which the house we then lived in afforded. A friend, who was the non-resident lessee of a large, commodious house, some eight miles away, made him an offer of this dwelling, capable of accommodating nearly sixty persons, at the suspiciously low rental of twenty pounds a-year. The reason was easy to find—it was reported to be haunted!

Tall trees environed it on every side, and the gardens were like a wilderness, so neglected had the place been for years. It was three storeys in height, spacious, with a flat, leaded roof, whence one could look down upon the country through the trees. There was an abundance of out-houses in a somewhat ruinous condition. The carriage-way had become a damp lane, sometimes flooded in winter. But the building itself was sound—its walls very thick. A tragedy had taken place therein nearly half a century before the date of which I write. A captain in his Majesty's navy had lived there with an amiable young wife, to whom he was unfaithful to such an extent that, disguising his marriage, he made an offer to another young lady, and was on the point of committing bigamy. Indeed, the marriage ceremony had actually begun, when the injured wife appeared on the scene and forbade its completion. He ran away; she returned home, and in her distress hung herself in a room at the extreme angle of the top storey of the house.

The unhappy wife lies buried in a neighbouring churchyard with the following epitaph:—

Reader! if thou hast a heart framed for pity

Contemplate this spot,

Where lie the remains of one whose artless simplicity

Gained for her the esteem of all who knew her;

But whose nerves were too delicately strung to bear

The rude jostlings we must meet in this transitory world.

She died a martyr to excessive sensibility.

Mrs. S—F—

Died in the village of C—

On the 6th of June, 1799,

In the 20th year of her age.

May her soul find that peace in Heaven

Which this world denied her.

A pitiful story! And who would wonder that the place was said to be haunted? And so it was, as I shall proceed to shew.

The rustics asserted that wheelbarrows ran about without visible agency; that pump-handles worked when the form of the worker was invisible; that the house was lighted up at night, when no one was within; and even that a benighted traveller, calling to ask his way, had the door opened to him by the ghost! My father, however, was not at all moved by all this village gossip. But he did the right thing; he went and spent a night in the house. No unearthly sight or omens appeared; all was still that night; and we took possession of the place. It was prophesied that we should not occupy it a year, but the year passed quietly away. It was in my thirteenth year that the first manifestation of a supernatural character occurred—i.e., the first to my knowledge—and it was I who witnessed it.

It was a moonlight night, and I lay awake in the very chamber wherein poor Mrs. F. had committed suicide—a chamber, however, which had lost its terrors by familiarity. There were other boys in the room, but I was the only one who lay awake—when I heard heavy footsteps ascending the stairs. My father was in the habit of going round the house at night to see whether all fires and lights were out; and I thought it was he. The steps came along the passage, and, without entering any other room, came straight towards the one where I lay. I thought I would have a look at my father without revealing the fact that I was awake, and so I playfully covered my head with the clothes and twisted them so that I could look up the passage, as he would turn the corner towards the open door—through which the moonlight streamed. But instead of my father, an awful figure turned the corner, clad as it seemed to me, in a military uniform, gaunt and haggard! I started up in my bed and, half instinctively, uttered a form of adjuration which I had read in tales, of which I was a great student. Whatever it was it turned round at the words and then disappeared.

I was destined to hear that tread again. Some years had elapsed and I was nearly seventeen. I slept, then, in a little bed-chamber which opened out of a large outer room called "the lower room." One bright moonlight night "as I lay a-thinking" about some mundane subject or other, I heard steps, which awakened strange recollections, descend the stairs, outside this outer chamber. I heard the door open and the night-walker seemed to enter. The steps approached my door. It was a peculiar tread; the boots "creaked," to use a common saying, "as though they had not been paid for," and as I lay wondering who it could be, thus shod, about in the night, the sound ceased. Soon afterwards, I heard the village clock strike three.

The next night I was awake again by mere chance; the same phenomena were repeated; and immediately afterwards the clock struck three again! Then I felt sure that there was something out of the common in these steps, and I determined to lie with my door open the next night, and to see what it was. That next night, as I lay in anticipation, I heard the steps descending the stairs. I heard the outer door open. Whatever it was that entered, it certainly possessed force, for it pushed the open door of a wardrobe, which obstructed the passage, forcibly aside, and shut it with a loud noise. The steps came round between the beds where some young boys slept, towards my door, when to my amazement, no form appeared; yet the steps pressed on towards my bed. I cried aloud "Who is it?" and all was silent. I sprang out of bed and searched the room and the adjacent passages; but no elucidation of the mystery appeared.

When I communicated my night's experience (very cautiously—for my father had again and again forbidden such reports as likely to alarm the boys and prejudice the school), I found that I had stumbled on a fact known to many in secret—that at a quarter to three each morning these steps paraded the house, from the chamber where the suicide was committed to the room in which I slept.

An assistant master informed me that, going upstairs at that hour, he had met the steps coming down and felt a cold blast of wind pass him, to his no small terror. My brother, younger than myself, told me that one night as he lay awake in that outer room with a bad cough, he heard them coming, and thought his father had heard him cough, and was bringing him some lozenges—when the door opened and the bodiless steps came to his bed-side, frightening him terribly. Many others had also heard the steps, but all said, "Say nothing about it; it will vex your father and do no good; neither do the steps do any harm."

At last, anxious to obtain some key to the mystery, I asked the senior assistant master to sit up all night with me in his own little room (which was partitioned off from the chamber in which the suicide had been committed) that we might endeavour to find out what was the nature of "the steps." I had not then seen the tomb of the unfortunate Mrs. F., and did not know the exact date of the tragedy, but I am inclined to think that we watched on the very anniversary of the fatal day, or rather night.

The evening passed slowly, in spite of books, and draughts, and other amusements; and contrary to my expectation—for I had imagined that midnight would not pass unmarked—all was quiet until the dawn of the summer's day made itself dimly felt through the window curtains. It was then a quarter to three, and we sat looking at our watches with but little expectation—for daylight is a great obstacle to belief in ghosts—when all at once, just as I had said "Unless it comes soon there will be nothing to-night!" a step, heavy and determined, was heard in the adjacent room behind the thin wooden partition. It stalked out through the door, along a little passage a few feet in length, and then passed our door. I opened the door and looked out. The passage was fairly lighted up by the breaking dawn of day, and the steps were passing heavily along it, but there was no form! We followed, but a few feet behind. The steps reached the staircase and began to descend the stairs. We looked over from the balustrade above; the stairs seemed to bend under that mysterious tread; but my companion faltered, and I followed down the flight above.

Midway there was a landing and then, turning an angle, a second short flight of stairs ended in front of a large window, and on the right hand was the door of the lower room. In the light of that summer dawn I distinctly saw the handle turn and the door open; and I heard the steps enter. I was so close behind that, as I followed, the door was slammed in my face. I pushed it open again. The room was empty, save of boys sleeping quietly in their beds, unconscious of the mystery around them. It was now nearly three o'clock, and, satisfied that the matter was beyond human agency, we slept till our usual hour of rising.

No further investigation seemed necessary. We all felt convinced it was a case of the supernatural, and left it. But sometimes a visitor would say to my father at breakfast:—

"You were about very late last night, weren't you?"

"No. I retired before midnight."

"Because I heard heavy steps about, just before three."

Then we would look at each other and say nothing.

But within a year from this time, the phenomenon (if I can apply that word where naught was seen) ceased, and for ten years the house was perfectly quiet. I often lay awake, having set my alarm for the time, but nothing whatsoever rewarded my watching. This, perhaps, may be an argument that imagination had naught to do with the matter. Mine was as much excited on the latter as on the former occasion.

Ten years passed away. My father and mother had retired from active life, and gone away to live. My brother had become the head master of the school, was married, and residing at the old house. I was myself ordained in priest's orders and chaplain of a large school, when, just before the Christmas holidays, I received a letter from my brother in which were these words:—

"We are very anxious to see you at home again. Do you remember the ghostly disturbances about ten years ago? They have returned worse than ever, and we want your aid to investigate them."

I was about to return home to spend the Christmas vacation when I received this, and went full of anticipation, not sorry to have the opportunity, as a man, of further investigation into the mysteries which had so puzzled me as a boy. I found when I reached home, and had had a long talk over it all, that for some time there had been a renewal of the disturbances, but not quite of the like nature with the former manifestations. They centred, it is true, at the old hour, but were by no means confined to it now. I will give a few instances.

My brother told me that one night he was awake by loud cries of terror from the boys who slept in the "suicide's room," just above his own. (I need not say we did not give it that name before the pupils, nor did they know the story.) He rushed upstairs, greatly alarmed, and found several excited boys, who declared that a woman without a head had entered the room. He tried to laugh at it, comforted them, left a light burning, and came downstairs.

"Look at your watch," said his wife.

A quarter to three!

Another night my sister was sleeping in the fatal chamber, with a cousin. All at once she was awake by a loud cry, and found her companion in hysterics. The aforesaid woman had entered the room. My sister looked at her watch. (The cousin did not know the preceding facts.)

A quarter to three!

A midwife who attended at a confinement and slept in that room, after the first night asked whether she could have another chamber.

"Why?" was the natural question.

"Oh, it does not matter," she said; she would try it again; and coloured slightly as if ashamed. The next day she said she must sleep elsewhere for some one came into that room each night, and threw himself (or herself) down on an empty bed; but it seemed no natural person for when she struck a light there was no one there.

There were many similar tales all connected, more or less, with a quarter to three, but just at this time the disturbances had become worse and extended throughout the night.

For a day or two I heard nothing, so far as I can remember, but at length there came one bitterly cold night, when I had got to bed with a hot water bottle for companion to my frozen feet, in a room of the top storey where I slept. I was alone on that floor; the pupils were all home for their holidays. I had just put my light out when a series of noises began, as of the moving of furniture, the opening of doors, the parading of the passages. One would suppose every room was tenanted by restless beings save my own, which was quiet inside. I had gone to sleep in spite of it all—for it was too cold to get up to investigate—when I heard the ringing of a bell in my room, which had been a servants' room and communicated below. I got up and heard knocks upon the ceiling beneath my floor.

An invalid sister was then sleeping in the chamber beneath, and I accordingly put on my dressing gown, went out into the bitter atmosphere (that night a policeman was frozen to death in his box not far off), descended the stairs, and went to the door of my sister's room.

"Poor L. is so dreadfully alarmed by the noises," said my other sister, who slept with her; "do see what it all means!"

"It is useless," I said, "but I will go through the house to satisfy you that there are no robbers in it." So I went through all the large rooms of the empty house. I was the only man in it that night. All was quiet; and I went back to my sister's door, and said, "You need not fear; it is only the ghosts. They can do us no harm while we trust in God!" I then went back to my bed, but not to rest, for I was no sooner asleep than I was awake by a fearful crash! Outside my door was a large box; this appeared, judging by the sound, to be lifted up several feet, and then allowed to fall heavily on the floor. I would not get up, and soon dozed off again. It was repeated a second time, with a deafening noise and shock. Still, I would not get up, but, commending myself to God, slept again. A third time I was awake by the same shock.

A sudden thought inspired me. I was a priest and might try what exorcism would do. So I used, as nearly as I could remember it, the ancient form commanding the spirits to depart in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost! And all was quiet through the old house during the remainder of that night. In the morning I asked my sisters, "Did you hear anything after I left you?" They replied, "Yes, three heavy smashes; then all was still."

This occurrence, more than aught else, led me to believe that the noises were the result of the agency of evil spirits.

A friend, who is a great believer in Spiritualism, tells me that I ought to have questioned the ghosts, for they can open no communication, but evidently sought such opening; and that I might have done good had I addressed them.

To conclude, from that night until we left the place it was the scene of continual disturbance. Our doors were tried at night; we saw the handles turn; steps continually paraded the passages; furniture appeared to be shifted, but never could we detect any visible agency. The most melancholy occurrence connected with these disturbances was as follows:—A poor boy was left behind in the following Christmas holidays, suffering from congestion of the lungs. He died, and one night, while the body was lying in a room adjacent to my brother's study, such dismal noises issued from the chamber of death while my brother and his wife were in their room, that they could not bear it and were obliged to go elsewhere.

And the most significant thing occurred at the same trying season. My brother was in town, and his wife was sleeping alone when she heard sounds all over the house, as if a number of carpenters and upholsterers were taking down the furniture previous to removal. She heard them, as it seemed, take down the bedsteads, and place the iron laths in succession on the floor with distinct sound. She lay terrified a long time, and then awoke a visitor who slept in the adjoining room. He, too, had heard all these noises with the utmost astonishment, greatly wondering what household arrangements thus interfered with the rest which night should bring to all. These noises were evidently prophetic, for within a year fever broke out in the village, extending to the school, and costing us two or three lives; and my brother, under medical advice, moved his whole establishment to a well-known watering-place on the South Coast, where it still flourishes.

We are all, from experience, what the world calls "believers in ghosts;" but none of us have ever had such experiences elsewhere—a strong proof that the occurrences I have detailed did not originate in our own imaginations.

DR. NICHOLS, who has been invited to lecture before the Vegetarian Society at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on Wednesday, March 14th, has promised on the following evening to give an address to the Spiritual Evidence Society at their Hall, 3, Weir-court, Newgate-street.

A CONVERSATION was held on Monday evening last, at the rooms of the C.A.S., 38, Great Russell-street. The Misses Withall charmed the company with solos and duets on the pianoforte; Miss Everitt sang sweetly and with exquisite taste; Miss Allan gave some recitations very effectively; and Mr. Tietkens' songs, as usual, elicited much applause. The attendance was not so large as we should have wished to see.

THE SUPERNATURAL SCIENTIFICALLY CONSIDERED.

The Masonic Hall at Richmond, Surrey, was recently crowded on the occasion of a paper on the above subject being read by Mr. T. Sidney Hargreaves to the members and friends of the Richmond Athenæum.

In commencing his paper Mr. Hargreaves said that the conception of what was generally known as the supernatural, with its array of spectres, necromancers, wizards, witches, churchyard ghosts and bogies, soothsayers, magicians, auguries and divinations, second sight, demons, compacts with the evil one, Highland seers, divining rods, table rappings, haunted houses, and hundreds of attendant superstitions, was so closely interwoven with the existence of the human race that it would be difficult indeed to mention an age or a race in which it had not played a great part. Of course it would be as absurd in this age to accept unhesitatingly the enormous mass of improbabilities presented to us as supernatural phenomena as it would be to believe in mediæval astrology, or the possibility of finding the "elixir vite," or the "philosopher's stone." But on the other hand it was as illogical to despise and cast aside the whole mass as it would have been thus to dispose of the pseudo-sciences of a few centuries ago, and with them the invaluable knowledge of chemistry and astronomy. How did we know whether we had not, amidst this huge collection, much of which seemed incomprehensible and much absurd, a jewel of great price, a knowledge which should transcend the knowledge gained from astrology and alchemy as the sun did the earth? The somewhat uninviting aspect of the subject was greatly due to credulity and imposture. But however clearly we might trace imposture, we had no right to deny the existence of the material with which it worked, for even imposture could not make bricks without straw. The phenomena recorded were denied on the score of inherent improbability, and yet scientific knowledge was itself built up of facts which previous to their discovery would have been deemed improbable, if not impossible. Quoting from the proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, Mr. Hargreaves said there appeared to be, amidst much illusion and deception, an important body of remarkable phenomena, which were prima facie inexplicable on any generally recognised hypothesis, and which, if incontestably established, would be of the highest possible value. Therefore it had been thought expedient by many eminent literary and scientific men in this country to form themselves into a society, the object of which was to sift that large group of doubtful phenomena commonly called the supernatural. Passing on to the consideration of some of these phenomena, Mr. Hargreaves first referred to thought-reading, and to the experiments of Messrs. Bishop and Stuart Cumberland. There could be but little doubt that in these cases the operator was guided by unconscious muscular indications by the sensitive and either consciously or unconsciously interpreted by the operator. He was confirmed in this opinion by the fact that after witnessing Mr. Stuart Cumberland's performances at Cambridge, he attempted the same thing himself, and out of twenty-seven experiments with different persons, he succeeded in twenty-three, and in every case in which he succeeded he received distinct muscular indications, although he was quite certain that many of the persons with whom he experimented were quite unwilling to give any conscious indications. There was, however, a second class of experiments in which the operator and the sensitive being in contact, a sensation such as that of a taste, smell, or an object conceived by the sensitive, is interpreted by the operator. Some very peculiar experiments of this nature were made at Brighton, in which a Mr. Smith interpreted tastes, localised sensations of pain, and even scenes, and in which he was able to reproduce on paper geometrical figures conceived by the operator. The most valuable results, however, were those such as Professors Balfour Stewart and Barrett had obtained, in which interpretations were made without any contact whatever, and where deception of every kind was most sedulously guarded against. There were three hypotheses by which thought-transference without contact might be explained. One was the possibility that the sensitive might be able to interpret outward indications unconsciously given by the operator. Another was that the transmission of an idea might be accomplished by purely dynamical means, and that a nerve-current in one body might induce a similar nerve-current in another body, just as the vibrating wire in one instrument would cause to vibrate the corresponding wire in another instrument tuned to the same pitch, and so produce the same note. The third hypothesis was that of the existence of a psychic force. Referring to the phenomena commonly known as mesmeric, with the allied one of clairvoyance, he said it was open to doubt whether the mesmeric sleep was not purely subjective, and the passes and other paraphernalia quite unnecessary to its production. Referring next to the phenomena of apparitions, he said that there were scores of instances vouched for by witnesses whose veracity none could impeach, in which a person had actually seen a presentment of an absent friend at the moment of the death of that friend. Mere coincidence would not explain a thing of that kind. It was here that there seemed to be a necessity for the existence of a hypothetical psychic force. Much had been said and written concerning Spiritualism, but after all there was probably nothing more in it than could be explained by an exalted state of the nervous system in the spectators, and fraudulent collusion and imposture on the part of professional mediums. He was bound to say, however, that no doubt there were many thoroughly conscientious persons who could relate strange experiences of spiritualistic phenomena, and it was very probable that further research would throw a strong light on the subject. He had necessarily treated the subject in a very brief and meagre manner, as in the present initiatory stage of these investigations it would not be wise to jump to conclusions hastily. But he thought they would agree with him that the matter was one of importance, and deserving of investigation. They only wanted time and careful experiments tried over and over again, and they might be certain that whether the ultimate results were the elimination of every force not at present known, or whether it resulted in the discovery of the laws of a psychic force at present only hinted at, a deal of doubt and uncertainty would be cleared up, and most valuable contributions would be made to psychology and mental physiology.

The Rev. J. Hunt Cooke said that if the subject was in an "initiatory stage" it had been in that stage for three or four thousand years, at all events. After hours of research in the British Museum in connection with those great ghost stories which were generally accepted amongst us, he had come to the conclusion that there was no satisfactory foundation for one of them. There were undoubtedly some remarkable cases on record of apparitions of persons at the point of death to friends at a distance, and upon these he suspended his judgment.

Dr. Cook contended that if what had happened in the past was in accordance with the laws of nature it could happen again. In earlier days men who saw natural powers at work which they did not understand fell down and worshipped them, and called them supernatural, but now we knew that these things were in accordance with the laws of nature because we thought we understood more about those laws. Now we believed in the things we could comprehend by the laws of nature, but refused to believe in what we could not so comprehend. That was assuming that we had a thorough and complete knowledge of the laws of nature—an assumption which was not justified. They knew that two embodied spirits could communicate their ideas, and they believed that two disembodied spirits could do so. Why, then, should it be impossible for such communication to take place between an embodied and a disembodied spirit? The Rev. J. Hunt Cooke had asked why they could not see a ghost in the daylight, but it was wrong to argue that because a thing could not be seen in daylight it could never be seen. Whoever saw the stars, except in the dark? and whoever thought of expressing a disbelief in the stars unless they were visible at noon-day? (Laughter.) There were many things which they could not explain, but it was unwise to say they did not believe in them.

Mr. Edward King said he would grant what Dr. Cook had said, that what was possible in the past would be possible in the future, but it did not follow that what was expedient in the past would be expedient in the future. In the early history of the world, when there was no printed record, there was a need for the supernatural as a means of teaching, for by its vivid impressions were made on the mind and handed down from generation to generation, but it was not needed now.

The Rev. C. F. Coutts urged that in the investigation of facts they ought to make a clear distinction between what might possibly serve some good purpose, and what could not possibly serve any purpose whatever. He thought the phenomena of Spiritualism might be placed in the latter class.

Mr. Edward T. Bennett (Secretary of the Council of the Society for Psychical Research) argued that it was not right to ask what was the use of a fact; for all facts had a scientific value as facts. It was by approaching facts in this spirit that the great discoveries of such men as Tyndall and others had been made.

Dr. Roberts Law, referring to mesmerism, described the case of a gentleman who fell under the influence of another, and could be called to him from a room in another part of the house without any sound being made. He was incapable of passing a certain line in a room without the will of the other. He knew that to be an actual fact.

The Chairman summed up the debate in some humorous remarks.

Mr. Hargreaves then replied, and the Chairman thanked him for his excellent paper.—Abridged from the Richmond and Twickenham Times.

MATERIAL OBJECTS BROUGHT FROM A DISTANCE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—If it is your wish you may publish the following:—

Not very long ago I witnessed a most astounding demonstration of the transference of matter by super-human agency from one locality to another, a distance of more than twenty miles.

I will condense as much as possible my account of this strange phenomenon, but I would first mention a word or two about the circle.

We have only six sitters, five of us being old-fashioned Spiritualists, but the sixth is a raw convert from the Wesleyan body, who for a long time past worked with great zeal for the spread of Wesleyan Methodism, and the demolition of Spiritualism.

He has now severed himself from that sect, having found more light in the spirit-circle, and he has turned out, much to his surprise, a promising trance-medium for speaking.

One or two weeks previous to this remarkable séance a friend of mine, whom I will call Mr. H. (a schoolmaster and Spiritualist), came to York to spend a short holiday, and for the time being was a sitter at our circle. It was during the last sitting we had together that Mr. H. suggested to the spirits that they should, after his return home, bring to us at York some article from his house, to which they replied, "We will try."

The two following séances were completely void of any kind of manifestations, a most unusual thing with us, but on the occasion of the third, we had been sitting from eight until half-past nine, when with almost lightning-speed there fell, close to my back, two wooden knitting needles about a foot in length. This occurred with the light only a little subdued.

The medium through whom this phenomenon took place is a lady of unquestionable character, and who never makes a penny out of Spiritualism. She was during the séance entranced, and sat opposite to myself. After the needles had fallen she was influenced to speak, and this is something like what she said, "The needles we have brought you were taken from out of a box upon Mr. H.'s landing. We noticed on the top of the box several jam jars. We had some little difficulty in getting the needles out. During the day Mr. H. has been rambling in the lanes gathering berries," &c., &c.

I wrote to my friend at once, mentioning all particulars, and he immediately replied confirming all as strictly true. He informed me that at half-past nine on the night when we received the needles he and Mrs. H. retired to rest. Just after entering the bedroom Mrs. H. remarked that she heard a noise on the landing, but not hearing it again took no further notice of it. The needles were, in all probability, at that very moment being taken out of the box, for that was the time the needles fell behind my back.—I remain, yours respectfully,

A. R. WILSON.

P.S.—Mr. H. has been to York, seen the needles, and claimed them as his property.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. W. TOWNS.—The friends of Mr. Towns, who as a private medium of many years' standing will be known to many of our readers, are promoting a testimonial on his behalf, towards enabling him to overcome the effects of some recent pecuniary embarrassments, and with the further object of testifying the appreciation in which his services are held by his friends. The testimonial is to be presented at a public meeting to be held at Neumeyer Hall, on the 28th inst., and contributions can be sent to Mr. J. Wootton, 33 Little Earl-street, Soho, W.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The "Medium and Daybreak."

The Medium of late has devoted much attention to "Oahspe: The New Bible," as it is called. We have not read this work yet, and therefore can express no opinion either for or against. This much, however, we will say, that the test of a book being "divine" is a very simple one. It is this: a book or bible is "divine" or inspired to the nation or people to whom it is given just in proportion to its influence in uplifting that nation or people from ignorance to a knowledge of the truth as regards his physical and spiritual natures. Unless "Oahspe" will stand this test it will not justify the large claim which it makes upon us.—The author of "The Geozonic Spheres" on "Evil Angels," is suggestive. Although we cannot follow him entirely, yet much of what he says we believe to be true. The evidence before us, however, is as yet insufficient to enable us to form a definite opinion on the subject on which he writes. Those who are perplexed by contradictory and senseless communications would do well to read his paper.—It is with the greatest pleasure we notice a paragraph to the effect that Miss Wood has at last been successful.

"We are informed that Miss C. E. Wood, the well-known medium, has been having some séances with a private circle at a private house in Newcastle, at which some excellent results have been obtained. There was no placing the medium in bonds or distance vail; but simply some dark window curtains were stretched across a corner of a dining-room, and the medium was seated a short distance in front of them, in full view of all, and dressed in a white jacket, the better to observe any movements on her part. The first five or six sittings were productive of no important result, but at both of her last two séances, a small childlike form has emerged from the curtains, and whilst standing near the medium essayed to speak. The form was somewhat attenuated and lacked the robustness which is experienced when the medium is isolated behind the curtains, but hopes are entertained that this may be overcome in time. On inquiry we are assured that there was no possibility of fraud, that Miss Wood had nothing to do with preparing the room for the séance, and that invariably she was only in the house about ten minutes before the séance commenced. About sixteen persons were present."

Mr. Burns, referring to this, says: "A cabinet is of more importance to the materialising spirit than to the medium, who, in fact, does not require it at all except as a condition for the operating spirits." Just so; that is what we have urged all along and was the basis of the much maligned Circular. However, better late than never, and we cordially welcome another recruit.

The "Banner of Light."

A report of the twenty-eighth anniversary of the development of the Davenport mediums is the principal feature of the Banner this week. The celebration took place in Boston, and passed off successfully.—The Rev. M. J. Savage, who has been posing as a second Joseph Cook, comes in for a second instalment of a well-merited castigation. The Banner does well in hoisting such men on their own petard.—Our contemporary crosses its lance with that of the Independent, a religio-political journal, published in New York, on the question of the evidence for the continuity of life after death. The Banner has by far the best of it.

The "Religio-Philosophical Journal."

The Journal, like its contemporary, has something to say to Mr. Savage, and says it plainly, too.—"The Little Pilgrim in the Unseen," Mrs. Oliphant's charming allegory, which first appeared in Macmillan's, is reprinted, and occupies a large portion of the space in the present number.—There are some signs of renewed public interest in Spiritualist meetings in Baltimore. A small but quite promising organisation is addressed each Thursday evening by Mrs. F. O. Hyzer. Years ago, under the efficient management of Colonel Danakin, meetings flourished in that city, and with the very large number of avowed Spiritualists there ought, it would seem, to be a strong and active society.—The editor of the Journal is now "making for" the conjurers, and has challenged Hermann to the tune of five thousand dollars on the condition that he does what has repeatedly been done through the mediumship of Mr. Slade. We have no belief that Hermann will accept the offer. Gentlemen of that ilk are far too slippery.

The "Harbinger of Light" (Melbourne).

Spiritualism in Sydney appears to be making some headway. For a long period the cause in that city, in ignorance of its own strength, has thrown in its lot with the pseudo-freethinkers. Now, however, a movement is on the tapis to inaugurate a purely Spiritualistic Association. That is a step in the right direction, and we wish it success. At any rate, as between Spiritualism and materialistic thought, it is well that "the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." They are too antagonistic either for assimilation or harmonious working, and it is not nice to see Spiritualists coquetting with materialism.—Brisbane has started a "progressive literary and reading-room" right in the centre of the main thoroughfare of that city, and a large reading-room is fitted in the rear of the shop. Three nights a week are reserved for meetings, and the rest are to be open to the public.—William Denton is still with our Victorian friends. His style and matter are essentially adapted to Antipodean lines of thought.—Cyril Haviland's "Footsteps of Angels" is a charming little story, which bristles with Spiritualism, and in which the moral—that Spiritualism is worth just so much to a man as it influences for the better his daily life and thought, is enforced.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL, 14, NEWMAN STREET, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

The subject selected for the address at this hall, on Sunday last, was "Spiritualism: its Dangers;" a title sufficiently suggestive of possible risk in association with our faith, to furnish much comfort to our friend, the enemy, who wants to know immediately whether he did not always tell you so. But this, argumentatively, is an impolitic attitude in the presence of the controls of Mr. Morse, whose preference for topics which seem to need elucidation is clearly rather encouraged than weakened by definite opposition, however clamorous or persistent, while their characteristically lucid statement and penetrating analysis are now more conspicuous than when a controversialist, in person or in purpose, is regarded as present. Dangers there may be; but they are not of the stuff the critic's dreams are made of, nor, whatever their nature or extent, should they be suffered to operate to deter the honest, earnest student of spiritual phenomena from any needful or desirable process of investigation. A present day demonstration of the after-life of humankind involves an inquiry of transcendent importance to every child of man, and no sufficient demonstration is available outside of Spiritualism. If, unaffected by threatened danger, the question is candidly approached, and the alleged facts are established, it is simply impossible to exaggerate their value: that must be admitted; but the lecturer was equally ready to suggest that if conscientious examination does not sustain the truth of the pretensions we advance, it might become an urgent duty for each of us to assist in exposing the fascinating delusion, and in demolishing the whole superstructure, for the world is in no need of added falsehoods. The subject was then presented under various aspects in two divisions: the first dealing with the Spiritualist himself, and shewing how he is affected by the contingencies of the situation; the second describing the relation of the facts to the outer world: and we were urged to remember that, in any case, the examination of the question undoubtedly requires great deliberation, indomitable perseverance, and a pure and unprejudiced, not less than an honest and earnest, frame of mind. As affecting the Spiritualist himself, then, the possible danger to health was the first introduced. The doctors at the outset generally have it altogether their own way. They are so learned—or is it so ignorant? their terminology is so distracting; their shake of the head so conclusive (when the patient is amiably submissive, that is to say) that it is not always easy to overcome or to disregard the initial difficulty of their opposition. Hysteria and nervous derangement; then traces of insanity; presently positive religious mania; so is the agony piled up. The debilitating effects of the high pressure of current social habits, of forms of education, of sentimental religion, may produce similar manifestations of disturbed health alike of body and mind; but in that case there is apparently no need, as with the Spiritualist's troubles, to speak of confirmed physiological and nervous disorder. Look at the medium, say the doctors; he speaks in trance; he writes without personal volition; he professes to heal the sick; all, especially the last, signs of mania. Now, if these gentlemen would but carefully examine the phenomena and the related nervous physiological or psychical conditions, they would, in all probability, get upon the track which would conduct them to a fair and accurate appreciation of the intricacies of nervous physics. At present the wonder is, not that ill-health is occasionally apparent, and that mediums are sometimes as sallow and sunken-eyed as ministers of the Church or other earnest brain-workers, but, considering the prevalent ignorance of the relative action of bodies and nerves, that the cases of breakdown are so few. A truer knowledge of the qualities character-istic of the medium, and of many other conditions of life and work which need not now be specified, but which affect every department of labour, would teach all alike how, in the exercise of every human faculty, to escape ill-health. Prolonged strain is especially unwise; it must ultimately in severe reaction, and cannot well fail to be disastrous; but it is not peculiar to mediumship, and when sustained application to any subject or purpose develops symptoms clearly indicative of enfeebled health, physical or nervous, and the will is not strong enough to resist the otherwise inevitable effects, then that work or effort should be abandoned. The study of any science requires self-command and discretion. Why, then, should we hesitate to admit that in this degree there is danger in Spiritualism? For the reason that the danger is in the method and the indiscretion, and it is unfair to speak of that as, in any true sense, a danger specifically affecting Spiritualism. At the bottom of the mischief, wherever manifested, will be found an imperfect acquaintance with, or an absolute ignorance of, the physiological conditions of health, of the separate and relative action of the nervous system, of the nature and powers of the human will; and this position is in no sense or degree special to Spiritualism. The next alleged danger was rather of a spiritual or psychological character. The subject cannot be approached, says the inquirer, because I fear to get into contact with evil spirits, and all their associated horrors. This is truly a distressing speculation, and we hesitate, because the allusion may seem unkind, to say to you, "Birds of a feather flock together," but that is a proverb not less spiritually than conventionally true all the same; and these congenial evil spirits in the flesh are not always or solely in the criminal dock, for some of them lead very respectable lives indeed, as things go, and are richly clothed and sumptuously served. There is risk then; but it is not in Spiritualism, and will not affect the true and the pure and the earnest, honest investigator simply craving for light and progress. However, whence arises the trouble, if it does exist? We should like to speak to you more plainly than at this present moment we think it well to do, for we would take you back to ante-natal conditions and insist that until childhood is born in honour there cannot fail to be danger of the contingency of depraved tendencies; an atom of viciousness which develops until the power of resistance to evil is at its lowest point. Such are always open to attack as a consequence of that law of life which says, that as are the character and affinities of the individual so is the quality of the spiritual connection. You may rebel against this absolutely true position, and question the goodness and purpose of God; but without now breaking off into that inquiry further than to say that seeming evils have usually certain compensating effects, let it suffice to affirm that by the cultivation of your will-power and the consequent subjugation of wayward tendencies, the resources of your nature will not fail you to prevent the approach of evil spirits. Then there is the moral, and finally, the religious contention. Spiritualism is distinctly immoral, it is said; and so serious and difficult of disproof is such a charge generally, that the accused usually suffers judgment to go by default; but we cannot permit that now. It is said to be immoral because it has taught extravagant social doctrines, is always aggressive towards the established order of things, is democratic, and generally disturbing. Similar charges were formulated against Jesus and His disciples as against many another new philosophy, the truth being that a system which aims at elevating the moral standard is always exposed to such misrepresentation precisely in proportion to the searching character of its ethical teaching. Spiritualism is no exception to the rule: its truths can and do liberate the moral consciousness in its higher forms, and may well be trusted to protect the lower. In religion the accusation is still more grave, for it is said that Spiritualism detaches us from the service of God, rejects the Saviour, denies special inspiration, has no respect for parson, or church, or sanctity, questions the existence of the devil and of hell, and generally and finally leads to pronounced atheism. And these formidable charges are hurled at you because you reconstruct your religious opinions, throwing out some manifestly untrue to secure a firmer grip upon others, leading to larger and, as we think, more worthy views of God, and to a better understanding of the conditions and character of the future life, the acceptance of the truth of a personal participation in inspirational action, leading to a sustained and truly fruitful religious progress. We neither deny God, nor reject inspiration or spirituality, and there is again no danger here, while as a matter of fact the Spiritualist is simply one of the advanced guard of that daily increasing army determined to work out its own freedom from human shackles in the domain of opinion. He believes in and accepts the universal Hope, and will not grieve over much at any epithet bestowed upon him while he preserves his reverence for truth. So far we contend that there are no dangers associated with Spiritualism; but now we must briefly signalise three which really deserve to be so regarded. First, the danger of accepting as necessarily true whatever is stated as such by the communicating spirits; next, that of the deterioration of mediums as the result of our exaggeration of their qualities and services; and finally that of a certain heedlessness in the formation of circles of inquiry which otherwise are the very corner stone of Spiritualism. We were reminded that every statement conveyed to us from the spirit-world should be as carefully examined by the light of reason and common sense as though made by one of ourselves in the flesh; that the flattery, amounting to worship sometimes, of the medium is especially disastrous because enfeebling the material with which spirits work; and that meetings for investigation should be conducted with the sweetly pure and divinely beautiful characteristics of the home circle, where foreign influence is rightly excluded. Having regard to these real dangers, from which, however, the way of escape is clear enough, we may hope presently to reach forward to and grasp the common heritage of humanity, the crown and glory of spirit communion founded upon justice and truth, every Spiritualist remembering how much the honour of the cause depends upon his individual character. The second main division of the subject, that describing summarily the relation of the facts to the outer world, may be dismissed in a few words. Its purpose was to shew that there is unquestionable danger in Spiritualism to the generally accepted theories of life and morals, for the broad and liberal religion of the Spiritualist cannot fail to deal out some heavy blows to Sacerdotalism; his moral conceptions of inherent beauty and completeness must come into collision with superficial pretence; and his unfailing self-respect will assume a position of confirmed antagonism towards ignorance and vice; so that, alike in the Church and in society, there is danger to conventionalism, and the source of the danger is Spiritualism. Now the position thus faintly indicated will constitute really the conspicuous glory of Spiritualism, for it involves the certainty of the assured predominance of truth, and of enduring righteousness, with the consequent development of those qualities in man which shall allow every individual to draw upon his own spiritual nature with such effect that he shall find within himself every faculty needful for spirit-communion, free alike from the sense and the reality of danger. ## LIVERPOOL.

Last Sunday, the Rodney Hall was again crowded to its utmost capacity by an intelligent and attentive audience to listen to Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten's lectures. The subject in the morning was "Spiritual Gifts," the modus operandi of both physical and mental manifestations being exhaustively treated. In the evening the subject was the "History of Satan," a reply to the Rev. Mr. Skewes' second sermon on Spiritualism. The closest attention was paid to the lecture, which occupied an hour and a-half in delivery, and was said by those who had frequently heard Mrs. Britten to be one of the most brilliant orations they ever heard delivered through her lips. The lecturer gave copious illustrations of the subject to prove that the devil had been personified in the adverse influences of nature's operations; especially those of the seasons of the year. Chaldean, Indian, Hindoo, and Egyptian Mythology was largely laid under contribution to prove her case. A challenge was given by Mrs. Britten, at the close, to the Rev. L. H. Skewes or other reverend gentlemen, to discuss the questions on any week evening which could be agreed on.—C. F.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—On Sunday morning the platform of the Newcastle Spiritual Evidence Society was occupied by Mrs. E. W. Wallis, of Nottingham, who discoursed upon "Spiritualism a Religion." The audience was large for a Sunday morning. In the evening she lectured to a larger company than any that has assembled at Weirs Court for a long while, the subject being "Man: his Nature, Needs, and Attributes." The lecturer handled her subject with remarkable ability, discussing her position from point to point in the most clever and intelligent manner. On the Monday evening she again addressed an excellent audience, upon our "Homes and Employments in the Future Life." Mrs. Wallis gives excellent promise as a speaker of no mediocre ability. We wish her God speed and trust her labours may meet their just reward wherever her lot may be cast in the future. A considerable amount of regret prevails among the members of the Newcastle and Gateshead Societies at the damage which is being done to our movement in the North by the persistent advertisement of Michael Chambers as a physical medium. It will be remembered, as I noticed in this column during the latter part of last year, that the then ruling committee, having some grave doubts as to the genuineness of his mediumship, passed a resolution to the effect that he could no longer be recognised as the medium of the Newcastle Society, and yet of late he has been advertised to such an extent that several of the societies have engaged him, only to be grievously disappointed, and thoroughly disgusted at the palpable unreality of his professed mediumship. It is only a few months ago that he was travelling with a conjurer in the West of Durham, giving entertainments "exposing" Spiritualism.

GATESHEAD.—On Sunday last, through the speaker not turning up as promised, the friends held an "experience meeting," at which several friends spoke with considerable effect. Altogether a pleasant evening was passed. On Sunday next Mr. T. G. Grey will lecture on "Old Truths and New Ones."

HOUGHTON-LE-SPRING.—Mr. Joseph Stephenson lectured in the Mechanics' Hall on Sunday evening last upon "Is Spiritualism a Delusion?" The attendance was good and the discourse was much appreciated by those present.

HUTTON-LE-HOLE.—On Sunday night last Mr. H. Burton, of the Gateshead Society, lectured upon "The Religion of the Future." The meeting was crowded with an intelligent and attentive audience, who enthusiastically received the many effective points of the speaker's discourse. The Chairman, Mr. Clennal, said, on closing the meeting, that they had just listened to the most able and effective lecture they had heard since they were established.—NORTHUMBRIA.

THE CONDUCT OF PUBLIC PHYSICAL SEANCES.

Circular issued by the Central Association of Spiritualists, 33, Great Russell-street, W.C.

Few Spiritualists can have failed to note, with regret, the deterioration which has of late years taken place in the conditions under which physical phenomena have been sought in public seances.

These conditions—so favourable to fraud on the part of dishonest mediums, and so calculated to excite suspicion in the minds of observers—have led to the most disastrous results. We are not speaking without full warrant when we say that there is hardly a public medium for physical manifestations in this country against whom, at one time or other, charges of imposture have not been brought. We fear that in some cases no reasonable doubt can be entertained that fraud of the grossest kind was really perpetrated; while in other cases there is reason to believe that—whatever may have been the appearance to inexperienced spectators—there was no conscious deception on the part of the medium.

But in either case the name of Spiritualism has been brought into discredit, and we are forcibly driven to the conclusion that other methods of procedure must be amended. We must demonstrate our abhorrence of imposture by disavowing and discouraging all conditions which do not plainly shut out even the suspicion of its impossibility.

Obviously these remarks can have little reference to family circles, which are naturally held sacred by those who regard them as affording opportunities for veritable "communion with the dead." But it is open to grave question whether—even in the case of family circles—inquirers should ever be permitted to make their first acquaintance with Spiritual phenomena by introduction to seances held for physical manifestations in the dark, or where a cabinet is used for the seclusion of the medium.

We are chiefly concerned, however, with what are known as public or promiscuous seances for physical manifestations.

These have been of late years generally marked by the following characteristics:—(1) The seance has been conducted in imperfect light, or in total darkness. (2) The medium has been isolated from the circle, by being placed either in a cabinet or behind a curtain. (3) The sitters have been, either wholly or in part, unacquainted with the subject and with each other. (4) There has not unfrequently been a manifest want of harmony, consequent upon differences of opinion as to the nature and value of the tests employed.

These conditions, usually found in combination, effectually preclude careful and dispassionate investigation; open wide an avenue to fraud; suggest suspicion of its presence even where it does not exist; and in many cases, we fear, expose the medium to very injurious influences.

Such conditions should be allowed to prevail no longer. "Mixed" circles should be as little mixed as possible—mere wonder-seekers, and men whose moral atmosphere is known to be impure, being carefully excluded. Above all, darkness should give way to light. In the early days of Spiritualism public dark circles were the exception, and there is no need for them now. There is abundant evidence that, with mediums of the present day, satisfactory phenomena, including even "form" manifestations, can be obtained without isolation—the medium, where a cabinet is used, being placed near, but outside of it, and in full view of the sitters. But even if this were not so, it is neither wise nor honourable to expose mediums to the risks which have been shown to attend seances held under the conditions that have of late been prevalent; and it were far better that we should have no public manifestations of physical phenomena than that they should be sought under circumstances which, to say the least, inevitably conduce to suspicion.

In view of all these considerations, believing that fraud is not of the essence of this confessedly obscure subject, but rather an accident dependent on faulty conditions of research; feeling that Spiritualists have the remedy for the evil in their own hands, and that without its conscientious application they cannot hope to maintain a fair reputation before the world; we earnestly recommend—That in all public circles held for physical phenomena, the medium be so placed, and in such light, as to be continuously under observation by each member of the circle.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

I receive from various sources newspapers containing attacks on Spiritualism, or reports of debates in which it figures. My correspondents request me to answer these attacks, or notice these discussions. May I be pardoned if I say that it does not seem to me at all worth while to waste time and space on chronicle the fact that the Young Men's Christian Association of Little Pedlington thinks Spiritualism a "dangerous delusion," a "device of the devil," or "a sign of the times"? By all means, if it pleases them. Nor can I think it necessary to repeat over and over again the rapid and fatuous nonsense which some persons are moved to utter about a subject of which it is charitable to suppose they are ignorant. For example, I have before me the report of a sermon published in the Protestant Standard, a paper which I had not before met with. The sermon is reported at length, and is headed, "Spiritualism in Its Coffin! Nailing Down the Lid! Great Sermon by the Rev. J. H. Skewes." Someone, it seems, has sent Mr. Skewes a copy of rules and regulations for conducting a circle. The reverend gentleman objects in limine that there are no such rules in the Bible! This intelligent criticism is supplemented by another of extreme acuteness. Mr. Skewes reads in his rules the fact that "sultry heat, extreme cold, and thunder and lightning" are not favourable conditions for eliciting phenomena. Back he goes to his Bible. What! he cries, there is not a word of this here. Why, Abraham talked to angels when it was too hot to leave his tent! Moses and Elijah were present in the midst of thunder and lightning on Horeb and Sinai; and "Jonah, in the stomach of the whale, must have been sadly cold and uncomfortable, and yet he, and all these, received the most striking manifestations from the invisible world." Prodigious! Jonah holding a seance in the whale's belly! But my readers will hardly want a reply to such tenth-rate twaddle. What manner of man must he be who can seriously utter it! How are they to be pitied who are condemned to listen to it!

The Rev. Joseph Cook is apparently unable to leave Spiritualism alone. The weathercock now points to acceptance of Zöllner, "a Biblical demonologist," as he is pleased to call him. Mr. Cook wants Zöllner's experiments repeated; and thinks that it has not been proved that slate-writing is not a trick. There he mistakes, and makes a common confusion. It has not been proved that some experiments in slate-writing are not tricks. It has been definitely and conclusively proven that some others were not produced by trick, and cannot be counterfeited by sleight of hand. This mental jumble is common. Let Mr. Cook take heart. The Society for Psychical Research is quite as anxious to repeat experiments as he is to have them repeated.

Professor Barrett's last case of mesmeric clairvoyance, in itself very striking, is additionally valuable for some critical remarks made by the gentleman who communicated it to him. The clairvoyante was, we are told, "very sensitive and highly nervous" as a child, and had undergone "two severe attacks of brain fever." "As far as my experience goes (says the narrator) I do not think there is ever any real clairvoyance unless the brain has been acted upon in a singular manner." This startles me. Brain fever, I believe I am correct in saying, is a disease of rare occurrence, and surely all clairvoyants have not been so afflicted. A sensitive child may no doubt shew symptoms of brain disturbance and excitability, but my experience does not lead me to accept without question a statement so sweeping as that I have quoted. It is, however, an interesting subject of research to which attention may well be directed.

The sister of the lady in question, confirming the narrative of Mr. C., adds: "My sister does not now take these long journeys in her mesmeric sleep, as it makes her feel weak and languid for a day or two afterwards." And Mr. C. states that the powers of vision are impaired by a high wind or electrical disturbance; and paralysed by a snow-storm. This is, in some degree, the case with psychics. A disturbed atmosphere (pace Mr. Skewes!) is decidedly antagonistic to the production of psychical phenomena; and an excessive depletion of "the psychic force or power," by whatever name we are to call it, is a source of great lassitude and weakness, even to the extent of causing temporary inability to use the lower limbs. It is as though the spinal column could not support the body; and as if the power of movement were in abeyance. When this passes off, usually after sleep, there still remains frequently a sense of weariness and disinclination for exertion physical or mental. This occurs, in my experience, after an exhausting sitting, analogous to the "long journeys in mesmeric sleep" of the clairvoyante. Is there, then, any reason to believe that the faculty of abnormal vision is similar to the psychic's abnormal faculties? How does the clairvoyante see so accurately as to draw a ground-plan of a place to which she had never been? How does the snow-storm paralyse the power? It is intelligible to me that electrical or atmospheric disturbance may upset the subject herself, and so interfere with the conditions under which her powers can act; but the snow-storm will not do that. Are we to gather that it formed a material obstacle to her vision?

I am relieved from writing anything like an adequate notice of the whole scope of Mr. St. George Stock's book,* by the fact that the philosophy expounded in it has been exhaustively and most ably dealt with by a more competent hand. My few superficial notes aim at nothing like completeness, nor seek to do elaborate justice to what is unquestionably a serious and valuable addition to the literature of Spiritualism. And this is a fact, in spite of the various essays of which the volume is composed having already appeared in the pages of certain magazines. Such publicity is ephemeral, and one constantly desires that a striking article may be preserved in a more permanent form. This is especially the case when a writer is possessed by a particular spirit, which finds expression in various lines of thought, in themselves connected, but severed by the accident of publication. This is so, as the author says in the essays which compose this volume. They are, as he "feels or fancies," pervaded by "an organic unity."

I, however, am concerned, and that only slightly, with such of them as deal explicitly with Spiritualism. I do not presume to intermeddle with the high philosophy which the Spectator, in reviewing the book, has so strangely muddled; nor do I pretend to say to which of the various schools of thought between Positivism and Pantheism—if indeed those be the poles—the author should be referred. But I am by way of being a guide-post, and in the exercise of that humble but useful function, I may point out to my readers that they should not miss such instructive essays as "The Bearings of Spiritualism," "Materialism and Modern Spiritualism," and especially "A New Religion." In singling out these, generally, and the last especially, I must plead guilty to having selected from a book, the whole of which has special charms, both philosophic and literary, that expression of thought which most coincides with my own. I am the more glad to do so that the conclusions, identical with those at which I have arrived, have been reached independently, and, I may add, because I strongly believe that they are not only true in themselves, but are largely over-looked or ignored.

It is, indeed, one of the strangest things to an acute observer, not so much of Spiritualism as of those who concern themselves with it, to notice how completely most of them seem to miss the significance of the subject with which they deal. Each finds in it, no doubt, what he can assimilate, but how strange is it, surely, that the digestive powers are so weak, and the range of appetite so small! Mr. Stock has seen this from the first. I remember in days that now seem very old, how he wondered at the strange want of appreciation of the far-reaching possibilities of Spiritualism. He has seen, and has done much to point out, how portentous is the problem that it presents. And he has rightly grasped one of its grandest and most ennobling conceptions, that man by his life on earth builds for himself his future home, and enters on its possession after death, "exactly what himself and society have made him." In his powerful review of Mr. Stock, "C.C.M." points out that Christianity concerns itself with the regenerate life in man, and not with his future state. This is so, and Spiritualism does much the same. It does, in effect, what Christ did for Judaism. It re-states in terms of to-day what long usage has made familiar and trite. And it proves its case by evidence which the age seeks.

Mr. St. George Stock, with his power of insight, will see, as they whose eyes are open must see, how Spiritualism, considered as a concrete whole, is fulfilling its mission. It has passed through the stage when men merely gaped at it, and came away, some bewildered, some angered, some satiated, some wanting to see more of this strange thing. Its facts have passed out of the domain of wonder, through trial of furious criticism, to that of general acceptance. One of the notes of Mr. Stock's criticism is his absolute acceptance of the phenomena called spiritual as proven facts. It now remains to formulate a philosophy which shall include these facts in orderly arrangement, and shall give some rationale of them. I will not say that Mr. Stock has made any large contribution as yet to that philosophy: it may be expected that he will do so in the future. But he has unquestionably shown Spiritualists a right method of appreciation of the magnitude of the subject with which they deal, and has given us some valuable critical hints for our guidance.

I was mistaken in saying that the experiment made by Dr. Slade with the needle of a mariner's compass was thought then to be new. I find in Zollner's "Transcendental Physics" that as far back as 1867 Fechner witnessed a similar experiment with one of Reichenbach's sensitives. "He caused the sensitive to move a finger to and fro before one of the poles (not over the glass but in front of the case) and thereby the needle began to oscillate, as if an iron or magnetic rod had been similarly passed before the same pole." He tried the same experiment himself, but the needle remained motionless. He satisfied himself, further, that no trick was employed to deceive him. And, lastly, he repeated the experiment in the presence of Professor Erdmann.

I have not had much opportunity of judging of the intelligence of the paper which represents the penny wisdom of that party which has been inadequately described as stupid. That is, no doubt, a libel on many intellectual, though possibly, narrow-minded persons. But though I would by no means use such a term in sweeping reference to a highly-respectable body of men, which includes within it both Lord Salisbury and Lord Randolph Churchill, I am bound to say that it very appropriately and adequately describes a review of certain publications of the Psychological Press Association which appears in England for March 3rd. The writer, who evidently makes acquaintance with the alphabet of Spiritualism for the first time, has got hold of some directions for holding sances, and advice to inquirers. In the course of these directions it is incidentally stated that "increased light will check noisy manifestations." "If this," says the Reviewer, "is not utter nonsense, it is impossible to say what it is." Well, the statement is one of fact, for which I am not responsible, any more than I am for the action of light in photography. The Reviewer's criticism lies ready to his hand, if he is anxious to pursue his quest of "utter nonsense."

TRAVELLING IN SPIRIT.

My mother was confined to her room with an illness which proved to be her last. I was several miles from her, at a place where I lived with my husband and children.

It was an evening in midsummer, when feeling depressed and weary, I lay down to rest, with my youngest child, an infant, asleep by my side. I shut my eyes, and when I seemed to open them I was lying on a couch in my mother's room, with the little one in my arms.

She was looking at me, and I at her, but neither of us spoke. Then the babe began to cry. I felt in darkness for a moment, and then found myself back in my own room, and should have thought it had been a dream, but for the following circumstances. The child looked very pale, and my husband remarked that I seemed over-fatigued, when I joined him downstairs. It was raining hard, and had been for the last half-hour. It was then about half-past eight in the evening.

The next day I received a letter from my mother enclosing a money order, asking me why I left so suddenly the night before with baby; and if we had got wet with the rain; also that she had not heard me come in, but saw me lying on a couch at the foot of her bed!

I went the next day to see her; when the servant asked me if I had called the day before in the evening about eight o'clock, as my mother declared I had; and she was much troubled at my leaving in the rain without an umbrella.

My mother put the same question to me directly I saw her, saying, "I saw you and baby lying on that couch. The child was asleep. You were looking at me, but you looked troubled, and both of you very pale. Then the child began to whimper a little, I looked away for an instant, and then I saw you had gone. It was raining fast; so I rang for the servant to send for a fly to take you to the station; but she said no one had seen or heard anything of you, or your child." I then related to my mother the circumstances above mentioned. She said it was "spiritual communion." She died within a year. J. C.

MARRIAGE OF MISS FLORENCE TEBB.

On Saturday afternoon last, 10th inst., a reception was given by Mrs. William Tebb, at her residence, 7, Albert-road, Gloucester Gate, Regent's Park, previous to the marriage of her daughter, Miss Florence Tebb, with Mr. W. F. R. Weldon, on Wednesday, 14th inst. Among the friends who were favoured with invitations were:—

Miss Arundale, Mr. von Arnitz, Mr. and Miss A.W. Bennett, Mr. and Mrs. Beurlie, Mr. Thos. Blyton, Dr. and Mrs. Campbell, Mr. Guy Campbell, Dr. Collins, Mrs. Coombes, Miss Christie, Miss Martha Christie, Miss Mildred Drew, Miss Christabel Drew, Miss Susan Drew, Mrs. John Edensor, Miss Ellis, Miss Evans, Colonel Earle, Mr. and Mrs. Fleuss, Miss Gale, Rev. Mr. Galloway and Mrs. Galloway, Mr. Hewetson, Mrs. Hewetson, Miss E. Hewetson, Miss Hewetson, Master Alfred Hollins, Mrs. Harvey, Miss E. Harvey, Mr. Harvey, Miss F. Hill, Miss K. Hill, Miss Houghton, Mrs. E. M. James, Miss Lister, Miss M. Lister, Mrs. Robert Leighton, Mr., Mrs., and Miss Lewis, Mrs. Lowe, Miss Major, Mr. and Miss Peele, Miss Philp, Mrs. Petman, Mr. Cornelius Pearson, Mr. E. R. Pease, Mr. Frank Podmore, Miss Mazzucata, Miss Price, Mr. and Miss Shorter, Mr. Sidley, Mrs. Cady Stanton, Lady Coomara Swaney, Mr. and Mrs. R. P. Tebb, Miss Eleanor Tebb, Miss M. A. Tebb, Miss J. C. Tebb, Miss Annie Tebb, Mr. R. Haden Tebb, Mr. A. E. Tebb, Mr. Ernest A. Teitkens, Mr. Tompsett, Mr. A. Vacher, Mr. and Miss Ward, Mr. Walter Weldon, F.R.S., Mr. W. F. R. Weldon, Mrs. Western, Mr. and Mrs. White, Mrs. Alfred Russel Wallace, Mr. Birknell Young.

A room was devoted to the display of the numerous and costly presents to the bride, which were much admired by the company. Vocal and instrumental music was contributed by several students of the Normal College for the Blind, Mr. E. A. Teitkens, Miss Florence Tebb, and others.

The marriage was celebrated on Wednesday morning, at St. Mark's Church, Albert-road, Regent's Park. A large number of friends were present to witness the ceremony, and the family and intimate friends of the bride and bridegroom afterwards breakfasted at 7, Albert-road, Gloucester Gate.

MR. TOWNS' TESTIMONIAL.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to add to your notice in "LIGHT" of 10th inst., concerning the above, that the committee have placed a number of tickets at my disposal for the meeting at Neumeyer Hall, on Wednesday, the 28th inst., at which Mr. Towns' testimonial is to be presented? The prices of the tickets are 5s. for numbered and reserved seats; 2s. 6d. for reserved seats, and 1s. admission. Trusting my supply of tickets may be too small to meet all applications,—I am, yours &c. J. J. MORSE.

OBITUARY.

Raised to the glorious Spirit-land, on the 15th March, 1883, from his father's residence, Highfield, Henry Brayn, Lieutenant R.N., second son of Colonel Brayn, Jersey, in the 33rd year of his age. "His end was peace."

The river and the ocean passed,
The tranquil haven reached at last!
Rest, dear one, with the happy rest,
With those whom love of God has blessed.
Landed, not stranded, on the shore,
Where winds and waves can harm no more.

London, March, 1883.

S. C. HALL.

THE S. P. R.—For the information of members of the Council of the S. P. R., we may state that it has been arranged that a meeting of the Council shall be held on the first Tuesday of every month at 4.45 p.m., at 14, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—We have had the pleasure of inspecting some of the ingeniously contrived photographic apparatus of Mr. Walter Lawley, of 78, Farringdon-street, E.C. His tourist's companion is an extremely useful article for those who go in for amateur photography; and we can imagine nothing more enjoyable than the possession of one of these compact cameras during a walking tour, by which the traveller is enabled to obtain permanent records of the finest pieces of scenery through which he passes, and which have never yet been photographed. The cheap rate at which it is sold, and the excellency of its workmanship, should cause it to be an indispensable portion of the holiday-maker's luggage during the forthcoming summer.

WORK AND WORSHIP.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I trust you will permit me to protest against the misinterpretation of the Bishop of St. Alban's teaching given by "M.A. (Oxon.);" in your last number. The Bishop never intended to suggest that we might neglect the most careful and diligent cultivation of the soil, and trust to Providence for bread. His meaning, which I should have thought was plain enough, is evidently, that in all our works we rely too much upon our own skill, strength, and science; and that we fail to seek the Divine aid of the Almighty to bless, ennoble, and magnify our labours.

This truth, which the Bishop endeavours to inculcate, appears to me to be the most simple and sublime which can be offered for the acceptance and guidance of man. It is in fact the foundation of religion—the key-stone of faith—and without it the superstructure of our minds would be plunged into the lowest depths of infidel materialism. To ignore it is to sin most grievously against the highest principles of Divine government.

Prayer is certainly the most precious privilege ever vouchsafed to suffering humanity; but I can conceive nothing more despicable than a string of lazy, importunate, good-for-nothing, begging-letter petitions addressed to the Deity.

"Work and Worship" must go hand in hand if we would make true and real progress in this world, and deserve the assistance of our beneficent Father. This idea seems to me to be the most instructive, felicitous, worthy and practical in the whole range of religious and philosophic teaching.—Yours, &c.

TRIDENT.

THE JEWS AND THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In "C. C. M.'s" article in your last number, there is a remark quoted from Mr. St. George Stock, "that Judaism, during all its earlier history, had a doctrine of God, without any doctrine of immortality whatever." On this point allow me to give your readers an extract from my book "Pith" (Trübner and Co.):—"The Old Testament Scriptures do not teach the immortality of the soul, in definite, positive, and unmistakable terms. I believe the cause of this vagueness to be, that the immortality of the soul was in the estimation of the Jews regarded as so indisputably an elementary matter of fact—something so entirely taken for granted and considered settled, as not even to require its affirmation; any doubt on the subject would have been considered as the aberration of lunacy. To state the doctrine in so many words in their sacred books, would have seemed to the Jews as ridiculously superfluous as it would appear to us if the Parliament of England were, in an educational Act, to announce that the English alphabet consisted of 26 letters. As the Jews knew nothing about the state of the soul after death, they were very properly silent on the point."

What a deal of time it takes for an idea to reach the public, especially when it proceeds from such an obscure source as that of your humble servant,
NEWTON CROSLAND.

THE MAGNETESCOPE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Mr. Spicer's reference to my letter on the construction of the above instrument is not satisfactory, inasmuch as he does not touch upon the most important part of my objection, viz.: "What prevents the fluid running to earth as the supporting pillar is not insulated?" and it will never turn aside from an easy and direct path to move a pendulum suspended from an arm.

As to silk being a non-conductor, we do not care to go back to 1759 for information, as it is well known to every electrician that there is not such a thing as a perfect non-conductor, but cocoon (undyed) silk is a good non-conductor for all that may be said to the contrary, but requires to be dry before it can be relied upon. I am positive the instrument cannot work if made as described. Many of the readers of "LIGHT" would be glad to have such an instrument if it could be proved to be what is represented.—Yours truly,
J. F. YOUNG.

A Cornish correspondent informs us that a discussion on Spiritualism has recently taken place at Truro. It was opened by the lady of a distinguished church dignitary, and thought-reading was spoken of as an established fact.

DR. S. B. BRITTAN.

For some days it has been in my heart to write a few lines about that great and good man Samuel B. Brittan, who, but lately, passed into the heavens. His name was known all around the world. I should think that any reminiscences of him, from one who knew him intimately, would prove acceptable to those who have read his books.

And now, to begin—if I were asked what ought to be the product of the spiritual philosophy in manhood, in character, in brain, and heart, I should name our friend. Among all the men I have known, in every rank and condition of life, none could measure with him in these respects, according to my thought.

Brittan was by nature an independent thinker, endowed with courage to follow his logic, indifferent as to where it led. That great light which focalised first in the little village of Hydesville, America, fell on him, when he was alone. He received it through his own mediumship. I have had the story from his own lips, and would that I could tell it as eloquently, but I cannot. At that time he was pastor of a thriving church, beloved by everybody, and noted as a pulpit orator. His wife was a lovely and most beautiful woman. A young family was growing up around him. A great future was springing up before him. He had the elements in him of a great leader. He was sure to become the foremost man of his denomination. He knew as well as any man could know what the acceptance of the new truths implied; for he was a sincere man, and to accept the new truths was to give them voice. Then, he must go forth from his "Eden," and his friends would abandon him; and no man ever had a truer love to his friends. Paul, in his speech before Agrippa, said, "I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision;" but then, Paul had no wife and family. Now, I can think of no nobler instance of self-abnegation, of sublime trust in the following of what the mind apprehends to be just and right, than the course pursued by this man. He walked into his pulpit and preached as usual. At the close of the sermon he announced how a great light had come to him; and that at once he must leave the pulpit. There was much weeping, because his people loved him much; and then like Abraham he went out, "not knowing whither he went." There is much of the pathetic in this incident; it was the great soul impelled by the stress of honest conviction to peril all his interests in daring the unseen.

Let me pause here, and speak of some whom I envy. In after years there were those who generously contributed towards helping Dr. Brittan in his work. When, three years ago, he entered upon his duties as "editor at large," one gentleman contributed five hundred dollars, renewed it at the end of the year, and, I believe, gave the same amount as a testimonial last autumn. The name did not appear. But what a privilege that, to be able to hold up the hands of such a man!

Brittan struck his work without loss of time; and made himself felt throughout the length and breadth of the land. A close observer, a sharp student, with mind all open to the heavenly powers, he at once became a positive force. New evidences of the Divine truth of Spiritualism came to him continually. He threw his whole life into the movement. As a clear and convincing writer, as a ready off-hand speaker, none could excel him. Controversy came early, but in this he delighted; and it mattered not to him whether it was by tongue or pen. One debate, in a weekly newspaper he published, lasted over a year, his opponent at last confessing his defeat. Then there were debates from the public rostrum, each speaker being limited to half-an-hour, continued from day to day.

I think the crowning work of his life was in what he did as "editor at large." For years the secular Press had freely admitted to its columns articles prejudicial to Spiritualism, often written by clergymen alarmed at the spread of this new gospel. Brittan answered these attacks; and, let me say it to the credit of American journalism, there was a disposition shown for fair play, in general, and his answers were printed. I believe they have recently been issued in book form by Colby and Rich, of Boston. If one wishes to know just what material was in this man let him read this book. He never left his enemies a foot of ground to stand on. Masterly work this was indeed, and work too, I believe, that will live.

It was my good fortune to know Dr. Brittan on the footing of an intimate friend. For years he was a welcome and beloved guest at my house; and never was man more welcome at any hearthstone. The sunshine seemed always to come when he came. A tall man, straight as an arrow, with a face the kindest, he had a bearing that would have graced any court in any age. He was naturally a gentleman. It was a privilege to entertain him. When he went away we felt as though we had met with a loss; and yet we were conscious of being richer than when he came. Troubles he had, and many; but he seldom referred to them; and when he did it was always in a cheerful way. The great overlying fact of that future world which girts us in seemed always to possess him. He evidently lived in both worlds. I have stood by him in moments of deepest sorrow; when the sweet friend of his youth passed into blessed life; when his noble son, Angelo, faded out into the day. He was crushed; but he never complained. The man seemed to be able to interpret fully just what death means, and to feel that his loved ones were a-near.

Well, he has found the light and life he longed for. It was a brave fight he made and sweet is his victory. I want to throw this bit of laurel on his tomb. It is not much; but it will be seen by thousands who knew him; and it will help to turn their thoughts anew to what is divine in man.

PLANCHETTE WRITING.

A correspondent, signing himself "T.P.B., Lieut. R.A., F.R.A.S.," gives in Knowledge, of March 2nd, an interesting case of Planchette writing. The writer says:—

"Some time ago I began trying experiments with it (the Planchette) having at the time the full conviction that, where no trickery was involved, the writing was done by unconscious action of the hands of the person who rested them on the machine; but this plausible solution, if correct, would entail new ideas of brain action which would be very curious. I had the fortune to have a lady friend for whom the Planchette wrote wonderfully well at all times, so that I was able to try some curious experiments. On placing her hand on the instrument (which I made myself by drilling a hole in the rim of a small plate and inserting a pencil) and asking a question, the answer was written with wonderful celerity, even faster than ordinary writing, and generally very legibly, though in various handwritings none in the least resembling in formation of letters (which I consider a curious point) that of the operator herself. The lady herself did not know what had been written till she had read it. On more than one occasion the information conveyed was known only to myself or to some other person in the room, and therefore, on the hypothesis of involuntary action, could only be explained by a sort of Thought-reading.

"But the experiment I would particularly call your attention to is this. I had several times mesmerised the lady in question, and as usual in such cases, when asleep she could answer any questions proposed, but had no knowledge on awakening of what had happened in the trance. (By the way, I found that, if she had lost or mislaid things in her waking state she could generally say where they were when asleep.) I thought of the experiment, therefore, of causing her to place her hands on the plate when asleep. On asking a question, an answer was written as usual, and before reading it myself, I then asked her what had been written, with the full expectation that she would be able to say. She could not, however! Now this would seem to prove that the words written were not evolved either from the brain in its normal state, or from its peculiar condition in the mesmeric sleep. We must therefore either allow a third state not yet investigated, or come at length to the idea of external supernatural agency, which I am most unwilling to admit.

"A strange point I have observed about the writing of Planchette is, that its character is generally totally opposed to that of the operator. Thus I have seen the most terrible oaths written under the hands of people who would almost die sooner than use such language themselves."

The writer seems to be finding out, as Cahagnet did, that mesmerised subjects oftentimes pass away from under the control of the operator and enter a new state, of which the idea of "external supernatural agency" is the only possible explanation. This is so frequently the case, that mesmerism has been called the vestibule to Spiritualism; indeed, we are inclined to believe that many of the perplexities and anomalies which surround the subject to-day will be cleared up or explained by its aid. We should be glad to see a series of experiments in this direction undertaken by competent and trustworthy observers.

We hear that the Duke of Argyll, whose scientific attainments are of no mean order, has been making experiments with a view to ascertaining whether space possesses a fourth dimension or not. No particulars have transpired, but it is a noteworthy fact that such inquiries are being made. A scientific man in France has also been prosecuting researches in the same direction.

THE "POLTER-GEIST" AGAIN AT WORK.

In the Nottingham Journal for March 5th, 1883, appears the following curious paragraph headed:—"Mysterious Affair at Worksop.—Spirit Rapping Extraordinary"—

"The town of Worksop was in an uproar on Saturday, consequent on the circulation of a report that the household goods of a man named Joseph White, a well-known dealer, were being smashed and removed by an unseen agency. All day long crowds of excited persons wended their way towards the part of the town called the New Building ground, where White's house stands—a semi-detached building in St. John's-road—drawn thither by the exaggerated accounts of the mysterious occurrences. It appears that on Thursday night about eleven o'clock, the family, with the exception of the husband, Joseph White, and the boy George, were partaking of supper, when three raps came at the door leading into the yard at the back of the house, which were immediately repeated as though answered by some persons standing inside the room. Other noises were heard on the stairs, as though certain articles were being thrown down. On examination being made some clothes pegs were found at the foot of the stair; and next morning the boy George, who was in bed at the time, was charged with endeavouring to frighten the people downstairs. He protested his innocence, and the matter dropped. On the following night, the husband being at home and George in bed, as they were preparing to put out the light similar raps were heard, and a corkscrew came rattling downstairs. Immediately the cups and plates upon the table began to rattle, and a cut glass salt cellar was violently hurled against the yard door. A few minutes afterwards it again bounded against the door and was broken to pieces. Then the ornaments on the mantelpiece were agitated, and the pictures on the walls shook on their hanging strings. It was now midnight, and nearly all the crockery in the cupboards had been broken by being dashed to the floor. All the articles were thrown in the direction of the door, and when that was open the cup of milk, the knives, &c., were precipitated into the yard. White sells milk; and the milk cans went up and downstairs twice or thrice, but straggled to say, no one was hit or in any way injured. Black coals, but burning hot, came downstairs, and the whole house was like a demon's den. The household removed into the relative's next door, taking several valuable things with them. On Saturday night a crowd of men occupied the house, and no further manifestations took place."

Should any reader of "LIGHT" desire light regarding the not infrequent exhibition of power manifested, off and on, by the class of noisy and mischief-loving spirit called by the Germans "Polter-Geist"—he may—should he be so fortunate as to possess the volumes of the Spiritual Magazine—consult with advantage Vol. V. (for the year 1864.) There will be found an extraordinary amount of "The Persecution and Expulsion from his Paternal Home of M. Joller, late Member of the Swiss National Council, by Disorderly Spirits," translated from the narrative of M. Joller. These hauntings by cruel spirits, who destroyed the furniture, and rendered the life of M. Joller and his family utterly wretched, finally, as stated above, drove the family from their ancestral home. This occurred close to the Lake of Lucerne, in 1860-62, at Stans. The writer visited, in 1870, the desolate and still uninhabited house. In Vol. VI. of the Spiritual Magazine for 1865, will be found three articles, collected from numerous sources, ancient and modern, of "Stone Throwing," and the throwing about of furniture by the same class of spirits. The reader would also do well to consult Chapter XXXVIII. of "The History of Modern American Spiritualism" by Mrs. Emma Hardinge, for an astounding narrative relating to this disagreeable class of phenomenon—"A circumstantial account of the Spiritual Phenomena witnessed in Ashtabula County, Ohio." In the same "History of American Spiritualism" should be found the details of the frightful persecution endured by Dr. Phelps, about the time of the commencement of the "Rochester Knockings." Regarding the experiences of Dr. Phelps, we read in Howitt's "History of the Supernatural" ("Progress of Belief in America," Vol. II., p. 175):—

"They (the knockings) appeared in the house of a Doctor Phelps, at Stratford, Connecticut—a man of the highest character for intelligence and worth; they frequently cut to pieces the clothes of one of his boys; they threw down glasses, porcelain, snuffers, candlesticks, or dashed them against the windows. He threw open his house to the observation and inquiry of all visitors, but no one could account for what was thus destructively going on. He says, 'I have seen things in motion above a thousand times, and in most cases where no visible power existed by which a motion could be produced. There have been broken from my windows seventy-one panes of glass, more than thirty of which I have seen broken before my eyes.'"

GHOSTS AT OXFORD.

In the new number of the Oxford Magazine there appears the following extraordinarily precise story, authenticated by the editor, of ghostly appearances seen by two undergraduates as lately as last Christmas in one of the colleges in the academic city. The Oxford Magazine is the latest journalistic venture for calling forth the current thought of the eldest of the Universities, both among the Dons and the undergraduates; and the appearance of such an article, in such a journal, is eloquent as to the tendency of opinion in our halls of learning:—

"A STRANGE EXPERIENCE."

"Last Christmas Vacation had well begun; we two were almost alone in College, enjoying the strange quiet which comes over Oxford when the bustle of term-time is over. Our rooms were in an outlying part of the College—in an annexe built some two centuries back, and approached from the quadrangle through a tortuous passage, very puzzling to a stranger. The building almost abutted on the east end of the chapel, and we sometimes thought that it must cover the site of the graveyard of the old monastery, out of the wreck of which the College had risen. There were three stories in the block, two sets of rooms on each story. The 'oaks' of the top rooms were sported, the owners perhaps had been glad enough to escape from their garrets in the roof. My friend's room was on the ground floor, and mine just above it; the other rooms were also empty.

"We were reading hard, grateful for our escape from the busy round of distracting engagements; perhaps, if anything, we were getting torpid in the almost unbroken peace. It was the Ethics that we were reading, a work which does not keenly stir the imagination. In fine, the last thing in our minds was the mystery of the undiscovered country. And as we were neither of us specially credulous, the spirits might have chosen more profitable victims.

"One night about eleven as I was reading by the fire, I was startled by two sharp, loud raps on the inside of the door of an unfurnished room, opening into the larger one in which I was sitting. Now I had been in the room some terms and knew them at most hours of the night and day. Rats there were certainly, but their scramble was familiar. There had never been a noise like those raps before. Perhaps I had imagined them; at any rate I would wait until I heard them again. So I turned my thoughts back to Aristotle, and merged my own identity in that of the anonymuncles whose views the philosopher summarises only to explode. Rap, rap on the door again; no mistake this time certainly, and there was a little asperity, I thought, in the sound. Up I jumped with my lamp, hurried across the room and threw open the door, which had been so strangely knocked at. The room was empty; the window sash had been nailed down and the ventilating pane was shut. No way of escape anywhere, for the only access was through the door I had just opened.

"This was the first obtrusive manifestation that had troubled me. I must admit that long before, when I first went into the rooms, I had noticed that more people passed my door and went up the staircase than ever came down again. But this grew so common that it had ceased to concern me any more than the fowls in the yard below or the carts in the street beyond it.

"Next day, I had forgotten the unexplained noises of the previous night, and, if the intention of the visitant, ghostly or otherwise, had been to excite me, the attempt had been unsuccessful. However, that afternoon I chanced to go out on business about half-past four, leaving my lamp lighted on a little table by the side of my arm chair in front of the fire, so that my seat, on to which a strong light was thrown by the shade, almost faced any one who came in from the staircase. I returned to College at five, ran up the stairs and flung open my door. To my surprise, I saw an old looking man sitting in my chair. I was convinced that he was there, but had no time to form any distinct idea of his dress or countenance, as in a moment he had faded out of his place and I found myself standing in the doorway with the room empty before me. This was something new; the spiritual inhabitants of the College had never shown themselves before in living memory. Here clearly was a region for the Psychical Society to investigate. So I went down stairs to my friend who was reading below, and told him of my hallucination. As he listened to the account, he had the expression of a man who is hearing a striking corroboration of an idea, hitherto scouted as ridiculous. 'Do you know,' he said, when I had told my story, 'this very morning I came suddenly out of my bedroom about eleven o'clock' (his bedroom door, which opened into his sitting-room, faced the fire, the door into the outer passage being in the nearest left-hand corner of the room), 'and saw what I took to be a woman in a long dark dress kneeling down with her back to me on the right-hand side of the fire; she vanished instantaneously—as you say, faded into the air, but I am certain I saw her. Yet I decided not to tell you lest you should laugh at my imagination.'—but now one's first impulse is to connect the two apparitions."

"However, nothing further was seen by either of us, though we both were eager to witness more or, at least, to discover some plausible explanation—but nothing threw light on the difficulty. We had neither of us experienced that form of self-deception previously, and neither since that time has seen anything of a like nature. We can only shrug our shoulders and let the story pass into the dim limbo of the unexplained.—T."

CASE VI.

MESMERIC CLAIRVOYANCE.

In the hope of being able to put the subject of clairvoyance to the test of direct experiment, I wrote in 1877 to Mr. Coates, who was then lecturing on mesmerism in different parts of England, and whose skill and power as a mesmeriser I had heard spoken of highly. Mr. Coates came for some time to Dublin, but was unsuccessful in obtaining any clairvoyant sensitive during the time he was here.* All the ordinary mesmeric phenomena were, however, readily produced by him in my presence; on one occasion I asked Mr. Coates to endeavour to mesmerise an attendant, who was wholly ignorant of what was about to occur, and had never seen, as I subsequently ascertained, any mesmeric experiments. No word was spoken beyond my telling the man to submit to be tried. In a few minutes complete rigidity of one arm was produced, then rigidity of the whole body; resting the man's head on one stool and his heels on another, not only was the whole body inflexibly supported, but I was able to stand upon the man's chest. Throwing a handkerchief over the man's eyes, I silently directed Mr. Coates to demesmerise the man, and after a few backward strokes, the body became limp, and fell to the ground. Several other experiments were tried which convinced me that so far from "expectant attention" being an explanation of what I had seen, it had absolutely nothing whatever to do with it, though I do not deny that this hypothesis may be a vera causa in certain quasi-mesmeric states. Mr. Coates told me he had had one striking case of clairvoyance in his experience, and I begged him to give me as minute and accurate account of it as he could. He did so, and I append it herewith, leaving each reader to form his own judgment on the "figure of merit" it deserves.

W. F. BARRETT.

Menkstown, Dublin.

"During the course of a lecture on mesmerism delivered by me at Blackburn, Lancashire, a young woman (a factory girl) was found susceptible, having been drawn upon the platform out of the audience by the usual mesmeric pass. I found her very sensitive and easily 'biologised.' Afterwards I mesmerised her at the Peel Institute, Accrington, where I subsequently lectured.

"Finding that she was willing to sit for the development of higher phenomena, I again mesmerised her at Accrington on Sunday morning, the 4th October, 1875. Her great anxiety had rather a retarding influence than otherwise, and it took me some time before I could produce a deep mesmeric sleep. I then asked her to visit, in her sleep, her friends in Blackburn. She did so and described her house, or rather lodgings, and the people with whom she lived, and addressed me as if actually in their company.

* A similar want of success attended Mr. F. W. H. Myers and myself in our engagement of another mesmerist in London, who for some months tried in vain to induce the clairvoyant state. The testimony to the reality of the phenomena is, I feel, far too weighty to be overborne by such slight and ineffectual attempts as these, instructive as they are.

"I then called her back and desired her to examine the parlour of the hotel in which we were sitting. She did so, and at first complained of a dark fog or haze surrounding her. I then blindfolded her with cotton wadding and a handkerchief, and again called her attention to the room, when she declared she saw more clearly than before; the fog or haze seemed to disappear, and she became conscious of the possession of perceptive powers unknown to her before. I asked her how she felt and what she saw. In reply she stated that she felt well enough and would not like to come out of the state she was in, and further that the things she saw (describing them) pressed themselves upon her. She did not see as when awake, and could not explain how she saw further than that they pressed themselves upon her; this she said when I looked at any particular article.

"I then directed her attention to the table we were sitting by, asked her to tell me what it was like, and what was on it; this she accomplished without difficulty and seemed greatly elated at her success. At this period of the sitting I awoke her to give the brain a rest, by changing the current of occupation and ideas.

"In the afternoon of the same day I mesmerised her again, and her clairvoyant faculty seemed to make rapid progress at each successive sitting. Having thrown her into the sleep, I commenced at that point of inquiry where I had left off at the morning sitting. I then requested her to fix her attention upon me, and desired her, without verbal communication of any kind, to make certain movements, and she did as I mentally wished.

"I now asked her what I had in my hand. 'A silver-cased hunting watch, unopen.' Right. 'What was the time by it?' Answer: 'Quarter to five o'clock.' Right. A variety of other questions were asked, and in all instances fairly answered. I then requested her to go to Liverpool, and tell me when she got there. In a few moments the answer came, 'I am there now.'* I desired her to tell me what she saw, whereupon she described to me the alterations going on at the Lime-street Railway Station—since completed—St. George's Hall, Brown's Library, &c., and other public places. I then requested her to visit my residence in Liverpool, and tell me what she observed. After describing several streets and conspicuous objects that appeared to her on the way (all of which were described accurately), she eventually came to my house, described the railing in front, the number of steps leading up to the door, letter-box, and plate. She then entered the house, described the hall, the rooms upon the ground floor, and a lady sitting in one of them, mentioned her appearance, and what she was doing, viz., 'She had a work-basket beside her, and an antimacassar in her hand and across her knee.' I was much astonished at this, as I knew it was not my wife's custom to be at needlework on Sunday. Then, recalling what articles of decoration were upon the back parlour mantelpiece,—vases, shells, mirror, &c.—I asked her to look at this particular portion of the room, and tell me what she saw. She did so, and told me the things accurately. But she insisted that there were two pictures in the room more than I was aware of. She described them to me, and informed me where they were hung. I argued the matter with her, and told her she must be mistaken; but she continued most positive in her assertion. I called her back from her somnambulistic visit to Liverpool, and then awoke her. In her normal condition she had no recollection of what took place in the sleep.

"The sequel now remains to be told. I immediately wrote to my wife in Liverpool and asked what she was doing that afternoon from about half-past four to half-past five—giving her my reasons for making such a request, but at the same time not informing her of the details of the sensitive's vision. The reply proved that the clairvoyante was substantially correct. Mrs. Coates did a most unusual thing that afternoon—namely, took out some unfinished needlework, and amongst the rest was an antimacassar, which she looked at and determined to finish next day. In my letter I said nothing about the two new pictures described by the clairvoyante; but, on the following Sunday, having an opportunity of paying a flying visit to my home, I found, to my surprise, that there hung, in the places indicated by the clairvoyante, the two identical pictures she had described. These pictures had been purchased during my absence from home, and placed in their present position a few days before the sitting occurred at Accrington."

* The sensitive had, it seems, been in Liverpool three times previously at the Whitstable holidays, as is the custom with the factory operatives in the adjacent towns; but she had never been to Mr. Coates's house, nor had she any but a vague knowledge of the town.—W. F. B.

PERSONALITY AND THE UNIVERSAL MIND.

I feel satisfied that the introduction into metaphysics of the relative infinite, as a working formula, is necessary to correct and supplement the negative and doubtful positive inferences forced upon us through the limitations imposed by the laws of our mental constitution. By this method of thought, the transformation of metaphysics into mathematical physics, as it were, we can escape from the negation of God in nature, on the one hand, or the blind acceptance of the dictum of a too assertive foreign personality on the other; the proof of the one position and the disproof of the other alike depending upon the imperfection of our instruments of thought when the attempt is made to use them outside their legitimate sphere. As long as we think under the conditions of our bodily organisation we are obliged to express our thoughts in the artificial and arbitrary mode by which, through our ignorance alone, the mind is obliged to conform to the plan of the grosser motions of our bodies acquired in the mere introductory stage of existence, when the preservation of the body is, in the Providence of God, the first of all considerations; and this when we feel convinced that waste both of time and energy is the result, not to mention the actual errors of commission, against which it is impossible to guard from the nature of things. "The laws of thought, in all its processes of conception and of reasoning, in all those operations of which language is the expression or the instrument, are of the same kind as are the laws of the acknowledged processes of mathematics," says a great logician; and if to this we add that the matter of language, i.e., the instrument of the expression of thought, is still that identical matter of the senses which we weigh and measure, and which attracts itself mutually throughout the universe according to the law of the second degree, which is also the law for the expression of the principle of contradiction, (which affirms that it is impossible for any being to possess a quality and at the same time not to possess it), we can, I say, see that while thought may be so far universal in form, yet in the world of appearances it cannot be instantaneous except in terms of a mind which is no longer an aggregate of lesser minds communicating with each other seriatim (and so thinking in time), but a mind whose formal expression of unity is that same law of universal gravitation, which is instantaneously active, and which does not take time to travel from world to world in the depths of that space which Newton himself, on other grounds, called the form of the boundless uniform sensorium of God.

Personality, as formal expression of the reality and sameness of substantial cause, is not conditioned in time, except in so far as, for thought, the soul whose unity it affirms, depends upon formed matter for its manifestations of activity; the motions of which, of course, involve changes in time, and which indeed they may be said to constitute. In other words, Personality is essentially timeless. This is the most certain of all facts, for it is that of existence itself, and so far the personalities of God and man come within the same category. It would appear that granting the existence of a Personal God, that acknowledgment necessarily and logically carries with it an acknowledgment of a state or condition of human activity free from all conditions unessential to the manifestation of the finite in contra-position to, and correlation with the Infinite; and this we can conceive to take place if the human personality is to be preserved, and to be made an object of thought before the actual change has taken place, only in the simplification of the expression of thought, whereby it would be made more comprehensive in one sense, while in respect to time it would be more condensed, through removal or modification of those formal conditions which are unessential to the existence of a soul. And this view, which is founded upon the hypothesis of the preservation of the personality, can be subjectively and symbolically realised in the supposition of any actual increase in our physical and mental powers; for it amounts to no more than that of the falling away of the present material order of affairs, the universe of appearances, including the body itself and the outward eyes, which for the opened internal sense would no longer see as through a glass darkly. It is needless to say that any notion of future, or rather other, existence which does not postulate the personality, is mere word-making, and can mean nothing. But again, it is a matter of tremendous importance; that with the personality in the other state still arises the question of the personality of God; that is, really, the question of God or no God, for an impersonal God is a contradiction in terms and means nothing. The questions of God would still face us in another state of existence, and that is simply equivalent to saying that He is equally relative to all states in which man is man. I therefore refuse to defer the question of the existence of God to any hypothetical future state, preferring to face it now when it is of most importance to those who come after me, and who may be swayed by my beliefs and by my example; and therefore seeing in the assertion of a Man a claim to partake in the essential nature of God, I seek to find something which is common to God, that Man, and myself, something which is, or may be, common to all three. That I find in the fact of personality, and nowhere else. Natural religion can supply us with a generalised view or cosmical theory of the Personality of God; but Christianity alone has asserted that the Personality of God is not different from our own, which, though ever present, will not bear definition in any other terms than those of subjective realisation.

I conclude, therefore, that I must find God through self, and that therefore I must find Him as a Personal Cause, or not at all, for God does not exist in nature objectively, nor is He to be found by analysis. He is neither the sum total of objective existence, nor is He the conclusion of a syllogism. The world for each of us, each, at any rate, of the same species, is an appearance, the same real appearance or manifestation of Divine and Infinite power, and this creation is for each of us, through and with our organism, and given in the unity of apperception, as I remarked before. Only so far as my knowledge of my own powers enables me to influence that world can I do so; and this limitation when removed still permits the equation of cause and effect; for corresponding to the degree of freedom to operate on external natural objects, must always exist the realisation of that orderly manifestation of power in the mind of some spiritual being, except we indulge in the wild speculation that nature is so constituted as not to permit any possibility of disorder, no matter how changed the appearance produced by a vera causa. Any such hypothesis would no more than express in other terms the fact that all change is effected on the lines laid down by a Perfect Being to the exclusion of all finite beings as intermediate agents, a supposition which would materially interfere with our conception of free personality, to save which I have advanced the interdependent conception of the relative infinite.

This idea also helps to save us from the very dangerous position of solipsism, as it has been called, or that of sole occupancy of the universe, a startling conviction of the truth of which forces itself upon the original metaphysical thinker when he first realises the close relation in which the Personality of man stands to that of his Father and Creator.

IF TRUE, WAS IT CHANCE?

The following incident is given in Dr. W. Smith's Memoir of J. G. Fichte, prefixed to his translation of the popular works of the latter (Trübner, 1873), p. 127. "While a French garrison still held Berlin, one of his (Fichte's) students revealed to him a plan, in which he himself was engaged, for firing their magazine during the night. Doubts had arisen in his mind as to the lawfulness of such a mode of aiding his country's cause, and he had resolved to lay the scheme before the teacher for whose opinion he entertained an almost boundless reverence. Fichte immediately disclosed the plot to the Superintendent of Police, by whose timely interference it was defeated. The same young man who acted so honourably on this occasion afterwards entered the army as a volunteer in one of the grenadier battalions. At the battle of Dennewitz his life was preserved in a very remarkable manner. A musket ball, which struck him during the fight, was arrested in its fatal progress by encountering a copy of Fichte's 'Religions-lehre,' his constant companion and moral safeguard, which on this occasion served him likewise as a physical Egidus. On examining the book, he found that the ball had been stopped at these words (p. 249)—'Denn alles, was da kommt, ist der Wille Gottes mit ihm, und drum das Allerbeste, was da kommen konnte'—(for everything that comes to pass is the Will of God with him, and therefore the best that can possibly come to him)!"

"UNCONSCIOUS MEDIUMSHIP."

By F. J. Theobald.

What is mediumship? What are the laws which govern it? Why are not all people mediums?

These are amongst the first questions put by investigators of the wonderful subject of Spiritualism. By means of spirit-writing, my spirit-friends have told me that medial gifts lie latent in every human being. They compare them to telegraphy, the wires being in order and capable of use when mediumship is developed. But in a vast majority of cases, because of the long prevailing disbelief and antagonism to all supernatural matters, these telegraphic wires are out of order and unusable.

One of our veteran Spiritualists said to me a short time ago, when speaking of the difficulties of investigating these most marvellous and intricate subjects, that "mediumship, whilst beyond the ken of exact science, is not beyond the reach of reverent observation. But," she added, "the Spirit which bloweth where it listeth, must be waited on, not dictated to." One thing only do we know with certainty—i.e., that this is the power which supplies the link in the magnetic chain, connecting the two worlds—the natural and the supernatural—and by placing the unseen intelligences en rapport with us in the body, enables us to receive communications in various ways.

This is no new power; for there is no form of mediumship, now well-known amongst Spiritualists, but what has its parallel, or counterpart, in the experiences given of the men of old; not only throughout the sacred records, but in the ancient history of all past ages. Throughout the Scriptures these experiences are spoken of as "from the Lord," or "from the angel of the Lord." The New Testament gives, in our Saviour's life on earth, an unbroken testimony to the intimate connection between us, in the body, and our spirit guides, who are sent to us as "ministering spirits." * Thus we learn that the lives of all eminent men and women, through all past ages, down to the present day, if read in the light thrown upon human experience by the knowledge of Spiritualism, are full of intensely interesting accounts of what we may call "Unconscious Mediumship." Great discoverers, eminent poets, prominent statesmen, &c., furnish numerous remarkable proofs of being led by a superior power. Ignorant scepticism and superstition have done their best to stifle the recognition of this fact; and, consequently, infidelity, agnosticism, and dense materialism were growing rampant everywhere, when happily this strong influx of so-called "Modern Spiritualism" came into our midst irresistibly. Latent medial power has been developed universally and simultaneously throughout the world; bringing undoubted proofs of the existence of an unseen universe; of the close presence of those dear ones who have passed "within the veil"; and thus presenting a "new basis" of belief in immortality, which cannot be overthrown by the densest materialism. At last, the scientist is met on his own ground, and supplied with scientific proofs, irresistible and incontestable. For tangible, solid facts, accumulating almost daily, now take the place of mere theory, and confound even the most persistent doubter.

William Howitt's invaluable work, "The History of Supernaturalism in all Ages," shews how these mediumistic gifts have been always in our midst. The Romish Church accepts them. Its mediums are "saints," whose lives and spiritualistic experiences are carefully recorded; and the priests or other functionaries of that Church guard the fact of mediumship with tenacious care, denying its exercise to the laity. A relative of my own, who was a Roman Catholic priest, once said to me, "Yes, F., I believe in Spiritualism. In the Church 'tis from God; out of it from the devil!" Poor fellow! before many weeks had passed away he was called to his spirit home. Shortly afterwards he came, and, writing through my hand (by spirit-power), told me how his eyes were then, at least, open to the fact that the good of Spiritualism was by no means confined to the Romish Church; but, as he said, "The Orders did me good; they helped me, if they could not help you."

Our Protestant Church, on the other hand, repudiates these gifts. "He has a devil"; "it is all witchcraft"; "the necromancy denounced in the Bible"; Spiritualists are "afflicted with diluted insanity"; "beneath notice"; "candidates for Bedlam"; "all mediums are of a low moral type"; "dishonest, crafty," &c., &c.—such choice denunciations are specimens of the kind of reception mediums meet with from the orthodox party of the present day. And yet the fact remains—as we Spiritualists well know—that "unconscious mediumship" exists, and usually forms a beautiful characteristic in the lives of the most eminent Christians! How little do these good people suspect that it is, indeed, by means of the little understood, and (by many of them) the much deprecated power of spiritualistic mediumship, they are themselves brought so closely into communion with the high spheres of angel life. It is with the hope of drawing the attention of such true followers of Christ to a knowledge of their own real condition, as spirit mediums, to enable them to judge more wisely and to cease their antagonism to the important subject of Spiritualism, that I offer the following record of instances of "unconscious mediumship" in the lives of a few of Christ's own children.

Instances of "unconscious mediumship" are of frequent occurrence amongst the poor and uneducated classes. Mr. D., a friend, who has for years been minister in a small, rustic village, about thirty miles from London, tells me that several of the poor people in his congregation used to relate to him most beautiful visions, dreams, or supernatural experiences which came to them. Although until recently he knew nothing of Spiritualism, which now makes all such things clear, Mr. D. never attempted to argue them out of what he felt to be real truth, and of great good to them. One circumstance of great interest he related to me, saying that it was much talked about at the time it happened, some few years ago; and he can, with many others, testify to its truth.

Mrs. A., an eminently good old lady, living in the village—one who had for years been subject to beautiful visions—was slowly sinking. A good man, living near, was visiting her one day, talking with her. She was telling him of her great happiness and her confident hopes for the future, when all at once her countenance brightened, and holding up her hand, she exclaimed: "Hark! What lovely music! Can you not hear it?" "No," he replied: "I hear nothing." "Open wide the case-ment," she exclaimed, "then you will hear it!" And surely, to his intense astonishment, he did, as he declares, hear the most exquisite music, upon acceding to her request to throw the window wide open, and yet it was of a character that made it impossible that it should come from an external source! Mrs. A.'s daughter inherited her good mother's medial gifts, and so freely spoke of her experiences that, unhappily, the poor woman was at last placed in an asylum by those about her, who, being ignorant of the subject of Spiritualism, attributed her visions, &c., to hallucination and insanity. Mr. D. tells me he never saw any reason why she should be thus treated, for upon all points but the one—which we understand to have been "unconscious mediumship"—she was acknowledged to be perfectly sane.

One good old Christian, who served in our family as nurse for many years, became much interested in Spiritualism as soon as she knew of it, in connection with our home experience. As she remarked, it explained to her many strange incidents in her life, for she proved to be a remarkable medium. She told us that many times when in trouble she had been cheered and helped by the appearance of a bright, beautiful spirit. This spirit would speak to her audibly, usually quoting some text of Scripture especially adapted to her need. These experiences came to her when wide awake, sitting in her room, or even whilst walking in the street. One very remarkable instance occurred to her when a child. She was walking near Shoreditch Church, when a spirit stood before and spoke to her a few loving words of good and appropriate advice. As she was watching the vision with great astonishment, a lady—a perfect stranger—who was passing at the time, suddenly stopped, and speaking to the child, said, "You heard that voice, my child, did you not? Never forget what the spirit told you. Now, run home to your mother!" The audible spirit-voice is of frequent occurrence at our spiritualistic séances or among mediums, but it was very remarkable for this vision, out of doors, in a bustling London street, to be seen by two people, strangers to each other.

I think perhaps it will not be out of place to relate a little incident which took place when Nurse Ford (as we called her) was staying with me whilst I was keeping house for a cousin during her absence from home. One of the children had been suffering from neuralgic face-ache for a fortnight, and all our efforts to relieve it had proved useless. Early one morning (at four o'clock) I was suddenly completely aroused out of a sound sleep by a spirit-voice, saying loudly and clearly, as from the bedside: "F., get up directly; go and give Teddy, Chamomilla 200." In an instant I was out of bed, and, taking my medicine chest in my hand, ran up to the poor child, and gave him the prescribed remedy. In a very few minutes he was sound asleep, and on awaking in the morning was so far well that a little mesmerism given during the day (which had been as useless as other remedies before) completed the cure.

When I saw Nurse Ford she said to me:

"Ah, Miss F., God sent you to Master Teddy in answer to my prayer. I had been up and down to the poor child all night, and felt so distressed at his cries that at last I prayed very earnestly that God would send help quickly. And as I prayed I heard you open your door and come up to him, and then he was quiet, and I knew my prayer was answered."

A few times in her life Nurse Ford received some beautiful visions, or dreams. They puzzled her much when she received them, being highly symbolic. But even to her uneducated mind the explanation was clear when the literal interpretation was given to her some months later, and when the vision had passed from her mind, only to be recalled by its fulfilment.

SUCCESSFUL SEANCES WITH MISS WOOD.

A few of us in connection with Spiritualism at Newcastle, lamenting the undignified and disastrous results ever recurring through the unsatisfactory, and oftentimes loose, methods under which phenomena are sought, have for some few years strongly recommended that all mediums should be seated at séances in full view of the sitters. Not being able to enforce those views on the majority, and circumstances not permitting us to act independently, we have, until recently, been unable to satisfactorily experiment in the same direction. However, since the return of Miss Wood from the South, we have been so far fortunate as to succeed in having a course of séances with that lady, which, after many failures, and the exercise of much patience, have had results better than many of the friends anticipated.

The séances have been held in the house of a lady in Northumberland-street, who has kindly devoted her dining-room to our purpose for several weeks past. The room is about 17ft. broad by about 23ft. long, the fire-place and door being at extreme ends from each other. We improvised a cabinet in the corner of the room at the left of the fire-place. It was put up for, and taken down after, each séance. The light was modified by covering the globe of a chandelier furthest from the cabinet, with a thin light brown paper, which permitted us to have a good sized jet of gas, which, through the medium of the paper, diffused a dusky grey light over the room, enabling the sitters to comfortably distinguish each other and to easily observe every motion of Miss Wood, whom we had seated about a foot from the cabinet, after dressing her in a white jacket and placing a white antimacassar over her head. Each evening we commenced our sittings about 8 p.m., and concluded them about 10 p.m.

The first séance, held on January 26th, was without results.

The second séance was held on January 30th. The medium, under control, was removed four feet from the cabinet, and the curtains, by some invisible power behind them, were stretched forward until they touched the person of the medium.

The third séance was held on February 2nd. We attached a piece of white paper to the centre of the outside curtains to better distinguish their movements. The medium was again removed to about four feet from the cabinet, and the curtains from within were pushed out to the knees of the medium, and a stick placed in the cabinet was stretched forth from the aperture.

The fourth, fifth and sixth séances were, in phenomena, a repetition of the above, with one exception. We insisted upon the control leaving the medium seated where we had placed her—a foot from the cabinet—as we thought that at the distance of four feet the prospect of phenomena such as we desired would be almost nil—for the present at least.

At the sixth séance, on February 16th, we had a somewhat remarkable experience. We had sat for about an hour and three-quarters, when a "report" occurred inside the cabinet about as loud as that made by an ordinary cracker, which startled some of the ladies. Pocha thereupon took possession of her medium, and told us that they had just about succeeded in building up the power required preparatory to making themselves visible to us, when by a movement of the curtains from within a ray of light had "fallen upon their battery" and exploded it, annulling the probability of results for that sitting.

The seventh séance, held February 20th, was a most satisfactory one. After all our waiting and watching, patience and perseverance triumphed, and we obtained the results desired. We had sat for about an hour and a-half, enjoying ourselves as best we could by singing and conversing, when, from the left aperture, the medium being in full view all the while, a small form appeared, and, with some difficulty, moved outward towards the right of the medium. After making a few intelligent motions in answer to the inquiries of the sitters, the form retired behind the curtains, and in the space of a few minutes made its appearance at the right aperture of the cabinet, and moved forward about two feet from the curtains. The little form then began to speak to us in a faint and broken voice, but quite intelligible to those at the end of the circle. For a short time it moved backward and forward between the medium and cabinet, and finally disappeared. During the time the small form was visible, which purported to be that of Pocha, the guide of Miss Wood, it was quite distinguishable and distinct from that of the medium.

The eighth séance, held February 23rd, was fairly successful, the light being good and the medium between nine inches and a foot from the cabinet. After sitting for about two hours, Pocha made her appearance from the left of the cabinet, moved to the right of the medium, and in a short time returned back to the cabinet, and disappeared behind the curtains. This form, like that at the previous séance, was clearly distinguishable from the form of the medium.

The next séance was unfruitful of phenomenon; but the tenth séance, held March 6th, was a most successful one. The light was so good as to enable the sitters to distinguish each other easily, and Miss Wood, who was dressed in a white jacket, was very clearly visible. After sitting for about an hour, a chair which we had placed at the right of the cabinet and against the wall, on which we had put a small bell and a paper tube, was dragged by some power from within the cabinet until it disappeared behind the curtains. The bell was afterwards thrown from the cabinet, and for some time we could hear a great deal of noise going on behind the curtains as if the chair was being violently knocked about. This we found to have been the case at the end of the sitting, the chair having the appearance of being rudely dealt with, as a piece of the back was knocked off. After sitting for a few more minutes the curtains at the left divided and a form about five feet three inches in height, clothed in very white-looking garments, shewed itself clearly to all present, and stood at the aperture, a distance of two feet from Miss Wood, who kept motionless all the while. The curtains for about a foot from the floor at the aperture where the form appeared, did not open. This enabled those of us who sat directly opposite to the right side of the medium, to clearly discern from the floor upwards, so far as physical vision could aid us, that the form and the medium were completely separated from each other. After remaining at the division of the curtains for a few minutes the form retired and the séance concluded.

We consider those séances to be highly satisfactory, and believe that if we could have been favoured for some time longer with the presence of Miss Wood in Newcastle, the results of such sittings as those (with the medium outside the cabinet, and visible to all the sitters) would have enabled us to procure most remarkable phenomena.

We shall yet have a few more séances with Miss Wood, which, if productive of phenomena worthy of notice, I shall report in due course.

HENRY BURTON.

3, Clifford-street, Byker, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

P.S.—Mr. Kersey and Mr. Thompson, President and Vice-President of the Newcastle Society, together with other well known Spiritualists, as Messrs. Colman, W. C. Robson, Mrs. Hammerbon, and others were present at the above séances.

Any further information regarding the above can be had by writing to the above address.

THE METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.—It was announced from the platform of St. Andrew's Hall, on Sunday last, that the evening of Sunday, April 8th, is to be reserved for "Questions and Answers." The audience and all interested in testing the fact, as well as the quality and resources, of cultivated trance speaking are invited to attend with written inquiries of general interest, guaranteed by the signature of the writer, and under cover. The papers will be opened in the presence of the audience, and the occasion be known as a "ballot night."

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

CONTRIBUTED BY JOHN S. FARMER.

The "Banner of Light."

Our Boston contemporary contains much of interest. Mr. J. J. Morse contributes the thirty-third instalment of a bright and gossipy series of "Echoes from England." Why, however, does he characterise the recent action in regard to dark and cabinet séances as a "scare"? Surely he will admit that there was a deep-rooted and widespread evil to be eradicated. We fail to see any "scare" in the matter. On the contrary, it appears to us that the whole position was thoughtfully and earnestly considered, and the signatories to the circular (of which he was one) were not people to attest anything without duly weighing the matter. We look upon the result as the surest indication of the soul of good upon which Spiritualism is based that has come to light for many a long month. The sore was an ugly one, but the pruning knife was used by a zealous hand tempered with discretion.—The Secular Press Bureau, under the presidency of Professor Henry Kiddle, vice Professor S. B. Brittan, now among "the greater number," continues to do good work on its own particular lines. This time the attack made on Spiritualism by the Rev. W. D. Faunce is answered in the paper where it originally appeared—the Washington Chronicle. The clerical denunciation appears to have been of the usual stale and threadbare kind—a sort of Quixotic windmill fight. When will the religious teachers of the people learn to distinguish between "things that differ," and recognise the fact that Spiritualism offers them aid in the direction where they most want it, and which they can obtain nowhere else? It is certain that the absence of evidence such as Spiritualism supplies constitutes a very vulnerable point in their armour of defence against the onslaught of materialism. Even to demonstrate that matter is not all that is contained in the universe is something, and that can surely not be counted entirely antagonistic to the things of the spirit.—Extracts are given from an article in Harper's Monthly for February, detailing some of the psychological experiences of J. G. Whittier. The author, Mr. G. M. White, says that the Quaker poet has admitted to him that he is sometimes able to read the thoughts of persons in the same room with him.

"Medium."

"Zöllner" on Spirit, Matter, Time, Space, the Fourth Dimension," a discourse through Mrs. C. L. V. Richmond, is the pièce de résistance this week. Some of the illustrations used remind us very forcibly of Zöllner's lines of thought, e.g., those drawn from astronomy, in which science the professor was a distinguished and enthusiastic observer. It is pointed out that nearly everything is impossible if measured by one man's experience, or even by that of the wisest man, or that of the whole world, if experience were all. No one has seen the stars made or grow, and yet who would declare them impossible when they are filling space with their presence? So with many of the realities of spiritual existence. We cannot discover their why or wherefore, yet indications are not wanting that they exist.—We are glad to notice that our young people are catered for. The tone of "Lonely Little Lara" is healthy and well adapted to young minds, to say nothing of much that will interest children of larger growth. Much that is of sterling worth can be inculcated by means of fiction, where other means would fail to arrest the attention. Upon the whole, the number is a very interesting one.

GOD CALLS OUR LOVED ONES.

With silence only as their benediction
God's angels come,
Where, in the shadow of a great affliction,
The soul sits dumb.
Yet would I say, what thy own heart approveth,
Our Father's will,
Calling to Him the dear one whom He loveth,
Is mercy still.
Not upon thee, or thine, the solemn angel
Hath evil wrought;
Her funeral anthem is a glad evangel—
The good die not.
God calls our loved ones, but we lose not wholly
What He hath given;
They live on earth, in thought and deed as truly
As in His Heaven.

SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE.

On Monday evening next, at 7.30, Mr. J. W. Slater, editor of the Journal of Science, will read a paper before the members and friends of the C.A.S., 38, Great Russell-street, on "Spiritualism from a Scientific Point of View." The admission will be free, and it is very desirable that there should be a large attendance. Mr. Slater, though not a Spiritualist, has always claimed for Spiritualists a fair and impartial hearing; and the members of the C.A.S. ought in return to give an attentive ear to what he has to say from his own standpoint as a man of science.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON &amp; THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL, 14, NEWMAN STREET, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

"The Coming Priest," as exhibited here on Sunday last by the controls of Mr. Morse, has to be approached in the manner oratorically dear to the friends of the still robust Head-Master of Parliamentary finance, whose Budget methods of the recent, but already fading past, invariably covered a preliminary discursive review of the situation, a critical analysis of alternatives, a summary, and then—the resolution. In like manner was introduced "The Coming Priest." The subject has a past and a present aspect, each of which must receive intelligent attention before the certain future can be appreciated. Priesthood is not necessarily priestcraft; and however much of latent tyranny there may be in the social ostracism which assails the critic of this department of human activity, there is a degree of toleration of differences of opinion, and of freedom of expression, which protects us from the burnings of the "days of the long ago." For the purposes of this review we may wisely disregard the contentions of opposing parties; but the elementary point of intrinsic value in all such inquiries must be kept well in mind if judgment is to command or to deserve respect; and special circumstances of time and degree should always be fairly considered; for that which was valuable, and perhaps essential, 2,000 years ago, is not, as a mere matter of course, appropriate now, while it may become distinctly antagonistic in much less than 2,000 years hence. It is quite true, however, that when exceptional powers, prerogatives, or privileges are claimed, there is more than ordinary reason to bring the test-question to the front, and ask, is there an adequate return of good? Are the sacrifices, or is the surrender of the community demanded by the necessities of the case? If the unbiased general intelligence replies in the negative, the claim should be resisted and the institution or function suppressed or modified. It is scarcely necessary to say, from this platform, that man is a spiritual being, that his spiritual powers enable him to sustain relations with other spirits, and that these powers and relations, allied with the higher spirituality of their source, of their God, are the heritage of every man, past, present, and future. Now the spiritual nature of some persons is more pronounced than of others; they are in consequence more competent to judge of the needs and qualities of spiritual life, and that characteristic is at once the true element and abiding foundation of fitness for the priestly office, and the rational justification for its conditional existence. With the fact, however, comes the risk. These exceptional persons, being few in number and relatively strong in influence, soon discover that they inspire a degree of awe which requires, from them, only a moderate indulgence of craft and cunning to presently convert into fear and dread, from which standpoint a mighty force is drawn either for uplifting or for debasing humanity. The vocation of the spiritual guide or priest is to train his pupils or hearers for a happy future; but there is and always has been, arising out of the varied conceptions of different nations of the character of that future, an infinite diversity of method in the work. The priest of Eastern lands, of the teeming millions of India and China, of the interior of Africa and elsewhere, as well as of European civilisation—whether gorgeously robed ecclesiastics or simple fanatics at the street corner—are all engaged in the endeavour to solve the mysteries of life and being, and all, when not sham, are deserving of respect. They are representatives of one or another aspect of truth which, in prince or beggar, is alike deserving of honour, for truth is the voice of God, and he who gives it utterance is God's best priest. Using the phrase in no invidious sense it may be said that in greater or less degree the priest exists by reason of the ignorance of those whom he teaches, while his pretensions differ widely from those of the secular instructor, for he claims a lien upon your conscience now and hereafter, and insists that you must accept his views of truth and no other. If you can persuade him to come down from his pedestal, and be satisfied with the grade and character of the poet, or artist, or other secular teacher, and, discarding his affectation of ranking as intermediary between God and man, to stand or fall upon his own merits, discharging his duty as guide, and leaving results to your awakened or educated conscience, you will, said the lecturer, most emphatically, "be doing the world most signal service." Let the priest thus learn to be manly, honest, brave and open first, and minister next. Having conceded that under certain conditions and with certain reservations spiritual teachers are needed, it must be added all the same, that you have within you the power of educing your own spiritual qualities, and you must remember that your present life and character, not the priest's, nor your own fancies or beliefs, shape and determine your future. In a certain sense indeed—and the risk is a real one—the priest may be regarded as a grievance. His functions lead him to dwell upon the future of life, and he does so until a species of mania is developed in himself; but if character and work and effort are to determine your future,—and that is indubitably true,—your most urgent concern is how to compass the obligations of the present. If, however, your higher nature is to express itself, you must clear the lower to aid the growth, and this is a purely spiritual process. When this is achieved you will find yourself under constraint to mix with and work for the world, to share and bear its trials and failings, to teach the miserable of the better ways, and of the present-day necessities of life and progress. Bear in mind that you are each and all physical, intellectual, and spiritual agents, with qualities related to things immortal, and that by living up to a high standard you do truly become sons and daughters of your God. Whence and when will appear this coming priest? Shall we look to Sinai or burning bush or palace wall for an intimation of his presence? From none of these will he come, for only when priestcraft is dead, ecclesiasticism buried, and creeds and rituals forgotten will he appear—not as a discrete embodiment but as a concrete expression." Every cultivated spiritual nature and upright man and woman is the coming priest. With higher conceptions and sounder judgment each shall labour for the good of others to his own perfection; with glory around and Divine Providence within, each shall breathe of the melodies of the music of the spheres, not as of a poet's dream, but as a blissful and assured reality. Hail then to the coming priest, to God manifest in the perfection of humanity, when His priest shall be every son and daughter of man.

The readers of the above abstract will be better enabled to appreciate the comprehensive grasp of the ideas of the eloquent guides of the lecturer,—especially as they are grouped around the selfhood of man and the development of the innate divinity of his nature—by again referring to the Humanity series as summarised in recent numbers of "LIGHT."

BLACKBURN.

Exposure of a Medium.

Mr. R. Wolstenholme, 4, Preston New-road, Blackburn, writing on the 6th inst., gave us an account of a suspected fraud, expressing at the same time the regret of the Spiritualists of Blackburn that duty made it imperative on them to ask that the report should be published. The narrative, slightly abridged, is as follows:—

Last week the members of the Blackburn Psychological Society held a series of séances at their rooms in Darwen-street, with a view of obtaining the phenomena known as "spirit-materialisations," and engaged Mr. Michael Chambers, of Gateshead, near Newcastle, a well-known "physical medium," to give six sittings for that purpose. The conditions imposed were very stringent. The medium was placed in a cabinet, of which the back, one end, top, and bottom were composed of wood put together with screws from the outside—the front and one end being covered first of all with strong wire netting one and a-half inch mesh, mounted upon a wood frame, and over the netting was a fine black gauze, thus rendering it impossible for any but the very smallest particles of matter to pass through. Bells and various musical instruments were placed on the floor immediately outside the cabinet, and the whole was closed in by a green baize curtain hung about half a yard from the cabinet. Six gentlemen were appointed to examine the arrangements at the opening and close of each séance. On Monday the results were nil as regards materialisation, and a certain "Lottie," understood to be the medium's familiar control, stated that with conditions so severe as those imposed, it would be some time before the phenomena sought could be obtained, if at all. This gave rise to considerable discussion in the circle and it was ultimately decided to remove the gauze for the two following nights and then restore it for the remainder of the week. On Tuesday evening the gauze was accordingly withdrawn, but still no spirit forms appeared and "Lottie" announced that a perfect harmony had not been established between the medium and the sitters, and that to effect this it would be necessary for the medium to leave the cabinet for one night at least and sit in the midst of the circle. Consequently on Wednesday evening the cabinet was abandoned and the medium was placed in a chair in the centre of the circle, the bells and musical instruments being placed within easy reach. A certain process of tying the medium to his chair was gone through but in a somewhat perfunctory manner, for this being merely a preliminary sitting for the purpose of getting up power, so to speak, it was not considered desirable to be very exacting in the matter. And as if to reward the sitters for the confidence displayed an abundance of phenomena was showered upon the company. No spirit forms made their appearance, but of course there seemed to be a tacit understanding that none were to be expected that evening. The jingling of bells, snatches of tunes upon a tiny piano, and various other trifles of that sort amused the circle until closing time, when it was announced by the control that the medium must sit in their midst for one night more. To this proposal many of the sitters would have fain agreed, but several of the sterner sort set their faces strongly against the proposal, and when Thursday evening came round the medium was led reluctantly back to the cabinet but under the relaxed conditions that the wire netting was removed and the black gauze only secured the cabinet. A rumbling and tumbling within the cabinet, distinctly heard above the singing of the circle, certain faint and indefinite notes of music from behind the curtains, and "Lottie's" gossip were all that rewarded the patience of the circle on the fourth night. Before saving the control gave orders to sit in the same manner on the following evening, and on Saturday to wind up with a grand amalgamation of all the forces in the circle with the medium in their midst. On examining the cabinet at the close of this séance several suspicious circumstances were noted by one of the examiners, but as he could not be quite certain about them he kept his thoughts to himself, but determined to make quite sure of the fastenings on the following evening. Accordingly on the Friday evening everything was done that ingenuity could devise to guard against imposture, although the medium remained in blissful ignorance that any suspicion was entertained against his good faith. The séance proceeded as before; strains of instrumental music were added, and a bell was rung vehemently, keeping time to the tune the company were singing, and the general enthusiasm was raised to a high pitch. Presently the sound of the bell and the instrumental music died away, the company being exhorted to continue to sing. At length silence was asked for, and the circle were given to understand that the spirits were building up nicely, and might be expected out before long. Finally "Lottie" informed the company that there had been three forms out but they were of rather too ethereal a substance to be visible to any but persons of the keenest vision, but if the sittings could go on for another week they were certain to get amazing results. Lights were then turned up, and the examiners called on to see that all was right. It was then found that the gauze had been tampered with during the séance. A hole 11 inches long had evidently been made in the gauze about 18 inches from the floor to allow the medium to reach the musical instruments, and had been rudely stitched up again by the medium, but the dog-teeth of his work were such a contrast to the neat running stitch of the lady who had sewn it, that everyone present was convinced that the whole performance was an unblushing and wretched clumsy imposture. A demand was made that the medium should be searched, but he declined to submit to "so great an indignity." He was accompanied to his lodgings and there admitted having a needle and thread in his possession, having procured them to repair a certain part of his garments, and might possibly have done the act under the influence of the spirits, but was utterly unconscious of it. It need not be said that this explanation was rejected with scorn; and that Saturday morning saw Mr. Michael Chambers en route back to Newcastle, whither a report of his imposture would speedily follow him. The Blackburn Spiritualists declare themselves to be by no means dismayed or discouraged by this in one sense untoward result, feeling that the exposure of imposture is the next best thing to obtaining genuine phenomena, and that until their ranks are purged from imposture Spiritualism will remain under a cloud in England. They avow their intention to proceed with their investigations and will spare no pains or expense, providing they can secure the services of a medium who will submit to sit under the test condition of a cabinet constructed of wire netting and muslin gauze.

[If our friends at Blackburn will read the report, given in this week's "LIGHT" at page 129, of séances held with Miss Wood at Newcastle, they will find that there is a much better method of obtaining satisfactory phenomena than that which they have themselves adopted. To seclude a medium from observation so completely, as was done in the case of Michael Chambers at Blackburn, was little better than a direct invitation to fraud. Had he been made to sit in the light from the very first his pretensions to mediumship—if they are really nothing but pretensions—would have disappeared long ago.—Ed. "LIGHT."]

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—On Sunday morning last, Mrs. E. W. Wallis, lectured in an able manner from the N.E.S. platform, upon "Lights and Shadows of Spiritualism." In the evening she discoursed most pathetically on "Love Stronger than Death," and on the Monday evening addressed an attentive and intelligent audience on "How to make the best of both Worlds." Mr. Kersey occupied the chair, and Mr. Thompson, vice-president, proposed, and Mr. J. Robertson, of Glasgow, seconded a vote of thanks to the lady and her guides for the interesting and instructive discourses she and her guides had delivered to them. The motion was carried with acclamation and suitably responded to. Apropos of my statement about Michael Chambers, in last week's issue, I may state that the friends at Blackburn have been sorely aggrieved at a most degrading exhibition of that supposed medium's dealings with them, the cabinet they placed him in having been as deliberately and wilfully tampered with as were the screws in the Newcastle cabinet (which case I reported at the time), which led to his removal by the then committee. His doings at Newcastle, Windy Nook, and the Felling have driven numbers of zealous investigators from further examination of the subject, and caused us, who are doing our utmost to benefit the movement in the North, to bear an unnecessary amount of reproach and bitter opposition, which might be avoided if those doubtful friends to the movement who extol and advertise him, were to be ruled by a regard for the fair fame of Spiritualism.

GATESHEAD.—Last Sunday evening Mr. J. G. Gray lectured on the "Utility of Spiritualism." The subject was handled by the lecturer in his usual energetic and earnest manner. At the end of his discourse he gave an inspirational poem, which appeared to gratify some of those present. Mr. Burton occupied the chair. On Easter Monday the annual tea meeting will be held.—NORTHUMBRIA.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffmann, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mays, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism and also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butler of, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

It is not a practice of mine to defend myself from any criticism that may be intelligently passed on what I write. I have, indeed, little need to do so; and I have not infrequently been instructed by a kindly critic. Unintelligent and unconstructive criticism is best left alone, and there is not in "Trident's" remarks anything which I should have felt it necessary to notice had he not charged me with "misinterpretation of the Bishop of St. Albans' teaching." My note was intended to be a reductio ad absurdum of what does not strike me in the way that it shews itself to "Trident." I see nothing honouring to God or honourable to man in the doctrine of human duty and Divine intervention stated by the Bishop in his letter, and re-stated by "Trident" in a very modified form as what the Bishop intended or did not intend to suggest. I have not the advantage of knowing the Bishop's intentions. Here are his words:—"My dear Mr. Archdeacon,—The feeling is strong among Christian people, and gains strength daily, that in our present distress we should as a Church and nation humble ourselves before God, and make our supplication to Him to cause His anger to cease from us. For we cannot doubt that our sins have brought these sorrows and distresses upon us. We thought vainly a few years since that we could double the productiveness of the earth by our skill and contrivance. We had become vain in our imaginations, and our foolish heart was darkened. We forgot—indeed many among us, do openly deny—that it was He, the living God, who gave us rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness. So He hath withdrawn from us the fertilising warmth of sunshine and hath sent upon us a plague of immoderate rain and waters." Those words abundantly bear out my reading of their meaning. And I entertain no doubt that when stated in the ordinary language of daily life, when divested of the familiar phraseology which by long use has lost its full force and significance, when stripped of cant and plainly put, they will be repulsive to most minds which have not become warped by a long course of unnatural thought, or equally unnatural stagnation. But this is not the fault of my "misinterpretation," but of the inherent character of the ideas which I have put into plain English.

The attitude of the Swedenborgians to Spiritualism has always seemed to me anomalous. They usually deny the reality of communion and communication even with the world of spirit, and at the same time warn us that it is an extremely dangerous thing. The Rev. J. Ashby, as reported in a recent copy of the Southport News, is more reasonable, though his remarks are tinged with a similar absurdity in some parts of his lecture on Spiritualism. He frankly admitted the rapid development of belief in communion with the unseen world. Hundreds of thousands held it; and thousands said it was a delusion and imposture: "but they made no examination, and to them that was the end of the matter." "Supposing they said there was no reality in these things, then they had to deny all history." "When they consulted the Bible, the Book admitted these communications as facts, and they were well attested." This is all reasonable, candid, and fair. But then comes the lame and impotent conclusion. What is to be done with this great fact, which all history attests, and which the Bible stamps with the seal of truth? "They would admit these things as facts, but deny it as a practice; examine it as a fact, but have nothing to do with it as a practice." Why? Because, it seems, the world of spirit has degenerated! "In ancient times men communicated with angels, but men now were in a different position. Evil had increased: falsehood had increased: and evil spirits in the other world had increased." This lame conclusion is buttressed by the further consideration that "the man who gave himself up to Spiritualism forfeited his reason (!) and was brought into a state of terrible danger." To many of us it seems, on the contrary, that reason was first imported into our theology when we were brought into relation with the world of spirit. Some of us think that we never thought about these things before, and that our reasonable thought has brought us to a conception of God and His ways, of life and its duties higher than that even of the Bishop of St. Albans.

Mr. Ashby seems to think that the great use of this Spiritualism is to break up gross infidelity. It is a sledge hammer to break an otherwise impervious head. "The influence of Spiritualism on future scientists was unquestionable." It is all that, no doubt. It has rescued many from a state of blank negation, a Sahara of lonely doubt and uncertainty, in the midst of which the soul wandered in painful isolation, not knowing if there were, indeed, any God, or anything on which to believe, and on which to rest. To such it has made faith possible; and to them it has restored a hope that they had long ceased to cherish. This alone is indication enough, if any were needed, of its beneficent work. But it has also done, what Mr. Ashby quite ignores, an even grander work in quickening and ennobling the half-dead faith which had lost its vital hold on the mind, and was but an empty shibboleth, a form without a spirit. Into that shell it has infused a vitalizing energy, and to the mind so quickened all things have become new. Nobler ideals, grander conceptions, truer views have burst upon the soul, and that faith which was cherished as a mere inheritance, laid by and honoured, but not used, has become the mainspring of a regenerated life. This Christ did for Judaism. This every re-statement of essential truth does for the mind that can receive it. Only to few the light comes, but when they get it, it is a new light indeed. And this is no new thing. How often did the Great Teacher in His day say the same, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

Mr. St. George Stock's book, says the Oxford Magazine, is "not a monstrous polemic penned, so to say, in a fog with gall . . . nor a rehabilitation of outworn theories in a modern coat. Academic paralysis of the soul's free play has not touched him. . . . These essays strike us as a late and graceful efflorescence of the school of Humaner Letters. "He guides us with masterly pellucidity through the dismal and intricate paralogisms of Mr. Gillespie. It is not given to everyone to joke on Extension and set the table in a roar on the Substratum of Necessary Existence." Portentous in very truth! And then the writer goes on to wig Mr. Stock with admirably sustained gravity because he has not packed his essays with proof of the reality of the objective phenomena of Spiritualism! This early but hardly "graceful efflorescence of the school" of Young Oxford is a little priggish, but funny enough on the whole.

I see, with not unwarrantable satisfaction, that my "Spiritualism at the Church Congress" with the notes, and advice to investigators which the reviewer in England ran his head against so stolidly, is now reprinted in Australia at 6d. It has already had a very large sale in America, having been issued, with some special matter, from the Religio-Philosophical publishing-house. The treatment of the subject at the great clerical meeting of the year was an important fact, and I am glad that I was enabled, by the timely and wise generosity of a friend, to set that fact before the world. ### SPIRITUAL MANIFESTATIONS IN FRANCE.

By Dr. Chazarnin.

In our number of February 3rd was a translation from the Revue Spirite of a narrative, by Dr. Chazarnin, of Paris, of a series of sances with the medium Madame Bablin. His narrative of further sances is continued in the current number of the Revue.

Passing by phenomena which had become familiar to him, of musical and other objects floating about the room, he describes the incomplete manifestation, at the first of this second series, of a child's form. He says:—

"A little hand, luminous enough to shew the arm and part of the trunk, caressed my face. This disappearing, there were sounds of writing on the table, on which pencil and paper had been placed. These sounds ceasing—I ought to say that the light was extinguished, all hands were interlinked, and the medium was immovably fixed in her chair; Madame P. felt a paper laid upon her hands, on which, when light was restored, we found written, 'I have tried to make myself visible, but cannot now; I hope to succeed next time.—Fernando.'"

"On the same circle meeting again, after various phenomena, Madame P. said her head and shoulders were touched, and presently, in front of her, the form of a man became visible by his own light. This disappearing, we heard the pencil in motion. On its ceasing, we lighted up, and found two closely-written pages, signed 'Fernando,' addressed to Madame P., who said they related to a subject of close personal concern to herself.

"Next a form became visible in front of Mons. and Madame U., and was recognised by them as Madame's mother, wearing the head-dress of her province, which she had preferred to wear to the end of her days.

"Then we heard more writing; that ceasing, Madame F., at my side, perceived the figure of her daughter, some years deceased, who pressed her hands and kissed her; then, laying a paper on her lap, disappeared. We found, on light being restored, this paper covered with beautiful and touching verses, alluding to her last days on earth.

"They who attend such sances in the spirit of serious inquiry soon learn that the invisibles cannot always materialise themselves even with mediums they are used to, and that even when they can, they are aided in the operation by the sympathetic will of a harmonious circle. This had been the case on the present occasion, when four spirits in succession had been enabled to manifest their presence and action.

"Is there not an analogy between the operation of the human will and that of the force of an electro-magnetic battery? The will acts upon the muscular system, so also the force of the battery. When the concurrent wills of all present move the vito-electric currents of a harmonious circle, greater force, if not also a greater amount of fluidic material, seems to be at the disposal of spirits for operating with. If their operation at sances were regarded under this conjoint aspect, the necessity for unity of object and harmony would be more valued, and we might not hear of so many failures and doubtful experiments."

Dr. Chazarnin now resolved, in order to add to the weight of his testimony, to hold his future sances at his own home, with his own family and friends, Madame Bablin still being the medium, and observing—seeing that for these phenomena he accepted the condition of absence of light—such rules as should preclude the attribution of phenomena to any other than spirits as the active operations.

At his first home-sance, fourteen in the circle, on the light being extinguished the medium described, in minute detail, the appearance of a spirit, whose wife and daughter were present; he had also been well known to Dr. Chazarnin.

"The medium," says he, "passed then into the trance; after some rapping sounds, hands touched and pressed us all, the objects placed upon the table floated over our heads, the musical instruments sounding; fresh flowers were laid upon our hands. There were no flowers in the house before the sance. Then phosphorescent hands gradually developed themselves as I previously described. The form of a child was then seen upon the table, visible by its own light. It moved about, kissed its hands to us all; we heard the kisses; and as the fingers left contact with the lips they emitted a soft light and whitish vapour. The child disappeared and reappeared three times, but was visible altogether for about ten minutes. When I afterwards shewed the photograph of my little Marie all recognised it as that of the child-spirit.

"Then, by my side, appeared the well-defined face of my mother, deceased at seventy-five.

"I felt then a large hand laid upon my head; in reply to the question mentally put, 'Are you he of whom I am thinking?' the hand gave three taps. My thoughts were of my deceased brother. Then came sounds of the pencil; these ceasing, we lighted up and found a little writing on two pieces of paper; on one, 'My beloved sisters, I am with you and shall be your guardian.—Marie.' On the other, 'Seek not thy brother on earth; he is in God's immensity. I am happy to be able to be with you.—Paul.' This was the name of my brother. He was in the Army of Reserve in 1870. After the battle of Chateaufort no news ever came from him; his name was neither in the returns of killed nor of prisoners. A spontaneous communication had been received by me through another medium, to the effect that he had been killed for plunder by some dissolute men of his company. I had thereupon written to the authorities to know how I might direct inquiries among the men of his company at that period. As if in reference to my letter came another scrap of paper, 'No vengeance, expiation.' I received this as a lesson on which I pondered."

Many details of Dr. Chazarnin's communication, which is long, have been omitted. He concludes:—

"In these sances we see that spirits multiplied, for our instruction, proofs of their presence; communicated directly with us; presented themselves tangibly to us as we had known them, with such difference of appearance as was inseparable from the kind of light by which they revealed themselves; gave their names; addressed us directly in writing, re-calling circumstances known only to us and themselves.

"I have had some further experiences of materialisation of great interest, but postpone the relation of them to a future opportunity."

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.—An application was recently made to the secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association for the hire of the Lower Exeter Hall, for a series of lectures on Psychological Science, but this was declined on account of the nature of the proposed subjects. Evidently the Y.M.C.A. are afraid of Spiritualism, but that was only to be expected of an organisation which has ever consistently been opposed to any freedom of thought outside of the particular lines laid down by their committees. This we believe is one of the main causes not only for the dissensions which are known to exist in the governing body of the Y.M.C.A., but also of their failure in reaching the special classes for whom the Association is intended. Exeter Hall was opened with a flourish of trumpets, and great things were to be done. Yet in a few months their membership has not only not increased but has been considerably decreased. The day is past for the slightest semblance of anything approaching the suppression of freedom of thought, and if wise, the officials of the Y.M.C.A. will recognise the fact that the cause of religion is much better served by a reverent and earnest study of facts than by the rowdy sensationalism of the Salvation Army, to which apparently they have no objection.

GHOSTS OF BIRDS AND BEASTS.

The letter of Mr. S. C. Hall in a recent number of "LIGHT," regarding the spiritual appearances of animals, will have doubtless been read with interest by many persons. The subject being one of curiosity probably may elicit illustration and discussion. The following experiences, bearing upon it, perhaps may be welcome, as additional facts are ever of value.

From an article, contributed by the writer to the Psychological Review, some years since, entitled "Ghosts in Tyrol," the following narrative is taken. It was communicated to her by H.S.H. the Prince of Solms-Braunfels, who was acquainted with a German landscape-painter whose wife's experience is therein recorded.

The Ghost of a Roebuck.

"The wife of a German landscape-painter, resident in Tyrol, is a passionate lover of children and animals, and always spreads a sphere of enjoyment around herself amongst both. At one time this lady had a roebuck, a creature as tame as a pet lamb. Each morning early it was accustomed to make its appearance at the door of the lady's chamber to be fed with milk. After some time the roebuck fell ill, and its mistress, greatly distressed, carried it in her arms a considerable distance to the house of the nearest doctor. The doctor advised the lady to leave the creature with him, as it was, he said, in a very precarious state. She did so, the physician assuring her that he would do all he possibly could to restore it to her in a fair way for recovery.

"The following morning, at the accustomed hour, the lady heard the footsteps of the roebuck bounding up the stairs. She at once hastened to the door, rejoiced to find, as she supposed, the poor animal recovered and returned home. But, behold! on opening it, no roebuck was there at all! Everywhere she sought for her favourite, calling him tenderly by his name, but nowhere was he to be seen by her; no one either had beheld him about the place, nor had anyone heard his footsteps except herself. Anxious about her pet, in the course of the day the lady visited the physician, and, approaching his house, saw extended upon a manure-heap, the body of her roebuck—dead! The creature had been dead some hours—was dead before the hour in the morning when she so clearly had heard his footsteps. She firmly believed that its spirit had thus come to bid her adieu!"

Dr. Justinus Kerner, in 1835, in Blätter aus Prevorst, a periodical edited by him, in conjunction with Eschenmayer and other scientific German gentlemen interested in the investigation of occult phenomena, narrates, as follows, regarding

The Spirit of a Greyhound seen at the time of its Death.

"The husband of the Frau B., living in M., possessed a handsome large greyhound, which upon every occasion evinced extraordinary attachment to Frau B., and which in return received great kindness at her hands. This hound had the habit, when he desired admittance to the drawing-room, to knock with both forefeet at the door, and then to scratch until the door was opened to him. This dog once, being overheated, drank from a very cold spring of water and caught cold, suffering first from a severe cough, and then falling into a decline. Nevertheless, he went daily to the lady to receive his food, until he could move no more. A servant was in an upper room with the dog, watching him whilst he died, whilst Frau B., sitting in the drawing-room on the ground-floor, plainly heard the sound of the greyhound knocking and scratching. She immediately ascended to the upper story of the house, where she found the servant with the dying dog, and inquired from him whether the dog had left the room? 'No, indeed,' replied the servant, 'that would have been impossible. I have been here all the time, and he lies there where you see him, dying.' In a few moments the dog was dead."

Vide also, in Spiritual Tracts by Judge Edmonds, account of a spirit of a fierce dog seen by a young clergyman at the time of its death.

The Prince of Solms illustrated the history of the ghost of the roebuck by certain experiences of his own.

The Spiritual Form of a Horse

had once been accurately described to him by a friend of his and of ours, a lady in private life, a seeress of highly developed gifts, the truthfulness of whose remarkable clairvoyant powers had frequently been tested by His Serene Highness. The seeress described this spirit of the horse as showing a very peculiar "action;" this "peculiar action" was immediately recognised as the marked characteristic by which this old favourite would be recognised. The seeress, until she thus beheld the spirit of this horse, had neither seen it in life nor heard anything regarding it. Upon another occasion this lady beheld in vision, whilst the Prince of Solms was sitting with her for spiritual-manifestations, the form of a brother of his in the spiritual world, and exclaimed with surprise that there was a bird with him.

The Spirit of a Lark!

The late Prince Bernhard of Solms, when a boy, had possessed a pet skylark, of which he was extremely fond. This circumstance had all but passed away from the memory of his elder brother, and was entirely unknown to the seeress, who had been a stranger to Prince Bernhard during his earth-life.

Since commencing this paper, a friend of the Prince of Solms, of the seeress in question, and of ourselves, calling upon us, I asked if he chanced to remember hearing the Prince at any time refer to the spirit of one of his favourite horses having been seen with him?

"Certainly I have," was the reply of Colonel D. "And more than that," added he, "I was present with him at the sance when the ghost of this horse was described; and remember the delighted surprise of the Prince when its 'peculiar action' was mentioned."

"Our friend the seeress," he continued, "had an even greater surprise for myself. 'Have you ever seen any horse with me?' I asked. 'No,' was her quick reply, 'not a horse—but I have often seen with you'

The Spirit of a Bay Pony with white mane and tail!

"She then most accurately gave a description of a pony of very striking appearance, which had, during my life in South Africa, been for months my companion on shooting expeditions up the country. I have been on his back for nine hours at a stretch. We were good comrades," added the Colonel.

The Spirits of Cats and of a Dog

have frequently been observed by a maid-servant, well-known to the writer. This young woman is a great "sensitive." She is fond of dumb creatures, and has had the care of various "pets."

The creatures which in ordinary parlance we term "dead," continue at times to be around her, and to her as visible as if still on earth. She has given me some pretty descriptions of the abodes in the spirit-world of these creatures. She has, she avers, been taken to see their homes. Little flowery, green paddocks, surrounded with hedges of blooming roses, full of the richest grass and bright flowers, where the cats gambol about, or lie basking in the sunshine, or curled up in the shade, amongst the flowers. They were watched and played with, instructed and corrected by shining children, who carry in their hands white wands, wherewith they appeared to guide the creatures, as if they were mesmerising them. Also she described rooms where were provided gay-coloured ropes depending from the ceilings for the amusement of the spirits of cats and kittens. Here also were the angel-children visible, watching and joining in the gambols of the creatures with the help of their white magic-wands.

The Spirit of a Favourite Canary appeared to a friend of ours who died in 1877. In a letter from my father describing the death-bed of this friend, he says:—

"I wish poor P—in her last illness had not had her faculties so oppressed by her complaint. I think she could have told us something striking. . . . She often said she saw people in the room, and lights moving about. You saw her eyes following them. Once she saw a dog in the room. Another time she saw little Randolph, the canary, of which she was so fond, at Dietenheim, and which died there, come and sing at her window. One day she said to me 'I never imagined how beautiful it is to go.'"

The Souls of Animals

the Seeress of Prevorst places within what she calls "the dream-ring." Here is the very suggestive passage from Mrs. Crowe's translation of "The Seeress of Prevorst."

"It is true that theirs appears to be a dreamy life,—whilst, at the same time, she seems to make this ring the representation of the ganglionic system, with its magnetic instincts—sympathy, antipathy, foresight—which are so prominent in the animal kingdoms, especially amongst birds and insects. There is also reason to believe that animals—as horses, dogs, &c.—are less isolated from the spiritual world than human beings are; and that they are more sensible of the proximity of spirits. . . . That compartment of the mid-region, which is nearer to and lower than the earth, where human souls are below the souls of animals, our Seeress places beyond the Dream-Ring. . . . This may accord with the fact, that spirits from this lower region sometimes appear, not only brutified, but actually in the guise of animals."

* "The Seeress of Prevorst" ("The Spheres"), Mrs. Crowe's translation p. 123. "The Seeress of Prevorst" being Revelations concerning the inner-life of man, and the inter-diffusion of a world of spirits in the one we inhabit.—Communicated by Justinus Kerner, Chief Physician at Weinsberg. London: J. C. Moore, 12, Wellington-street, North, Strand, 1845.

has a different report to give us. He tells us (Arcana Cælestia, 1633) that "the lives of animals are dissipated at death." That all the greater and lesser animals derive their origin from the spiritual principle in the ultimate degree; man alone from all the degrees which are called celestial, spiritual, and natural (Divine Love and Wisdom, 364). Noxious animals are from hell; but the mild and useful animals are from the Lord (Arcana Cælestia, 46), &c., &c.

It would be curious to compare the varied revelations of "the mystics," and of spirit-seers on the subject of "The Souls of Animals."

Conflicting statements—apparently conflicting—will inevitably meet us in this direction as elsewhere.

The writer, however, has faith to believe that in the present instance—as well as in the manifold revelations of manifold seers given through conflicting forms of religious belief and dogma—that by careful and sympathetic comparison one with another, when duly brought into mutual relationships, all these "broken lights" of revelation will be discovered—this, too, with a marvellous exactitude—to supplement each other's shortcomings: also to bring forth each other's affluence of internal wisdom. Each great teacher having received his own peculiar portion of the Truth-universal—that portion most in harmony with his own peculiar mental organisation—every teacher will be needed to stand in his own proper place—every teaching to be linked on to every other teaching, before the splendour of the rainbow of Truth-universal and Divine, can gladden the astonished vision of the seeker after the veritable Truth of God.

A. M. HOWITT-WATTS.

MR. S. C. HALL ON "SPIRITUALISM."

We extract the following brief but emphatic advocacy of Spiritualism from Mr. S. C. Hall's book, "Retrospect of a Long Life," announced for early publication by Messrs. Bentley and Son:—

From what I have said concerning so-called, "Spiritualism," in recalling memories of Lord Lytton, Sergeant Cox, Robert Chambers, William Howitt, and others, the reader will have no doubt that I am a believer in the reality of the phenomena known as Spiritualism. So was Mrs. Hall; as thoroughly and entirely as I am.

It is a very long list I might print of persons, entitled to all trust, who believe as I do in the phenomena. It has been well said by an eminent Roman Catholic divine, "It is quite impossible that about such facts such a cloud of witnesses should be all deceived;" and by a Protestant clergyman of high rank: "Testimony has been so abundant and consentaneous, that either the facts must be as they are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."

I do not intend to give any details as to the evidence by which belief in Spiritualism is sustained; it would demand treatment at some length, for which I have no space: moreover, it would be distasteful to many of those who I expect will be my readers. Such testimony may be easily obtained by those who require it; there are six periodical representative publications, and some hundreds of printed books that give it fully. In treating the subject here, I shall merely strive to answer the question—why should there be any doubt that the spirits of those who have been in the "natural body" can and do communicate, when in the "spiritual body," with the beloved of earth who are yet remaining on earth, to be removed thence to another state when what is called "Death" releases them from earth-bonds?

I make no appeal, no effort at conviction, no attempt at inducing inquiry on the part of those who have no belief in an Hereafter—"the immortality of the Soul." But to those who believe in both I put a simple question. Where is the soul when it has ceased to be linked with a perishable body—a body that is not the same to-day as it was yesterday, and will ultimately be restored to the elements that composed it?

It is not enough for me to say I have had palpable convincing and conclusive evidence that those we call the "dead" are "living," and can and do communicate with us—those who are yet living. I have had such evidence, not once, but many hundred times, in various places and countries, in the presence of persons who had never before met, and were totally unknown each to the other, under circumstances that rendered collusion out of the question and fraud an impossibility, such intercourse with "spirits" continuing to be repeated year after year for more than thirty years.

"We speak what we do know, and testify what we have seen;" and if we are answered by him who will "answer a matter before he heareth it," I can but say, as the wise king said, "It is folly and shame unto him."

Spiritualists, then, demand to be heard on the ground that their antecedents are such as to justify confidence—confidence in their integrity and in their capacity for arriving at correct conclusions based on the evidence of their senses, sustained by their intelligence; because they have subjected Spiritualism to such tests as the Almighty has given them by which to detect error and discover truth; because these things are not done in a corner; because alleged facts are attested by tens—nay, by hundreds—of thousands, who have witnessed them at various times, in several places, now in one company, now in another; testified to, not by "ignorant and unlearned men," but by men and women of capacious minds, and of great experience in all the affairs of life—sound and practical thinkers; who affirm that if their testimony on this subject is not to be accepted by just and intelligent judges, it must be considered worthless for any purpose by any public or private tribunal—that they are unfitted for the discharge of any of the duties of citizens, because of either cupidity, deliberate imposture, mental incapacity, or continuous self-delusion.

The highest authorities in the Church of England, and the oracles of the Dissenters from that Church, contend that "miracles" have not ceased, but that they continue to be wrought, not only by good angels, but by evil spirits. Thus wrote Bishop Hall—"So sure as we see men, so sure we are that holy men have seen angels." And thus Archbishop Tillotson—"The angels are no more dead or idle than they were in Jacob's time or in our Saviour's, and both good and bad spirits are each in their way busy about us." Bishop Beveridge contends that "though we cannot see spirits with our bodily eyes, we may do so when they assume, as they sometimes do, a bodily shape." I have already quoted Bishop Pearson.

Among Nonconformists there are many authorities equally convincing and conclusive. Baxter, in reference to apparitions, says—"I have received undoubted testimony of the truth of such." Isaac Watts reasons that "the appearance of apparitions is a strong proof of an intermediate state, whence they can return for special Divine purposes." The venerable founder of Methodism contends not only that good and evil spirits worked in the apostolic times, but that they are as busy now as they were then,—to lead and to mislead, to enlist soldiers under the banner of Christ, and to augment the armies of Satan!

"Millions of spiritual beings walk the earth, Unseen, both when we wake and when we sleep."

Such was the faith of John Milton. I might fill many pages with "authorities."

"Progress" is the universal law of both worlds. Responsibility never ceases—here or Hereafter. Where Progress ends who will dare to say, or guess or speculate—as to the "many mansions" into which there may be many removals?

If there be not annihilation of all we associate with the soul, there must outlive this life, affection, memory, reflection, comparison, intelligence—to use a familiar word, REASON: that these faculties are not lost or lessened, but vastly strengthened in the soul after its removal from the body. They must be exercised: there must be a continual recurrence to the events of this life: there must be meaning in the words "Well done, good and faithful servant," and in these—"Depart from me, ye wicked." Only by the unlimited exercise of these powers could there be reward and punishment: without them "Hereafter" would be a sound "signifying nothing!"

"For MEMORY lives—of what thou wert and art—
In 'many mansions' where the soul may dwell;
And to REMEMBER is of Heaven a part,
As to REMEMBER is a part of Hell."

If the soul, on its departure from the body, its sometime tabernacle—the house in which it has dwelt—loses all consciousness of a past, what can be its future? If it cease to take any interest in things of earth, if the affections are to die when the body dies, and although parents, children, friends, while "living," enjoy the bliss that memory brings, the souls removed are denied all such sources of happiness,—surely, to maintain such a doctrine would go very far to destroy all honour and glory to God, all faith and trust in Him, in His justice and His mercy, and all the hope that sustains more or less every human being born into the world, and what is, so especially, the blessing of the Christian.

Yet Spiritualism progresses, and will continue to progress. There are now millions where, twenty-five years ago, there were scores. To "stop" it is impossible: as easy would it be to stay the inflow of Ocean by a wall of shingles. Our pastors and teachers leave the mighty power for good—or for evil—in the hands of those who will use, to abuse it, who do use, and do abuse, it. I solemnly warn such as are inquirers, neophytes, or acolytes, to avoid, as they would contact with a plague spot, fellowship and communing with "mediums" who, under the sway, influence, and dictation of spirits, low, or base, or evil, inculcate principles repugnant to natures that are good—and sometimes teach "Doctrines of Devils."

It is a blessed Faith! that keeps us ever watchful, knowing ourselves to be perpetually watched: that gives us conclusive and continual evidence how very thin are the partitions that separate this world from "the next"—the next, where ingratitude is a crime, and "sins of omission" exact penalties as do "sins of commission;" where those who, having neglected their "talent," are guilty as those who misuse it. "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of these, ye did it not unto Me," implies condemnation for opportunities neglected, as well as abused.

"For what we will, yet lack the power to do,
Be it for good or ill, God counts as done."

It is a blessed Faith! that brings closer and nearer those whom death has not—even for a time—separated from us: that makes "certain sure" the actual presence of those we love; sharing our daily walks: our hourly talks; watching us with hopeful love: participating in all our anxieties: in all our joys: guiding us, helping us, averting from us evil and the influence of evil: bringing around and about us the holy and the good: giving us a foretaste of that "overpowering of delight" of which the poet speaks: bringing palpably to our hearts and minds "the substance of things hoped for; the evidence of things not seen:" and prompting to continual prayer, that when our Lord cometh He may find our lamps bright and burning in the Household of Faith.

It is a blessed Faith! that enhances a thousand-fold the joy that is given by the Christian dispensation; that removes all doubts of Hereafter—answering the prayer (I quote the most beautiful of our Church Collects): "O everlasting God, who hast ordained and constituted the services of Angels and men in a wonderful order; mercifully grant that as Thy holy angels always do Thee service in Heaven, so by Thy appointment they may succour and defend us on earth, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

I conclude this brief summary of my views concerning Spiritualism with fervent thankfulness to God for the blessing it has been—and is—to me. I do not touch on kindred themes that cannot be approached with sufficient reverence—even here. It must suffice to say I know that the souls of those who loved us, while with us on earth, can, and do, hold communication with us now that they are in Heaven. I know it as well as I know the plainest and simplest truths—as well as I know that are four fingers and a thumb on my right hand. I know also that such faith is not only consistent with the Christian religion—sustained—nay, inculcated—by the Divine word—but that without it there can be no vital Christianity.

MR. TOWN'S TESTIMONIAL.—The testimonial to Mr. Towns will be presented to him at Neumeyer Hall, Hart-street, Bloomsbury, W.C., on Wednesday evening next. The occasion will be also utilised as a celebration of the thirty-fourth anniversary of the advent of modern Spiritualism. The proceedings will embrace a high-class concert, with a few short addresses, and Mr. Thomas Everitt has consented to preside. The proceedings will commence at eight o'clock; tickets from 5s. to 1s. each. We hope there will be a good attendance.

A CANCER REMOVED DURING MESMERIC SLEEP.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The Lancet announces the death of Baron Jules Cloquet, the celebrated anatomist and surgeon, who died on Friday, the 23rd ult., in the 94th year of his age. He was a great believer in mesmerism as the following will shew:—

"Account presented to the Royal Academy of Medicine, at its sitting of the 16th of April, 1829, by M. Jules Cloquet, surgeon of the Hospital of St. Louis, Member of the Academy, of an operation which he made of a cancer of the right breast during the magnetic sleep, induced by Dr. Chaplain upon one of his patients.

"M. J. Cloquet informs the members of the Academy, that a lady, sixty-four years old, went to consult him concerning a cancer, complicated with an obstruction of axillary tumours, which she had at her right breast. M. Cloquet recommended the operation, but advised her to consult other members of the faculty, and particularly her own physician, M. le Docteur Chaplain. The latter had already proposed to his patient and her relations this operation as indispensable, but insisted upon other medical advice being also taken. M. Chaplain called on M. J. Cloquet after the latter had seen his patient, and informed him that this lady had for a long time past submitted to his magnetic influence, and though her sleep was not usually deep, he thought it might be increased, and the operation be effected while it lasted. This, in effect, took place, and all was completed in some ten or twelve minutes, though they were obliged, before removing the breast itself, to dissect the axillary tumours, and to tie up several arteries.

"The patient," says M. Cloquet, "did not betray the least symptoms of pain, neither on her countenance, nor by her movements, though her arms were free, and not held by the assistants; but on the contrary, she talked tranquilly, during the whole time, with M. Chaplain and M. le Docteur Paillet, who acted as assistant to the operator. Only after the operation, when they were wiping with a sponge the blood which flowed down the hypochondriac region of the right side, she experienced very sharp ticklings, which excited the peculiar laugh which usually accompanies such a sensation. The patient, on the operation being finished, walked back to her bed, and was allowed to remain forty-eight hours longer in the magnetic sleep. At the end of that they removed the first covering, and having dressed the wound, M. Chaplain awoke her. She appeared surprised at having been operated upon, having, while awake, received no previous notice of it. In a quarter of an hour after she was again thrown into the magnetic sleep. M. Paillet, who remained with the patient for the first twenty-four hours, remarked with astonishment that she betrayed none of those symptoms of pain which usually follow such an operation. The two dressings have been made up to the present day (the 16th), without exciting the least appearance of pain. The phenomena of the suppuration are beginning regularly to be established, and everything leads us to believe that the recovery will be perfect."

Dr. Cloquet was the senior member of the Academy of Medicine. He was the author of several important works on anatomy and surgery, and his monograph, in five volumes, on anatomy, was for more than a generation the most trusted work on the subject.

WILL FORCE.—Authors, as a rule, no matter what their private opinions may be on psychological subjects, seldom express themselves favourably towards a matter unpopular with the general public. Mr. J. Fitzgerald Molloy, however, in his novel just published, entitled, "What Hast Thou Done?" ventures to touch on the subject by making one of his characters express a belief "that there is a certain magnetic force often conveyed to men by the good or ill-will of the people, when it is united for a common purpose, which acts in some mysterious way on those to whom it is directed for their weal or woe. You may remember the magicians in olden times made waxen images of their enemies, and melted them before the fire. That I have no doubt," said the baronet, "was merely a form which helped to concentrate their minds and intentions on the object of their enmity; it was the force of their wills which wrought the evil. It is a matter not usually understood, but there is a good deal in it for all that. Now I quite believe the combined good wishes—which are the prayers—of the poor will benefit me much."

OFFICE OF "LIGHT,"

LUDGATE CIRCUS, E.C.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

Reports of the proceedings of Spiritualist Societies in as succinct a form as possible, and authenticated by the signature of a responsible officer, are solicited for insertion in "LIGHT." Members of private circles will also oblige by contributing brief records of noteworthy occurrences at their séances.

The Editor cannot undertake the return of manuscripts unless the writers expressly request it at the time of forwarding and enclose stamps for the return postage.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

The Annual Subscription for "LIGHT," post free to any address within the United Kingdom, or to places comprised within the Postal Union, including all parts of Europe, the United States, and British North America, is 10s. 10d. per annum, forwarded to our office in advance.

ADVERTISEMENT CHARGES.

Five lines and under, 2s. One inch, 4s. 6d. Half-column, 21s. Whole Column, £2 2s. 6d. A reduction made for a series of insertions. Orders for Papers and Advertisements may be addressed to Mr. J. J. Mousat, the business agent. All other communications should be sent to "The Editor," Cheques and Post Office Orders may be made payable to Edward T. Bennett, at the Chief Office, London. Halfpenny Postage Stamps received for amounts under 10s.

Orders for Advertisements may also be sent to "The Ross Publishing Company," 4, Wine Office Court, Fleet Street, E.C., on or before Wednesday in each week.

THE WORK OF THE C.A.S.

Some time ago we intimated that the Council of the C.A.S. had a scheme under consideration which, if carried out, would meet a widespread need at the present time. Indications are not wanting that in many quarters there exists a spirit of inquiry amongst the general public with regard to psychological phenomena which only requires a little gentle stimulation to prove productive of substantial and lasting good to the spiritual movement. Many friends have assured us of late that they never knew a time when the general public were so ready to listen calmly and inquiringly to narrations of fact as they now are; and this is further borne out by the revived interest in ghost-ology which has recently been so apparent in our magazines and reviews. The crowded audiences which gathered to listen to Professor Barrett on Thought-reading, at the London Institution and other places, also bear witness in the same direction.

In these circumstances we think and believe that any attempt to place en evidence the bases of our special knowledge would be welcomed by a large and increasing section of the public. We do not by any means approve of forcing psychological facts on those who either do not care for or are not ready to receive them, yet we feel that, undesirable as this may be, care should also be taken that the other extreme is not touched, and a genuine and legitimate demand for information left unsatisfied.

We congratulate the Council of the C.A.S. on having rightly gauged the situation, and we believe their re-entry into the sphere of active work is justified by events. The last few years have been times of unrest, conflict, and transition, during which public action, if possible, has probably been undesirable. That time, we believe, is passing, if it has not already passed away, and Spiritualism has taken a new departure, a departure in which it is plainly discernible that the lessons of the past, severe though they were, have not been altogether unheeded. This augurs well for the real progress of the movement, and the effort now being made by the C.A.S. is, we think, undoubtedly a step in the right direction.

A few details of the new plan will be found in another column, and in drawing the attention of our readers to the announcement, we most gladly urge each and every one to aid and sustain the Council to the utmost of his ability. Much depends upon the C.A.S. for the success of the scheme, but far more, we think, rests upon the way in which they are supported by the general body of Spiritualists. We do not altogether mean in a money sense, though that is very important, and is one view of the question which, we trust, will receive due attention by those in a position to give. We were thinking more of that sympathy and kindly co-operation without which the best planned and pecuniarily prosperous concern must inevitably fail. Let us put the matter very plainly. Is the knowledge of a Spiritual world and of continued existence after death of any value to you? Has it brought new light into your life? If so your duty is obvious, and we would simply say that your Spiritualism is worth just so much as it induces you to turn your eyes from self and think of others. That is the practical test, and we would urge its application to the appeal made by the C.A.S. for aid and assistance in a good work.

That it is good work we firmly believe. The usefulness and activity of the years 1874-78, was clearly traceable to a very similar course of lectures delivered in 1872 by Mr. Gerald Massey, at St. George's Hall. Then, as now, there was a spirit of inquiry abroad, and those meetings were very largely attended by the general public, and were the means of inducing many to investigate Spiritualism. We hope that the new era of activity upon which we are seemingly entering will tend to similar useful results.

LECTURES ON PSYCHOLOGICAL SCIENCE.

The Council of the Central Association of Spiritualists desire, in order to meet an evident demand on the part of the public for information as regards Psychological Phenomena, to arrange a series of six lectures during April, May, and June next, which, if successful, will be followed by others. The Langham Hall, in Great Portland-street, can be secured, and it is proposed to hold the series on alternate Tuesday evenings, at eight o'clock. It will be their endeavour to make them thoroughly high-class in character, and at the same time to present the subject in a popular and acceptable manner. For this purpose the Council are seeking the aid of the best talent in our ranks. It is hoped that Dr. G. Wyld will lecture, and Mr. T. P. Barkas has already consented to do so, whilst arrangements are pending in other quarters, full particulars of which will be duly announced. The subjects already fixed are:—

"Clairvoyance; or, the Anti-Noetic Action of Mind as a demonstration of the Existence of the Soul," by Dr. Wyld.
"Personal Experiences in Psychology," by T. P. Barkas, F.G.S.

Admission will be free to the general public, but to meet the necessary expense of hire of hall, fees, travelling, advertising, and other charges, the Council appeal to the liberality of Spiritualists and those interested in the dissemination of a knowledge of the phenomena to contribute to a special Lecture Fund for this purpose. All donations will be acknowledged in "LIGHT," and a balance-sheet published in due course.

A few seats will be reserved, the cost of which for the course of six lectures will be one guinea. The tickets will be transferable, and it is hoped friends in the Metropolis will, therefore, more readily subscribe for them as, if unable always to make personal use of the tickets, they can lend them to others interested in the subject.

It is hoped that the above will commend itself to Spiritualists, and that they will feel disposed to sustain the Council in their proposed work by personal aid and sympathy.

Communications and applications for tickets to be addressed to Mr. Thos. Blyton, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

OBITUARY.

ROGERS.—Passed to the Higher Life, on the 16th inst., aged 24 years, Frank, the very dear son of Edmund Dawson and Sophia Jane Rogers, of Rose Villa, Church End, Finchley.

They do not die,
Nor lose their mortal sympathy,
Nor change to us.—In Memoriam.

SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE.—On Monday evening last, at the Fortnightly Discussion Meeting of the C.A.S., 38, Great Russell-street, Mr. J. W. Slater, editor of the Journal of Science, read a very able paper on "Spiritualism from a Scientific Point of View." We shall have the pleasure of placing this paper before our readers in the next number of "LIGHT."

MR. SINNETT.—We hear that Mr. Sinnett, author of "The Occult World," is about to leave India for England, if indeed he has not already done so. It is probable that Mr. Sinnett may determine to make England his future home.

FAITH IN THE WONDERFUL.

"I doubt me," says Rabelais, "that you do not thoroughly believe the truth of this strange narration! Though you believe it not, I care not much; but an honest man, and of good judgment, believeth still what is told him, and that which he finds written."

Although the supply of honest men of this description would certainly be found, in our day, unequal to the demand, a candid spirit of inquiry cannot be too strongly inculcated. It is hard even to blame the man who admits indifferent premises for the sake of securing the widest possible scope to the argument he mistrusts.

Lord Bacon declared that he would rather be so superstitious as to believe in all the fables of the Talmud, than in nothing but what his senses discovered to him.

Addison, with characteristic politeness, begs that they who cannot yield their credence to anything supernatural will be so good as to abstain from disturbing the faith of those who can.

Wordsworth preferred the rustic ignorance of those whom owls affright with presages of evils, or magpies flatter with hope of lucky chances, to being without belief of something beyond what human powers can discover.

Pride of position, pride of profession, and, most manifestly, pride of being on the popular side—to one or other of these may no doubt be attributed much of the disfavour—not to say hostility—with which every new doctrine, every new discovery, not in harmony with the persuasion or expectation of the multitude, is received.

"Philosophers do not," remarked Mrs. Crowe, "quarrel with a new metal, or a new plant; and even a new comet, or a new island, has a fair chance of being well received; while, on the other hand, any new discovery tending to throw light on what most deeply concerns us—namely, our own being—must be prepared to encounter a storm of angry persecution. The passions and interest of opposers become involved in the dispute; investigators become partisans. Having declared against a thing at the outset, it is important that it should not be true—nor should it, if they can help it."

Let us at least hope that the foul spirit of ignorance and prejudice which put Galileo to the torture for a true discovery, and, in a later age, nicknamed the first American steamboat "Fulton's Folly," is not to be resuscitated in our day.

That phenomena possessing most of the distinctive features of what are called spirit manifestations, are by no means of recent origin, many authentic records in France, England, the United States, &c., &c., abundantly prove; the German chronicles, in particular, dating as far back as A.D. 1135. How many curious histories of a similar kind, belonging to a period when the means for the transmission of knowledge were limited and imperfect, have mingled with the dust of ages, it is impossible to estimate. Enough remains at our command to shew that modern practitioners only follow a path and system worked out and trodden for centuries. When, some thirty years since, America transmitted to us the first instalment of this shadowy merchandise, it was received with irony and ridicule. The Press raised an almost unanimous shout of reprobation, seasoned with choice satire, in the face of which it was hardly to be expected that the small section of the public who attended the séances would have courage to bear independent witness to what was really noteworthy in that which they saw—or would have got a fair hearing, if they had. The circumstance that money was taken at these "entertainments," was of itself damnable of their reputation. The conclusion was at once arrived at that the whole affair was one of gain—its speculations purely monetary—that it was, in fact, a mere swindling apparatus, aimed at the feeble and fanciful mind, and endowed with no more extraordinary characteristic than might be developed by the tricky fingers and ventriloquial gifts of the professors. Little stress was laid upon the injurious influence which the system might possibly exercise on the minds and consciences of men. It was abused simply because to produce a pecking noise somewhere about the legs of the table, and call it a voice from the unseen world, when it wasn't, was a cheat, and everybody who paid his half-crown, and sat to hear it so called, was both a victim and an accomplice.

Never yet was anything so open to the shafts of wit. The greatest booby might, for once, chuckle safely over a joke of his own begetting. Numbers of the species improved the opportunity. The experiments were perpetually breaking down—the machinery stopping—the phenomena collapsing—the media declaring that, in such an unfaithful circle, nothing could be effected. How, then, was it that the pains taken to put an end to this new and startling theory, met with such signal ill-success? The "spirit" manifestations thrived upon their repeated exposures, incurred a deeper and deeper debt to their opponents, lived and flourished, and invaded every circle of educated society. The truth is that the sentiment to which they directly appealed lies at the very root of human sympathy. There is no match for that forceful feeling, and, consequently, when it became apparent that the satirists had not been searchers, the great majority ceased to attach importance to their dicta, and preferred to investigate for themselves. The premature judgment passed upon "Spiritualism" has tended to its preservation. For, while the monotonous and conventional character of the more familiar phenomena, and the absence of any substantive results, might have in time wearied the inquirers, the crude attempts at explanation, failing one after another to reach the question, demonstrated the existence of an unsolved mystery, and piqued curiosity.

The great error on the part of the shrewd intelligent men who attended séances for the purpose of denouncing them through the Press, was in deciding that there was no element of truth in the whole concern. By suffering that little grain of truth to escape them, permanent vitality was imparted to the system. The inquiry—if meant to be exhaustive—demanded patience—even indulgence. The notorious fact that many eminent men in America had admitted the matter into earnest counsel, would alone have justified a closer investigation. The American public have not, as a rule, been found more gullible than the British, nor less tenacious on the important subject of money's worth. Ridicule and barren denial, those choice weapons from the fools' armoury, were the instruments selected for the demolition of the "spirit" theories, the consequence—easily foretold—being that they exist, unravelled, to this hour.

Any who have taken the trouble to peruse the works of Allan Kardec ("Le Livre des Esprits," and its sequel, "Le Livre des Médiuns") on this singular subject, will acknowledge that there are ways of putting a matter which, if they do not convince, at least command a certain degree of respect, and can scarcely be met, except with a regular controversy. The views of the French Spiritualist, moreover, often approximate very closely to those of orthodox professors, and his inferential conjectures are not wilder than many which, in science, now form the established bases of many a stately column of truth.

The concluding paragraph of M. Kardec's work is not without its force and significance.

"The adversaries of Spiritualism will doubtless tell us that it is for us to prove the reality of the manifestations. We do so, both by fact and argument. If, then, they admit neither the one nor the other, if they deny what their eyes behold, it is for them to shew that our reasoning is illogical, and our facts impossible."

Of the many curious features of Spiritualism brought to my notice, both in America and England, none were more remarkable than the communications alleged to have been received, through the instrumentality of media, from eminent men who had passed from the scene of their earthly triumphs.

At the time I visited Boston, U.S., in 1851, the writings of Edgar Poe (then deceased) had not attained the celebrity subsequently accorded to them. His curious poem, "The Raven," published in the Illustrated London News, and since principally known, like many other pieces of rare desert, by its numerous burlesque imitations, affords but an imperfect example of his style of thought and diction. Written with excessive care and labour, it must, after all, be considered rather as a finished specimen of poetic mechanism, than as a fair reflex of the writer's singular and most sensitive mind. Other poems, flowing more unrestrainedly from his fruitful but morbid fancy, will enable the reader, should he recall them, to judge more accurately of the craieusement suggested by some lines I am about to quote—dictated by a medium, Mrs. Lydia Tenney, at a magnetic circle, at Georgetown, Massachusetts.

"O the dark, the awful chasm!
O the fearful spirit-spasm!
Wrought by unresisted passion
In my heart!
Fancies joyous, but alluring
Love most pure, but unenduring,
From time to time with pain securing
Each a part.
Then came dreams, so soft and holy,
Over roses wandering slowly,
With sweet music stealing lowly
On mine ear."

Through the same medium—who, by the way, repudiated for herself all claim to poetic fire, positively averring that she was unable to write a line uninfluenced by another will—we obtained the following, the production of another unfortunate child of song—Macdonald Clarke, known as the "Mad Poet"—who had died, two years before, in an asylum for the insane. I was informed by my friend Mr. Epes Sargent (no mean judge), that the tone, style, and manner of the poet were reproduced in these lines with rare felicity.

MARY O'SHANE.

"Come listen to me, while I sing unto thee,
Of a cot in a flower hedged lane,
Where, near the deep sea, with a spirit as free,
Dwelt a maiden called Mary O'Shane.
Brave Mary—my Mary—Mary O'Shane.
O my heart wanders back, through the old beaten track,
Wept over so often in vain;
And the years roll away, bringing back the last day,
I parted from Mary O'Shane.
Dear Mary—my Mary—Mary O'Shane.
Through the long idle days I sang to her lays
From my own wild wandering brain—
While lingering near, with a smile or a tear, Listened my Mary O'Shane.
Dear Mary—my Mary—Mary O'Shane.
Drawn away one sweet night by the moon's gentle light,
My steps wandered down to the main—
When the first wave that beat east up at my feet
The form of my Mary O'Shane.
My Mary—lost Mary—Mary O'Shane.
The sun beaming now from the hill's smiling brow
Rests still on that flower-hedged lane;
But no more can it rise on the soul-beaming eyes,
The eyes of sweet Mary O'Shane.
Dear Mary—loved Mary—Mary O'Shane.
Weary heart, troubled head, gladly sought their last bed,
Madly prayed for again and again.
Now, with angels above, I have found my lost love,
I have clasped sainted Mary O'Shane.
Angel Mary—my Mary—Mary O'Shane."

Remarkable as are these communications, "the greatest is behind." I think I shall be pardoned for giving it at length. Cavillers might object that the muse of Southey was unequal—at least in this state of being—to the production of anything at once so solemn, pathetic, and beautiful.

POEM.

[Claimed to be dictated by the Spirit of Robert Southey, March 25th, 1851.]

Night overtook me ere my race was run,
And mind, which is the chariot of the soul,
Whose wheels revolve in radiance like the sun,
Uttering glorious music, as they roll
Toward the eternal goal,
With sudden shock stood still. She heard the boom
Of thunders. Many cataracts seemed to pour
From the invisible mountains. Through the gloom
Flowed fathomless waters. Then I knew no more
But this—that thought was o'er.

As one who, drowning, feels his anguish cease,
And clasps his doom, a pale but gentle bride,
And yields his soul to slumber and sweet peace,
Yet thrills when living shapes the waves divide,
And moveth with the tide;
So, sinking deep beneath the unknown sea
Of intellectual sleep, I rested there—
I knew I was not dead, though soon to be,
But still alive to love, to loving care,
To sunshine—and to prayer.

And life, and death, and immortality,
Each of my being held a separate part,
Life there, as sap within an o'erblown tree,
Death there, as frost with intermitting smart—
But, in the secret heart,
The sense of immortality, the breath
Of being, indestructible, the trust
In Christ, of final triumph over death,
And spiritual blossoming from dust,
And Heaven with all the just.

The soul, like some sweet flower-bud, yet unblown,
Lay tranced in beauty in its silent cell;
The spirit slept, but dreamed of worlds unknown,
As dreams the chrysalid within its shell,
Ere summer breathes its spell.
But slumber grew more deep till morning broke—
The Sabbath morning of the holy skies;
An angel touched my eyelids, and I woke—
A voice of tenderest love said, "Spirit, rise."
I lifted up mine eyes—

And lo! I was in Paradise. The beams
Of morning shone o'er landscapes green and gold,
O'er trees with star-like clusters, o'er the streams
Of crystal, and o'er many a tented fold.
A patriarch, as of old,
Melchisedec might have approached a guest,
Drew near me as in reverent awe I bent,
And bade me welcome to the land of rest,
And led me upward, wondering as I went,
Into his milk-white tent."

From whatever sphere these noble lines may have emanated, readers will probably agree with me that the story of the slow sad shipwreck of a gifted mind has seldom been so pathetically told.

HENRY SPICER.

THE MAGNETESCOPE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In Dr. Leger's perfected instrument, "Insulation" was carefully secured.

As regards the conducting properties of silk, Mr. Young has replied to his own question.

If that gentleman or any one interested in the matter will have patience until the work on the magnetoscope (now approaching completion) is ready, he will gather from it all necessary information for constructing the instrument himself, or obtaining it by purchase at a moderate price.—Yours faithfully,
HENRY SPICER.

MATERIALISATION OF A MOTHER AND INFANT.

I have not found time to write to you of late. Mr Bastian's firm resolve not to use his gifts except for healing, and, very infrequently, for recondite manifestations, has also hindered; for reports of sances bring requests that cannot be granted. There was one manifestation, however, in our winter sances, that was so curious that I send it you for publication if you think fit. A member of our circle, of whom I had no knowledge except from sitting with him, said he should be glad to see his only son who died some years ago. I somehow got the impression that the child would appear at our next sance. The night was so inclement that the gentleman did not come. I was a good deal shocked to see a lady materialised, who held in one hand an infant with a fine head and face, and next to no body. It looked like a doll made up for the occasion, and I felt it almost as an insult; but soon the spirits improvised a frame by putting the two curtains together with an opening, in which the beautiful face of the child was shewn in the red light we had, so as to look very charming. The next evening the gentleman attended the sance and I told him that a child had appeared. He said, "My child was still-born, and had a fine head, but scarcely any body." I felt rebuked, but did not tell him how I had revolted against the phenomenon. Soon after we were settled in the sance the same lady materialised, with the same mal-formed infant held in one hand. She proved to be the gentleman's first wife, and the mother of the babe. The face was again shewn through the improvised frame, and was most lovely.

People now-a-days are greatly troubled about identity. Are we to suppose that these were a lot of play-acting spirits who knew this father's history, and got up this representation of actual facts in his life? Or are we to believe that his wife was really present with his babe as it was born to them many years since?

The idea of imposition with regard to identity, in an honest and cultivated circle of people, seems to me to indicate greater credulity than simple belief. As a spirit said to his brother here, "Who is going to take the trouble to personate me to impose upon you? What motive is there? Our small affairs are our own, and are not of sufficient consequence to induce imposition, supposing there were fraudulent spirits present, which I assure you is not the case, with people of good will. I come because I have something to say, to give, or to receive, and I come myself, because my love and yours, and the conditions of mediumship, enable me to come."

I often think of facts that I desire to give you, but my time is not sufficient.

PRESENTIMENT.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—May I be allowed to make a few remarks founded on observation and induction on the subject of presentiment which is connected with psychical research?

As far as my own observation, and the examination of cases mentioned in books go, I am, at present, inclined to think that the following laws apply:—

1. The presentiment more often comes when the seer is fasting—e.g., before breakfast. Thus, according to my own observation, early morning is the usual time.

2. Presentiments, like dreams of any of the rarer classes, usually come in groups. To explain:—For a month or so the seer is liable to them. Then they do not occur for some time. This explains away two of the commonest objections to this remarkable class of psychical phenomena.

(a) That presentiments do not come when wanted.

(b) That they are often frivolous, and of little importance or value to the seer.

The fact is that the liability to them is not continuous, but intermittent (as it is with some other psychical phenomena).

3. They frequently (but not always as some suppose, in fact, scarcely we may say generally) refer to death, e.g., the seer is often aware that he will never meet his friend again, or that a death of one dear to him has occurred in a certain locality. I am inclined to think that minor presentiments are more common than is supposed, but death presentiments being graver and more important are usually recollected and noticed, while the others attract little attention.

4. As to the theory that only presentiments which come true are noted but the others are forgotten, I may say that my own experience is that most presentiments come true, though some fail (more often partially than entirely).

5. As far as my observation goes the phenomenon of presentiments occurs thus. In addition to the visible world seen by the retina of the eye, an apparition occurs to the inner eye (the optic nerve?), something like the double picture in a dissolving view. When the will allows it this dominates. To explain by an instance:—Aubrey relates how a Highland seer said that a plank which he saw a man working at in making a bed would be part of a coffin. He was jested at, but it came true. In three days the man's child died and that plank was used in the coffin. In this case the bedstead would dissolve and a coffin appear instead.

6. As to sound presentiment it comes in the form of a "still-small voice" as from a distance.

PENWITH.

GOD AND NATURE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—When so many modern thinkers are looking into these profound mysteries, I shall be glad if you can find room for this passage from a work of Böhm's so extremely scarce that readers who value his testimony are unlikely to have seen this part of it. Peculiarities in style, in any contemporary medium, are borne with for the sake of the message conveyed; for a medium of the seventeenth century I claim equal indulgence.

A. J. PENNY.

"The Abyssal Will out of the Eternal Word of the Separability, introduceth itself in the creaturely word, viz., in the root of the creaturely soul, into an Ens and substance, after that kind and manner, as the outbreathing of God, with the Separability of the Eternal willing, hath introduced itself with the visible world into manifold properties, viz., into Evil and Good, into love and enmity: that in such a contrary, the substance may become separable, or distinct, formable, perceptible and inventible; and that everything in such contrary may become perceptible to itself.

"For in God all substances are but one substance, an Eternal one, the Eternal, One Only Good; which Eternal One without separability or distinguishability would not be manifested or revealed to itself. Therefore hath the same outbreathed out of itself, that a multiplicity and separability might originate or exist: which separability or distinguishability hath introduced itself into own-self willing, and into properties; and the properties into desire, and the desire into substance.

"So that all things of the visible world, both animate and inanimate, might originate or exist, out of the Separability or distinguishability of the out-speaking Word, out of the root of the Great Mystery.

"Everything hath its separation or distinction in itself. The Centre of everything is Spirit, from the original of the Word. The separation or distinction in the thing is own self-will, its own self-impression or compaction; where every Spirit introduceth itself into substance, according to its essential desire.

"The formability of bodies existeth out of the experience of the willing, where every thing's centre, as a piece of the outspoken Word, re-out speaketh itself, and compriseth or frameth itself into separability or distinguishability, after the kind and manner of the Divine Speaking.

"And so now if in this outspoken there were no Divine or Free Will, then the speaking would have a law and would stand or be in or under compulsion or subjection, and no desire or longing delight might exist; and then the speaking were finite and inchoative, which it is not.

"But it is the Breathing of the Abyss and a separability or distinguishability of the Eternal Stillness, an outparting or distributing of itself, where the partability standeth again in its own self separability, in an own self willing, and is again an out-speaking of itself, out of which Nature and the Creaturely Life hath taken its original.

"And hence in everything, an own self-will is existed, so that everything introduceth itself, out of its own experience into form and shape, condition or constitution, as also into a life and working, as in its centre it standeth in the universal experience, viz., in the Great Mystery, in the mother of all substances and things.

"Every centre maketh its own outbreathing, nature, and substance, out of itself; and yet all originated out of the Eternal One."

It is a strange way of shewing our love and reverence for the Creator, to be perpetually condemning and reviling everything that He has created. Were you to tell a poet that his poems are detestable, would he thank you for the compliment?

SEANCES WITH MISS WOOD.

Since the publication of my report, in last week's issue, upon the successful seances we have had with Miss Wood, I have received several letters from various Spiritualists expressing their satisfaction at the results. It is gratifying in the highest degree to those who have advocated the views contained in the recent circular as published in "LIGHT," and signed by such a large number of well-known and representative Spiritualists, to find that there exists a widespread appreciation of the method suggested therein, viz., having the medium in sight of the sitters during the seance so that the form and medium may be seen at the same time. Every day shows the strong advisability of such a course, so that doubtful phenomena and gross imposture may be put from our midst. Surely it is better to be without this phase of spiritualistic phenomena altogether than that we should have a continuous repetition of those disastrous exposures which from time to time hold our movement up to ridicule. The following encouraging and sympathetic note has been sent in regard to the report of last week, from Mr. Charles Blackburn, which I hope you will kindly publish.

HENRY BURTON.

DEAR SIR,—In "LIGHT" of this week I am glad to notice your report that your seances with Miss Wood, by continued perseverance, are resuming their old force. What has occurred shews to those who desire to seize "Pocha," or other genuine forms, the immense damage and injury they do to the mediums through whom the forms are produced. It has taken some months to recuperate Miss Wood, and even yet she is far from recovered from the shock she sustained, or the forms would come out more quickly and better. You cannot force success by holding seances just in any way you like, without the consent of the spirits and the medium. Although the medium may oblige you, in order to shew her honourableness, still she knows that it is by sitting inside a cabinet that she has had the most certain success. I would resort to it again until she is stronger, and if you ask the spirits to assist you in what you want, they will, in time, do everything to your satisfaction.—Yours truly,

CHAS. BLACKBURN.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

CONTRIBUTED BY JOHN S. FARMER.

The "Religio-Philosophical Journal."

The Journal is very much alive. There are many who admire its courage in defending the right and exposing fraud, even when not altogether able to approve of the modus operandi, which is essentially transatlantic in character. We soon discern that American and English journalism are marked by several broad lines of distinction, and what would seem encre here would there pass current as coin of the realm—i.e., if America has "a realm," of which we are not quite sure. Most of the readers of "LIGHT" will, however, be able to shake hands with those of our Chicago contemporary. The policy of the two papers is one, although the means adopted to the end are slightly different. The Religio this week does not lack evidence of the fact that they have not quite finished setting their house in order in America yet. There are still some tricksters passing as mediums, who manage to gull the public. We are beginning to feel more and more convinced every day that the action taken some time since with a view to abolishing the public dark circle was and is justified by events, and that the simplest phenomena in the light are the only ones Spiritualists are wise in putting before a naturally ignorant (at first) though curious public. This time it is a Mr. Briggs, of Boston, who is shewn up. We note with pleasure also that amidst all the din of war on fraud, the application of the realities of Spiritualism to daily life and thought is not forgotten. A true key note is struck in the editorial entitled "Spirit Work." It is, curiously enough, the same as that which was, quite unintentionally, we believe, struck in the editorial of the present issue of "LIGHT," viz., the responsibility of Spiritualists. It is pointed out that it would be well if Spiritualists seriously asked themselves what they have fitted themselves to do in spirit life. They are soon going to stop making money; the fashion of their clothes will trouble them no more; politics will not interest them, and mere wonder-hunters will have nothing to do. "Have you thought, Spiritualists of to-day, what there is to be done that you would like to do? Have you prepared yourself to take up that work, when all earth's work of necessity must cease? Are you trying to spread the truth which is such a joy to your own soul? . . . You cannot teach, you say, but you can help sustain those who do. . . . It is your need, not your brother's, we are urging. Not for God's sake, not for truth's sake, not for humanity's sake, for these have not noticeably stirred you as yet, but for your own sake, do we urge that you should improve, nay seek for, opportunities to do good to your neighbour, the one nearest to you." Sound sense in that; now please turn to page 138 and read "The Work of the C.A.S."

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON &amp; THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

St. Andrew's Hall, 14, Newmarket Street, Oxford Street, London.

The introduction of the subject, "Spiritualism as a Personal Need," unquestionably placed the audience at this hall, on Sunday last, fairly and squarely in the presence of some of the supreme realities of life. These realities are essentially individual in their application: the need of a due appreciation of them conspicuously personal: and Spiritualism alone responds to the exigencies of the situation; for while it expounds theories and facts upon the nature, qualities, and consequences of Being, it necessarily supplies motives for conduct of an urgent and constraining character which cannot well fail to influence individual life everywhere. Our spiritual origin, sustained relations with other spirits, and common interdependence, viewed in association with the all-pervading spirit of the one universal Father, gave occasion to the lecturer to connect the duties of life with its essence, and both with Spiritualism, in a form which exhibited very clearly the personal need of a diligent cultivation of the resources, and a loyal obedience to the teachings, of our inspiring faith. The subject is thus naturally divided into two parts: the inherent quality of the life—upon which these Controls have been gradually building up their views of the Divinity in human nature—and the incumbent obligation to aid its righteous development. Under neither aspect is there way of escape for any of us, so that the personal need of an acquaintance with the unique source of effective enlightenment is put beyond possibility of controversy. Our own Poet Laureate asks,

" . . . What am I?"

and himself promptly answers,

"An infant crying in the night.
An infant crying for the light."

The growth of a single blade of grass is a mystery to us: our own thoughts, groping in the dark, are mysteries and the source of mystery; and neither the philosophy nor the religion, the politics nor the social ethics of the day, contribute much to the solution of the problems of life, upon which it is the special province of Spiritualism to speak with the precision and authority of certain knowledge of their issues. That which gives importance to these problems—and which, in fact, qualifies them in a manner so essential that we feel instinctively the inadequacy of any elucidation from which it is excluded—is the question of the "Life beyond the Grave." Spiritualism speaks authoritatively upon that point, and describes the character and contingencies of that life. It brings us face to face with our loved and otherwise lost friends and relatives, who have themselves proved, and are always ready to certify, that death is transition only—a Divine and beautiful providence, securing and guaranteeing that continuance of life needful for the perfection of Being, for which our experience and conduct here furnish the preliminary, elementary conditions. Facts of this nature reach those who think and investigate for themselves, and feel their personal need of them; and in their influence they promptly change the whole current of thought and action of individual life on earth. For the dominant truth of the involved lives—of the present struggle and its immortal outgrowth, that is to say—is, that as we cultivate our better nature here by work and effort for the benefit of the spiritually dark and mentally ignorant, finding our own in others' good, so do we elaborate our own future and construct our eventual surroundings, the degree of the happiness associated therewith being proportionate to the quality of this probationary term. Is it possible to suggest any more powerful motive for righteous living than this, when the cardinal fact of our immortality is kept in view, or to indicate more clearly the personal nature of the need of Spiritualism? The lecturer insisted, as often before, upon the actively beneficial influences of these considerations upon every-day duties, now and here, and pointedly contrasted the cogency of their motive power with that of the miserable delusion which would simply seek to comfort the forlorn and wretched of this world by a promise that, if they will but accept the doctrines imposed upon them and consent to receive of the righteousness of another, all may perhaps be right hereafter. The most potent emotion of human nature is the offspring of its religious element; rightly used and nurtured it is capable of ministering to the rapid and healthy progress of its subject; perverted, darkened, weakened, the end is revolution, materialism is preferred, and life is poisoned at the very source of its higher qualities. Spiritualism, in fact, answers every human need of to-day, lightens trials and hardships, effects an absolute revolution in individual character, and is, under every aspect, and beyond all question, a personal need. It is not possible, under this summary form, to follow the lecturer into all those instructive details of individual, social, political, scientific and religious life and duty, which constitute the special charm and value of this series of discourses, nor to convey otherwise than by textual quotation, any fair notion of the beauty and richness of the language, or the coherence of the comprehensive and exhaustive argument, so invariably conspicuous, whatever the subject matter. Such features can only be affirmed and then verified as opportunity serves. On Sunday last these illustrative references were numerous and especially effective, covering, for example, very just and earnest deprecation of the misrepresentations of Spiritualism by the public Press, urging resistance to, and correction of, that form of defamation as a duty not less towards the radiant angel-hosts than to ourselves and our faith; passing then to a searching criticism of existing political, social, and religious combinations, and exposing the inherent intolerance, weakness and oppression of these as affecting individual life—and especially the life of the poor; affirming that a personal appreciation of the facts and teachings of Spiritualism would presently reach to the roots of such evils and disperse the conditions which favour them. We were urged to get outside of creedal dogmatism, and to stand evenly with the facts of nature; to recognise the obligations of existence, and the personal nature of the necessity of heeding them, if Spiritualism is to achieve its mission with the individual. He alone is great who is good, and he good who labours for the improvement and elevation of his fellows. If ourselves assured that Spiritualism is a personal need, regulating thought, expanding mind, influencing action and generally conveying truth to us in a form felt to be essential to our happiness and progress, let us, while thanking God for the light, be unwearied and always earnest in our efforts to extend its blessings to others.

After the delivery of the address, so inadequately described by the preceding summary, the lecturer, Mr. Morse, in his normal condition, spoke very feelingly upon the recent bereavement of that earnest Spiritualist and able and zealous worker, Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, whose younger son passed away on Friday last, after a very brief illness, and invited the congregation to express, by a "rising vote," their sympathy with the afflicted family. The suggestion was responded to with touching unanimity and stillness, and the service was closed, upon the impulse of the moment by Mrs. Williams, who was in charge of the organ, by the substitution for the prescribed voluntary of Handel's affecting "Dead March" in "Saul."—S.B.

QUEBEC HALL.

Sunday evening's lecture in this hall, by Mr. MacDonnell, was of much interest to Spiritualists, being on the Miracles of Christ. The lecturer maintained that the spiritual powers and resources of such a being as Jesus was, were equal to everything recorded of Him. Hume's argument of the greater likelihood of testimony being false than of miracles being true, was fairly answered in the humorous supposition of a Chinese traveller, who related his having seen a balloon ascent in England. The Emperor thought it more likely he was inventing lies than that a great bag, as big as a house, filled with something, lifted three men from the earth above the clouds and carried them away, and for these supposed lies the man was flayed alive. The miracle workers of ancient and modern days were shewn to be demonstrators of a great spiritual power; and the concluding exhortation to imitate the life of the great miracle worker was reasonable and appropriate. Of course, a friendly discussion followed, in which the lecturer had sceptics of various shades to answer. We were pleased to see a good attendance of earnest thinking people.—Con.

LIVERPOOL.

During the last few weeks an active correspondence in the local papers on the subjects of Spiritualism and Thought-reading has kept the attention of the public alive on those and kindred matters. Mr. John Fowler and the Rev. J. H. Skewes paying special attention to each other. The last named gentleman last Friday had a meeting in his school-room, Milton-street, called by public advertisement, to consider the subjects of Thought-reading and Magnetism, when a lively discussion took place, many Spiritualists being present. A proposal was made and adopted that a society be formed, to investigate these and kindred subjects; but a significant paragraph appeared in the Mercury, on Monday, from Mr. Skewes, stating that the meeting held on the preceding Friday had nothing to do with Spiritualism.

Last Sunday Mrs. Britten again occupied the platform at Rodney Hall; the subjects being, in the morning, "Witchcraft, Sorcery, Divination," &c., and in the evening, "The Second Coming of Christ." The hall was crowded, all sitting and standing-room being occupied. The closest attention was paid to the lecturer, while she passed in review the religious systems of past ages, their developments and decadence, the appearance at different epochs of Avatars, Messiahs, and Saviours, &c. She contended that the Divine, or Christ Spirit, was in our midst to-day, of which all could avail themselves, and a practical knowledge of which would furnish the people, from prince to peasant, with a knowledge of God and Immortality; and thus the true teaching of the Lord of the Kingdom would be fully realised when men would learn to love God and each other.

On Monday evening a meeting of a most interesting character took place in Hamilton-road Lecture Hall, Everton, Mrs. Britten kindly again being the speaker. Her subject was "The Ministry of Angels." The hall was full, a charge of 1s. being made for the front seats, and the back seats being free, with a collection. A number of questions were asked at the close, and most admirably replied to by the lecturer. It is intended to continue these week evening lectures, a sub-committee of young men connected with the Society having been formed to carry them on, the intention being to secure halls in different parts of the town, where lectures can be delivered on the Monday evenings. At the Monday evening meeting some of Rev. J. H. Skewes' friends delivered to the audience as they entered a circular, announcing a special sermon on Easter Sunday on Spiritualism, stating that Spiritualists deny the resurrection of Christ, and of all others! C.F.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—Last Sunday evening the members at Weirs Court were favoured with an address from Mr. J. G. Grey, of Gateshead, on "Spiritualism." The speaker discoursed upon the various phases of the movement in a manner very acceptable to the good audience present. Mr. Thompson, vice-president of the society, occupied the chair.—During last week we had the pleasure of hearing Dr. Nichols, of London, discourse in the Central Hall, Hood-street, upon "Vegetarianism;" and on the Thursday evening, on the platform of the N.E.S., to a large company, he interested us with a narrative of his "Twenty years' experience in Spiritualism." A number of non-Spiritualists were present, and were very much struck with the remarkable facts and phenomena to which he attested. We believe his presence at Weirs Court will do a great deal of good in giving some fresh impetus to the movement at that place. Mr. T. P. Barkas occupied the chair, and made some opportune remarks upon the subject of Spiritualism.

GATESHEAD.—Mr. Joseph Stephenson, vice-president of the Gateshead Society, gave an admirable lecture to a fairly good audience on Sunday evening last, upon Spiritualism as a Religion. On Sunday next, Mr. Rolson, of Byker, a new but able trance speaker, will occupy the platform. The Gateshead friends desire that those who are in any way favourably disposed toward them, will remember that the annual tea meeting and concert will be held at their rooms, on Easter Monday.

HOUGHTON-LE-SPRING.—The new and growing society at this place had the pleasure of listening to a discourse last Sunday evening, from Mr. Henry Burton, of Newcastle, on "The Spirit of the Age." He endeavoured to shew that every epoch of the world's history was dominated by a master idea, which, in whatever direction it might work, tended to give a great impetus to the progress of humanity. After shewing how in several marked epochs mankind, having gravitated downwards and become sunk in doubt and indifference, received an impulse that incited them to higher action, he shewed how in this present nineteenth century, man possessing so vast a scientific knowledge and wider methods of education, and not being able to procure a scrap of definite knowledge upon this great problem of spirit, was gradually and surely steering toward a materialism which was a practical Atheism, when Spiritualism, like a new and potent revelation, descended upon man, and with its far-reaching tendencies was beginning to afford to the human race a new and broader social, political, scientific and religious life than ever it has hitherto had. Mr. Cooper occupied the chair.

HETTON-LE-HOLE.—Mr. J. W. Mahony lectured on "Man a Spirit," at the Miners' Hall, on Sunday evening last. The company was a good one, and Mr. Mahony delivered himself in his usual able and terse style. Mr. W. Clennall officiated as chairman.

NORTHUMBRIA.

THE BRITISH THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.—Important changes have just occurred in our London Branch. From a recent letter from our esteemed friend and brother, Mr. C. C. Massey, we learn that on Sunday, January 7th, the annual election for officers resulted in the choice of Dr. Anna Kingsford as President and Mr. Edward Maitland, an eminent writer, and Dr. George Wyld, late President of the Branch, as Vice-Presidents for the ensuing year. Dr. Kingsford is perhaps the best person in England to head a moral and spiritual movement of the character of ours. Whether considered as regards her practical knowledge of certain branches of physical science, her personal elevation of character, or her spiritual endowments, she is one to command universal respect. As to Mr. Edward Maitland it suffices to say that he is fully worthy and competent to be her coadjutor.—Theosophist for March.

Words, like bellows, often blow a spark into a flame: the fire that wants vent will suppress itself.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

(With which is Incorporated the British National Association of Spiritualists. Established 1873.)

38, GREAT RUSSELL ST., BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.
(Entrance in WOBURN STREET.)

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed for the purpose of uniting Spiritualists of every variety of opinion in an organised body, with a view of promoting the investigation of the facts of Spiritualism, and of aiding students and enquirers in their researches by providing them with the best means of investigation.

The Association is governed by a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Council of thirty Members elected annually.

The Reference and Lending Libraries contain a large collection of the best works on Spiritualism and occult subjects. Spiritualist and other newspapers and periodicals from all parts of the world are regularly supplied for the Reading Room, to which Members have access daily.

The Secretary, or his representative, is in attendance to receive visitors, and answer enquiries; on Saturdays, from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.; on other days from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. On Sundays the Rooms are closed.

Spiritualists and others visiting the Metropolis are cordially invited to visit the Association and inspect the various objects of interest on view in the Reading Room and Library. Information is cheerfully afforded to enquirers on all questions affecting Spiritualism.

Members' Free Séances are held on Wednesday evenings, at 8 o'clock prompt subject to certain regulations, which can be ascertained on application.

Discussions are held fortnightly during the winter months. Admission free to Members and Subscribers, who can introduce one or more friends to each meeting. Programmes can be obtained on application during the winter season.

Séances, at which all friends are welcome, are held at intervals during the season. An admission fee is charged, including refreshments.

GOOD TEMPLARS' WATCHWORD.

The Official Organ of the Grand Lodge of England, and the recognised Medium for the Circulation of Official and other Information to the Order, both in this Country and throughout the World.

The "WATCHWORD" being an Illustrated Temperance Periodical of general interest, containing a weekly record of important events, Original Articles, Tales, Sketches, etc., its sale is by no means confined to Good Templars, as it circulates largely among influential philanthropists, and others interested in the Temperance movement, which is becoming increasingly popular in the upper circles of Society.

Published by JOHN KEMPSTER & Co., 3, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

Advertisements should reach the Office NOT LATER than 11 o'clock on Wednesday Morning in each week.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Spiritualists are surprisingly fond of singing, the quantity being frequently of more object than the quality. "How often, oh, how often in the days that are gone by" have I "gathered at the river," that most melancholy stream; walked "hand-in-hand with angels," not always of light, and heard about the "sweet by-and-bye" suggestive of "Patience" in more senses than one. Their meetings also for public worship are enlivened by much music, and there is more than one hymnal available containing suitable hymns and spiritual songs not all devoid of merit. Mr. Thomas Brevior, not content with what exists, makes in a neat little volume of some 400 pages what he modestly calls "A Contribution to the Hymnal of the Future."* Spiritualism has been largely indebted to the author of "The Two Worlds" for long and trusty service. No living Spiritualist can point to a longer record of work diligently done, none assuredly to more self-denying and sustained labour than the editor of the Spiritual Magazine. He has before published a little volume of "Wayside Verses," and this more ambitious effort, the latest result of his enforced leisure, contains a large number of short poems, usually in familiar hymn-metres, dealing with subjects on which all liberal religionists are at one, and eschewing dogma and hard-and-fast definitions of creed. He touchingly says: "It is not the theology that divides men, but the religion that unites them, and of which Christ is the great expositor, that these hymns are designed to illustrate and enforce. The thoughts and feelings to which their composition had given rise have been to me a solace in adversity, blindness, and bereavement." It would please the author's many friends if an extended sale of his little volume might testify to him a general appreciation of his latest, I hope by no means his last, work.

As I write on the day that has no other memory but one, the subjoined specimen of the author's thoughts and meditations seems appropriate:—

Ecce Homo!

Tempted, forsaken, and betrayed,
Reviled, and crucified;
Alone with God, bereft of aid,
For man He lived and died.

With bleeding feet our earth He trod,
And here His work began.
In Him behold the son of God;
In Him behold the man!

In Him behold incarnate love,
The perfect sacrifice!
In Him the Gospel from above
Revealed to mortal eyes.

* "Lyrics for Heart and Voice: a Contribution to the Hymnal of the Future." Thos. Brevior (F. Pitman).

Oh, Christ, the heart will cling to Thee
In darkness, doubt, and pain,
For light, and hope, and sympathy:
Nor shall the trust be vain.

No cup of sorrow could be full,
No spirit tried as Thine;
Yet none so meek and pitiful,
So lowly and divine.

Mr. Brevior's form and rhythm is not always perfect, but his thoughts have the meditative tone and simple religious feeling that will commend them to like-minded persons, for whom they will also have the additional merit of being destitute of that mistiness, which some mistake for profundity, and which is so characteristic of some modern poetry.

The following amusing and very true estimate of a man, who by no means regards himself as funny, I clip from the New York World as quoted in The Theosophist. Mr. Cook seems to vulgarise and disfigure every subject that he touches. He is as great a sinner in this respect as regards Spiritualism as he is in respect of Philosophy and Religion.

"All reasonable persons must regret to see that the Rev. Joseph Cook has returned from New Zealand not only unroasted, but quite as raw as when he left his native shore. Humboldt's reported and unkind mention of Bayard Taylor as a 'man who had travelled further and seen less than any one he had ever met,' exactly fits the Rev. Joseph Cook. No one expected to find that Mr. Cook had made an acquaintance with the principles of science, or had arrived at an appreciation of his own intellectual unfitness for any task which requires sound knowledge and a respect for truth, during his voyage around the world; but it was not too much to hope that he might have acquired, by contact with polished races and by the sight of a larger horizon than that he had been accustomed to, some sense of his own insignificance and a corresponding measure of respect for names honoured in all lands. But the homely proverb is justified once more. A silken purse is not to be made out of certain kinds of material, and no sooner does the Rev. Joseph Cook feel himself on solid ground, within sight of his native heath, than he takes up his parable against Herbert Spencer, whom he calls a charlatan, and against Professor Fiske, whom he reviles as but the echo of a charlatan. Mr. Cook must not misunderstand this brief notice. The World notices him, not because his opinions on any subject are of the slightest importance to serious people, but because being a harlequin, he is tolerable only when he is ridiculous, and needs to be corrected when he becomes impertinent."

The following stories are good, especially the latter, albeit somewhat tough. The Psychological Society, long since dead, is to be taken for its present-day re-incarnation, the Society for Psychical Research. The way that head rolled down stairs, across a courtyard, into a room, stopped this side up, and winked at the right woman, impresses me greatly.

True Ghost Stories.

"The two ghost stories told (says the London correspondent of the Liverpool Mercury) by our most eminent anatomist are as romantic in their way as any told by the Psychological Society. When, hardly more than a lad at Lancaster, the future defender of vivisection was studying for the medical profession, he had a horror of the ghastly details of the business, which he imagined he could never overcome. He was cured, strange to say, by a fright. Having to take some medicine on a windy night to Lancaster Castle, he had to pass through the room in which he had taken part in dissections. Just as he entered the room with the basket of medicine under his arm, the clouds which hid the moon suddenly parted, a door slammed, and, looking up, the future biologist saw what he thought was an enormous figure in white, with arms outstretched, looking down upon him. He turned around trembling, and against the wall opposite stood another figure in white. He dropped his basket and ran. The patients in Lancaster Castle got no medicine that night. But when he returned next day and found that he had been frightened by mortuary sheets, he braced his nerves up so that he was soon collecting skulls. He made a fine set, but for a long time he could not get an Ethiopian skull. At last a negro died in Lancaster Castle, and the young doctor got permission to have his head. It was again a windy night when the operation of removing the head was determined upon. But habited in his long cloak, then the fashion, and provided with a blue bag, the comparative anatomist soon had the head safely stowed away. As he left the room in which the coffin lay, however, the wind slammed the door, caught his cloak, and nearly threw him upon his face. Attempting to recover himself, he lost his hold of the bag, the head fell out, rolled with increasing velocity down a flight of steps, across a courtyard, and settled itself upon the neck, with one eye open and the other shut, in a room where two women shrieked. The professor rushed wildly after it, took no notice of the women, seized the skull, put it in his bag again, and ran from the Castle. Four or five years afterwards he was attending a dying woman, who called loudly for a clergyman, to whom she had something to tell. The doctor begged her to tell him, as no clergyman was near enough to be called in time. At length she spoke. "Oh, sir, I had a husband, who was a negro, and, I fear, a bad man. He died, sir, in Lancaster Castle; and, oh! sir, I was standing one day in the rooms when my husband's head came out of the floor, and seemed to ask me to help him. And then, sir, the devil came through the door, snatched up the head, put it into a bag, and disappeared before I could do anything. And I have never done anything. Oh, sir, what can I do for my poor husband's soul?"

As I have strenuously expressed the opinion that Tabooed Topics are best avoided in a paper devoted to the discussion of Spiritualism, a subject already sufficiently weighted with antagonism and unpopularity, I may be permitted to say that my objection is solely that now stated, and does not extend to the discussion in a fair and reasonable manner of such subjects in a journal specially designed for that purpose. I, too, believe that there are many subjects that it would be fit and proper to ventilate and discuss. I see no reason to doubt that the public interest might be enlisted usefully in their treatment, and the public mind be informed on their merits and demerits. Such a journal would need strong management and wise discretion in excluding from its pages uninteresting and irrelevant matter. And the list of subjects propounded in the advertisement of the projected journal is sufficiently extensive to afford a grand field for the prancing of hobby-horses. But, if these gambols be restrained, there is also much room for useful dissertation and discussion. I wish well to the project, of which I know nothing but what I see in print.

M.A. (OXON.)

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION.—The Thirty-fifth Anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism was celebrated at Neumeyer Hall, Bloomsbury, W.C., on Wednesday evening, the 28th inst., and in our next number we shall give a report of the proceedings, which the crowded condition of our columns prevents us from publishing in our presents issue.

THE USE OF MOURNING.—We quote the following from the Finchley and Hendon Times of the 24th inst.:—"Our obituary column records the death of Mr. Frank Rogers, son of Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, of Rose Villa, Church End, Finchley. The funeral took place on Monday at the Marylebone Cemetery, East End, Finchley. We note the fact here, simply to mention our observation that the friends of the departed wore no mourning on the occasion. We believe that though they have, in the course of years, had many members of their family circle removed by death, they have always refrained from the use of mourning, as a matter of principle—feeling that, though their sorrow for their own loss must naturally at such times be very keen, any unnecessary parade of the emblems of grief is inconsistent with the conviction that the departed one has passed to a higher and a happier life."

SPIRITUALISM FROM A SCIENTIFIC POINT OF VIEW.

[The following paper was read on Monday evening, March 19th, before the Members of the Central Association of Spiritualists, 38, Great Russell Street, W.C., by Mr. J. W. SLATER, Editor of the "Journal of Science."]

In the remarks which I am about to address to you I must admit myself as being in some degree open to the charge of presumption. As regards Spiritualism I am merely an outsider, not unacquainted with your literature, and anxious that whatever facts you have to bring forward should receive full and fair consideration. On the other hand, though I have been all my life engaged in scientific pursuits and in combating those who under any pretext would seek to restrict research, I stand here merely as a private individual. I have not been commissioned to speak on behalf of any of the learned societies, of the British Association, or still less of that fearful and wonderful body, the Department of Science and Art. Hence whatever I may say can bind no one, and must be accepted or rejected simply on its own merits.

The capital point may first be raised: What do I understand by Spiritualism? Perhaps it may be said that it is essentially summed up in the following proposition, viz., that there exist agencies or forces, personal and intelligent, of undefined power, and capable of affecting and modifying material objects, but which, at the same time, ordinarily escape human notice, and are not taken into account either in scientific investigations or in the affairs of daily life.

What these agencies are, whether the spirits of deceased men and animals, or spirits of a totally different order, or corporeal beings which ordinarily exist and act in space of more than three dimensions, is not the immediate question.

This proposition, then, is accepted by Spiritualists as demonstrated by facts. With some few exceptions—which are certainly becoming more numerous—scientific men doubt or deny the alleged phenomena upon which Spiritualism is based. They explain such phenomena as either delusions or as produced by trickery and collusion. Now, I am not disposed to deny the truth, in certain cases, of either of these explanations. A really good observer, a man who can accurately see, feel, &c., objects presented to him, who can apprehend them in his mind without misconception, and who can report them faithfully without mixing his own inferences or preconceptions with the facts, is not very commonly to be met with. The reason of this lies in our education, which withdraws the mind almost exclusively from things to fix it upon words, so that a boy at the age of thirteen or fourteen is often a worse observer than he was at eight or nine. Be this as it may, cases of misobservation are no less frequent than glaring. Many here present will have heard that when Sir Humphrey Davy first produced the alkaline metals a friend of his, of good standing in the scientific world, coming into his laboratory and taking up a bit of potassium pronounced it "certainly metallic and very ponderous." The notion of considerable heaviness was so linked in his mind with the other general properties of metals that to him this novel substance felt heavy, though it floats upon water. I lately heard the case of a man who when shivering with cold applied his feet to a heating-pipe from which hot air was generally supplied and soon felt all in a glow. Shortly afterwards it was found that, by reason of some mistake, the pipes were delivering a current of cold air.

Scepticism of Scientific Men.

The scepticism of scientific men and their indisposition to receive the testimony of others, especially of such as have not proved themselves capable of accurate observation, is often remarked and complained of. But it is sometimes forgotten that we are in many cases slow to receive the evidence even of our own senses without some counter-check. It is a very common practice in investigations where the result has to be judged by the appearance, e.g., of a colour, to call in some person who has no knowledge of what has been going on or of what is expected, and to ask whether he sees any difference between the contents of two glasses placed before him. There are numerous other devices which the conscientious and truth-loving observer employs to make sure that he is not deceiving himself, and the more remarkable and novel the facts, or apparent facts, seem, the more vigorous becomes his scrutiny. Again, if we read of some experimental result obtained even by a man of the most unquestionable eminence we generally make it a point to suspend judgment, or at least to accept the conclusion with reservations until the experiment has been repeated by others and the result verified. So strong is this feeling that in cases where it is not possible to repeat the observation or the experiment at pleasure many persons prefer to keep silence. Thus, suppose I were walking on the shore, whether in England or elsewhere, and should happen to spy a sea-serpent, I should not dare to publish my observation, because the most charitable verdict passed upon me by the official scientific world would be "temporary insanity," and any future fact which I might observe ever after would be received with the query, "Is this another sea-serpent?" Yet at the same time, none of the objectors would be able to give any a priori reason why such serpents should not exist, or in fact to produce anything more worthy the name of an argument than the old cavil, "Have any of the chief priests or the Pharisees believed it?" The existence of monstrous sea-serpents, if proved, would be an addition to our present knowledge, but it would not compel the revision or abandonment of any accepted system or theory.

We will look next at an example which is not a supposition, but a positive fact, and which cuts deeper into the question. The celebrated Cuvier was requested to examine a fossil human skeleton. He refused. He had been previously troubled with similar applications, and had found the remains in former cases not to be human. In consequence the skeleton was lost. Had it been admitted to be human it would have inflicted severe damage upon Cuvier's theories. Thus we see how a prudent and, indeed, laudable caution may slide imperceptibly into unjustifiable scepticism, and even into the refusal to look at evidence.

Let us turn from the suspicion of self-delusion on the part of the observers to that of jugglery or intentional deceit on behalf of someone concerned. This is a painful subject, but it is one to which we cannot shut our eyes entirely. Whenever a human being forms, so to speak, part of the apparatus employed in performing any experiment, and knows what is the result expected, then the door for trickery is more or less open. But this is not all. It is whispered in well-informed circles that some men of high reputation do not at all times abstain from slightly "cooking" their experimental results, so as to square better with theory. I have even heard an eminent savant accused, by name, of having illustrated a paper which he was reading not with the real phenomena which he professed to produce, but with others, which might be mistaken for them by any ordinary spectator. Now, if this eminent man were to hear of the exposure of a fraudulent medium he would, no doubt, be virtuously indignant. Yet, wherein lies the difference? As regards the possibility of jugglery, I am no competent judge, having no knowledge as to what is within, and what lies without, the scope of the conjurer. One very painful reflection here suggests itself—if such apparent results are effected by those who have openly and avowedly studied the deceptibility of human nature, may not more, perhaps, be done by those who conceal their skill? May not, sometimes also, an accidental coincidence, without human intention, lead men fearfully astray?

Realities, Illusions, or Deceptions.

We return now to the fundamental phenomena of Spiritualism. Are they realities, illusions, or deceptions? If realities, what are their laws and their causes? All these are questions which the scientific world ought to answer, or, at least, endeavour to answer as quickly and as completely as possible.

I know that some instructors of the British public are of a different opinion. They bid us ignore all such phenomena under penalty of falling back into the superstitions of the Dark Ages, which still run in our blood. Such cautions cannot be accepted. It is the bounden duty of Science to investigate all classes of phenomena, and to discriminate between the genuine and the spurious, however difficult may be the task, and however unwelcome the possible results. If she holds back, and hands her duties over to police-magistrates, judges, and juries, she simply signs her own abdication. As for the superstitions of the past it might be often worth inquiry whether they do not contain germs of truth which deserve to be freed from the distortions and exaggerations of the careless and the ignorant.

A certain writer declared not long ago that when the Board schools had existed a little longer, superstition would entirely disappear. Yet men more profoundly learned than any member of a School Board, any inspector of schools, or member of the Committee of the Privy Council upon Education have entertained notions which are commonly pronounced superstitious.

I said the results of a full inquiry into the phenomena of Spiritualism might possibly prove unwelcome. Let us come here to an understanding. Much of what must follow from the general proposition under which we summed up the spiritualistic philosophy may rank not as an addendum to any branch of science as now understood—not an enlargement of existing theories, but a something essentially destructive and subversive. I do not refer to the antagonism between materialism and its opposite, for although many distinguished men think that they can construct the universe out of matter and motion only, yet others, not less able and learned, admit in vital phenomena the co-operation of a something which has not yet been resolved into matter and motion. At any rate, Monism has not been formally adopted in our authorised manuals and text-books as a new Athanasian Creed, which, except a man believe, he shall not "pass" at any and every examination.

The difficulty lies here:—Science—I mean not modern science only as now understood, but any possible and conceivable science—requires that effects must follow upon their causes in one unbroken chain, like results always happening under like conditions. Let us take an instance. The mechanic examines ten, or a hundred, or a thousand pieces of iron. If they are all of the same quality he finds that they will all support the same weight, and all show the same degree of tenacity and ductility. Hence he feels free to predict that another ten, or hundred, or thousand pieces of iron, if under the same conditions and of the same quality, will behave exactly the same; and common experience confirms his prediction.

Next, the physicist examines the same pieces of iron. He finds that they have all the same conducting powers for heat and electricity; that all melt at the same temperature; and under the same conditions can be made to acquire magnetic polarity. He concludes from his examination that the properties which he has observed belong not alone to the particular pieces of iron examined, but to all iron. Here, again, experience confirms the conclusions which he draws. Let the pieces then be handed over to the chemist. He, in turn, finds that they all, on being oxidised, combine with oxygen in the same proportion; that they all dissolve in the same acids to the same extent, forming salts which possess the same properties. He again expresses the results of his observations, in general terms, as being the attributes of iron; and here, again, experience shews that, save for the presence of impurities, his conclusions hold good at all times and in all cases.

But now let us suppose these pieces of iron possessed of a will, in virtue of which they were able to resist or modify the effects of the agencies brought to bear upon them. It would then be impossible to argue from the properties of one piece of iron to those of another piece, or of iron in general. Consequently, the mechanics, the physics, and the chemistry of iron could not exist. Our knowledge of iron would be not rectified or extended, but annulled, and the certainty which we now enjoy concerning its properties would be unattainable.

Now, if there are finite, intelligent agents, capable of acting upon matter, living and lifeless, and of modifying it by their mere will without the intervention of any ordinary appliances, it seems to me that we are very nearly in the same position as if the pieces of iron above-mentioned were possessed of a self-determinative power. In every phenomenon we should be in danger of meeting with caprice or arbitrariness. In all our calculations there would figure an unknown quantity representing the will and the power of these invisible agents and the probability of their intervention. The evaluation of this complex unknown quantity would, perhaps, in many, if not in all cases exceed human ability. But without such evaluation our power of formulating the simplest truth, or of announcing the result of any given cause, would be at an end, and science would be simply impossible.

The Possible Influence of Unseen Agents.

The only loop-hole for escape would be the possibility of determining the exact limits of the power of these unseen agents and the condition of their interference. If we could find here something constant, then, and then only, would science be capable of reconstruction. It is not always taken into account how incompatible the action of finite wills is with the very fundamental concepts of science. An infinite will, attended by infinite power and exercised without "variableness or shadow of turning," does not damage our calculations; it is, so to speak, a constant upon which we can always reckon. But if it were proved that living human beings could by the mere force of will affect the course of nature, or act upon matter except through physical means, all would be hopeless confusion. But as far as the matter has been investigated it can scarcely be said that a man's motives and intentions have any influence upon the physical results of his operations. Suppose that five men set to work to prepare strychnine, each with a different end in view. Suppose A. wishes to use it in medicine, and fears that the article to be met with in the shops might be adulterated; B. wishes to poison an enemy, and prepares the article himself in secret to avoid detection; C. makes it simply to sell; D. has been set to prepare some strychnine as a college exercise; and E., being about to make some elaborate researches into its constitution, thinks it prudent to prepare a sample personally, so as to be assured of its absolute purity. Nothing can be more different than the ends which these men have respectively in view. Yet so long as they each and all start with good materials and work carefully in accordance with the best known methods, there is no evidence to show that their results will be other than pure strychnine, having in each case precisely the same properties, physical, chemical, and physiological. Indeed, though this precise experiment has never been tried, yet all experience warrants us in believing the complete identity of their products.

It must be remembered that scientific men have not been hasty in inferring the unvarying regularity of such classes of natural phenomena as have come under their immediate observation. They have provisionally admitted the possibility of intervention from the most various quarters. The olden votaries of chemical science, when they had obtained any new result, were careful to repeat the experiment at different hours of the day or night, in light and in darkness, at different parts of the year, under different planetary aspects, &c., in order to see whether such changing conditions had any influence. I may mention that the chemical action of light and ultimately the art of photography rank among the positive results of such a scrutiny. Even the state of health of the operator and his moral condition were not left out of view, and the possible intervention of spiritual beings was constantly kept in mind. It was to guard against the inroads of malignant or at least mischievous spirits that the alchemist of old marked his melting-pots with the sign of the cross, whence such instruments retain the name of crucible to this day.

Similar comparative investigations were conducted in other sciences, and by degrees it was thus ascertained what conditions were essential to the reproduction of every class of phenomena, whilst others were eliminated as having no influence upon the result. Amongst those thus set aside as indifferent, ranked, as far as has been ascertained, the moral and spiritual conditions above referred to, the motives of the experimentalist, his strength of will, his faith, and generally his personal character, and still more the influence of any unseen non-material intelligences.

Bearing all this in mind you will, I hope, be able to appreciate the extreme reluctance which men of science feel to accept the statements made concerning spiritual manifestations. Even if they are unable to lay their hands upon any fraud on the part of the operators, or upon any proof of delusion on the part of the spectators and narrators of such manifestations, they still believe that there is somewhere a flaw, if it only could be brought to light.

In conversation with friends upon incidents which have been described in "LIGHT" or in the Psychological Review, &c., I have repeatedly heard it declared in substance that "were we to witness such occurrences we should be more disposed to believe ourselves the victims of some strange illusion, some temporary mental disease, than to admit that the experience of our past lives and of those of our colleagues and predecessors could thus prove itself at fault."

This is, of course, the doctrine of "dominant ideas" of your worthy friend, Dr. Carpenter, translated into slightly different language.

None of these men would deny that there may be impersonal forces, forms of energy as yet unknown which play a part in nature, because such forces or powers, if they exist, will doubtless be correlated with and convertible into the known forms of energy such as heat, light, electricity, &c., so will like them follow what we commonly call fixed "laws" of action. The difficulty which scientific men encounter in Spiritualism lies in the personality and intelligence which the agencies invoked seem to exhibit.

It will, I hope, be distinctly understood that I am by no means seeking to justify men of science in ignoring spiritual and other so-called supernatural phenomena. Under no circumstances is it justifiable to shut our eyes to facts. If there is no undeviating order in the universe, if the chain of causation is liable at any moment to be broken by the action of wills, the sooner we know it the better.

I have just been speaking of men of science whose candour and love for the truth are beyond suspicion. But I am forced to confess that there are others whose zeal for the truth is limited to truths discovered by themselves, their friends, or their clique, and who are quite capable of suppressing facts discovered and announced by unknown strangers.

But let us look back a little further: it is said—and it is not my task either to confirm or to impugn the statements—that at spiritualist séances knots have been tied on stretched cords, so that undivided continuous rings of wood or metal have been passed on to a man's wrist whilst he kept his hands firmly clasped together. If these statements are the records of literal facts we must either assume the existence of a world of four-dimensional space interpenetrating our own, and of beings able to act in it, or we must believe that there are agencies capable of, e.g., disintegrating a man's arm or an iron ring, and again restoring its continuity without the intermediate stages being perceptible to any of the senses of the observer. I do not say that this is impossible, but it is surely inconceivable,—so much so that the hypothesis of space of more than three dimensions with all its admitted difficulties seems to me the more acceptable.

Or let us take the simple and more common case of a chair, table, or other heavy body being raised from the ground and suspended in the air. Let us think for a moment what this phenomenon involves.

The Conversion of Energy.

A certain amount of energy is needed to overcome the force of gravitation by which the object is held down to the surface of the earth. Whence is it derived? We always consider that the creation of energy, as of matter, is the prerogative of one only Being. In all the operations of nature, of the laboratory, and the workshop, we see energy transformed from one state into another, but never produced anew. The more accurate become our observations and experiments the more clearly we see that in these conversions there is neither loss nor gain, and that the starting-point is the transformation of matter. Fuel, undergoing chemical combination, liberates heat; this heat is then converted in the steam engine into mechanical power. If we employ this power to turn a dynamo machine we obtain light, and this light, falling upon a living plant, enables it to decompose the carbonic acids of the atmosphere, and to incorporate the carbon liberated with its own tissues. In like manner, if we observe the living animal, we find the power by which it moves, or carries burdens, derived from the chemical changes of the food it has eaten; the more work it is compelled to do the more food it requires, and if the supply of nutriment is deficient the animal's motive power diminishes. In short, wherever we look we trace, up to the present day at least, conversion of energy, but nowhere its creation. Nevertheless, though a firm believer in the conservation of energy, I should be glad to see physicists undertaking special researches from this point of view. If ever spiritual phenomena are examined, as I submit they ought to be, particular attention will have to be paid to this point. It must be ascertained whether during physical manifestations any change takes place, for instance, in the temperature of the room, or in the electric or luminous conditions of the air, or of any objects present. For, dealing with agencies which are as yet unmeasured and in every way undetermined, it is at least possible that the energy used in raising a chair or a table may be obtained by a process of conversion analogous to what we see in nature and to what we employ in art. For instance, I would ask whether when physical manifestations take place any change of temperature has ever been observed; if so, whether such change bears any proportion to the magnitude of the manifestations and the power they would necessitate; whether the luminous effect of lights or fires in the apartment is for the time being decreased. The supposition that the energy put forth can be derived from the medium is scarcely admissible, since, always supposing that we have before us the faithful records of genuine facts, the power put forth often exceeds the utmost strength of a man. If, in the course of experiments which I am suggesting, and which would task the skill of our most eminent physicists to carry out, and would probably at the same time be well worth the great trouble required—if, I say, in such experiments no trace of the conversion of energy from some other state to the one manifested can be detected, it would then seem that the unknown agencies at work have a power of creating or of destroying energy. I say expressly "of destroying," because when a chair or a table is lifted into the air this result might be effected in two ways—either by applying to the chair some power capable, for the time being, of overcoming the action of gravitation, or of, for the time being, annulling that action upon the chair, and in other words temporarily depriving it of weight. How either the creation or the destruction of energy can be effected we must, I presume, all confess ourselves unable to explain; but the first question to be met will be, is it ever done?

Non-Spatial Entities.

The next difficulty is one which is often raised by those who uphold the Monistic theory of the universe. Spirit is usually defined as being without extension or divisibility. A spirit, on this understanding, is something non-spatial. Monists, therefore, ask in what manner a non-spatial entity can act upon something spatial, i.e., any portion of matter. And it must be owned that this question is not very easily dealt with. Again, it is generally held by scientific authorities that action is always attended by reaction, the two being equal and opposite. If so, matter must be able to act upon spirit. As far as I am able to judge—as I have already intimated—the hypothesis of polydimensional space, as put forward by the late Professor Zollner, offers the key to these difficulties.

Having thus attempted to show how Spiritualism appears to scientific men, and what are the reasons which cause many of them to decline all inquiry into the subject I may, perhaps, be permitted to suggest a caution. You believe that you are in possession of the rudiments at least of a most important truth capable of altering the whole mental horizon of the human race. You naturally desire that this truth should be on the one hand fully developed, and on the other hand diffused among all mankind who are capable of receiving it. To do this you will, I am sure, on full reflection, recognise both the duty and the policy of keeping aloof from all entanglements. I mean that you will in the long run find it advantageous to take a position higher than that of sects and parties, of agitations and movements. In like manner I trust that Spiritualism will never seek to gain popularity by buffoonery. If mesmerists and electro-biologists, if I may venture to use so vilely-coined a word, had never come upon the platform and sought to make the public laugh, then whatever truth they have on their side would have much sooner earned recognition. By either of these shortcomings you would drive away those men who would be most able to decide upon the legitimacy of the claims of Spiritualism and to solve the question which it seems to raise.

May I, in conclusion, throw out a friendly challenge? I find it reported that by spiritual agency flowers, fruits, and other objects have been brought from unknown distances without human agency. I have often thought that a crucial experiment would be to convey some animal or plant, which has never been brought alive to England, to a meeting of scientific men capable of identifying it. If any invisible agency can place a living Ornithoptera from the Moluccas upon the council-room table of the Entomological Society, about seven p.m. on the first Wednesday in July or August, it will be a piece of evidence which no one can gainsay.

The Discussion.

The Chairman, in opening the discussion, said he thought there were several points calling for reply. For instance, when a chair was, without visible agency, raised from the ground, no Spiritualist ever supposed that energy had been created. In such a case it was generally held that spiritual beings had acted upon the chair by means of energy derived from the medium. A well-known characteristic of séances at which these phenomena occurred, was the gradual depletion of strength from the medium. He and many others had often seen Mr. Williams fall to the ground almost powerless and lifeless from this cause. As to the power used frequently exceeding the utmost strength of the sensitive, this might be explained if the force were stored, somewhat as electricity is capable of being collected. This theory was borne out by the fact that it was often necessary to sit for a considerable time before phenomena occurred. With regard to the nature of the energy, he thought that in the same way as food was taken in for the support of the material body, other elements not yet recognised were being imbibed and assimilated. These other elements, which might be described as psychical substances, went towards the building-up of the psychical body. When this was nearly perfected the material body commenced to decay, and was ultimately cast off as a useless shell. Psychical particles were being continually given off by the psychical body, in the same manner as the physical organisation gave off material particles. These emanations were probably the source of the force used. He claimed Spiritualists as supporters of the doctrine of the conservation of energy, and had never known it denied to explain the modus operandi of the psychical phenomena.

Mr. Shorter, who said that his only relation to physical science was in gratefully accepting the results which men of science had laboriously gathered together, thought all would appreciate the admirable tone and temper of the paper that had been read. It was a model of calm, careful, and unprejudiced statement. Nearly all Spiritualists would accept the premises laid down; indeed, the literature of the subject showed that they had been accepted and insisted upon quite as strenuously by Spiritualists as by men of science. All intelligent observers were aware of the necessity of guarding against delusions of the senses, preconceptions of the mind, and the possibility of fraud on the part of interested mediums. The same precautions were taken as men of science would themselves recommend, and although it might be possible for one individual observer to be deluded, yet it was scarcely probable that the same delusion would simultaneously take possession of a whole company of persons. There might be isolated cases of delusion, but as a whole the argument could hardly be said to apply to the general conclusions of Spiritualists. As regards deception, the fact that the phenomena occurred not only with professional mediums, but even more extensively in private home life, or through one's individual experience, was a sufficient answer. The history of the last thirty years and more abundantly proved this. He admitted that there was some difficulty, as compared with certain branches of science, in evolving the phenomena at will. But physical science could not always repeat its facts when and how it pleased, e.g., the movements of the heavenly bodies, and notably the transit of Venus, which would not occur again for a very long period. Just so with Spiritualism: its phenomena could only be presented under conditions which from experience had been found most favourable for their production. There would probably always be an element of uncertainty arising from the volition and action of beings outside ourselves whom we were not able to command. The same difficulty applied to all matters connected with humanity here. No one could fully anticipate the line of action of any number of human beings at a given time. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the theory entertained by Spiritualists was true, this uncertainty was just what would be expected. Were all the phenomena capable of being repeated as freely and frequently as the experiments of the chemist, the conviction would be forced upon us that the spiritual theory could not be true. He maintained that Spiritualism had primarily to be considered as a question of fact, and thought it only natural that the world should look to its men of science to clear up the obscurity which surrounded the phenomena of Spiritualism, which were both new and strange. At the same time he did not consider it necessary that the subject should be investigated solely by scientific experts. There had been a good deal of exaggeration in that respect. The phenomena in question were of a kind which could be carefully observed and recorded by any one of average intelligence and judgment. Surely any such man could tell whether a chair was or was not removed from the floor without visible agency, or judge if the movements and sounds were so regulated as to act as a code of signals for intelligent communication. At the same time Spiritualists could not but be grateful to the men of science who had devoted time and attention to the investigation of a subject so unpopular as Spiritualism, and who, having arrived at a positive opinion, had had the honesty and courage to avow the conclusions at which they had arrived. He was bound to say, however, that he had sometimes been struck with the singular paucity of knowledge, or lack of addition to our knowledge, which scientific men had been able to contribute to the subject. He could not call to mind any new facts that had been added to the knowledge of Spiritualism by experts. Mr. Cromwell Varley, after twelve years of investigation, came to the conclusion that the source of power was derived chiefly from the medium, but Spiritualists generally had arrived at that without any special scientific requirements. The most valuable service which science could render would be to impress upon Spiritualists the necessity of still more careful and correct observation. Spiritualists themselves were the authorities of the subject. It would be just as absurd to invite the opinion of the chemist and astronomer on spiritual phenomena as to ask the judgment of Spiritualists on delicate and intricate matters of chemistry and astronomy. Anyone who pursued scientific methods in the investigation of this subject was a man of science in relation to Spiritualism, and in such a case it was the province of experts in other branches of physics to come to us, and not of us to go to them. With regard to the friendly challenge, similar phenomena had often taken place in his experience. In conclusion, he would state that he thought it reasonable to assume that spirits were able to employ more potent energies than those with which we were acquainted. The most potent forces of nature were those which were most subtle and furthest removed from gross matter, and the more we pursued our investigations into matter the nearer we came to that wonderful domain of the invisible and the spiritual, which was probably the source of all life and energy.

Mr. Morse would have liked the attention of scientific men drawn to the simplest class of the phenomena. They should begin as Spiritualists had commenced. Let them decide—does a chair move? how does it move? what moves it? The solution of these questions would give them a solid basis of fact to build upon. (Mr. Morse spoke at some length on Mr. Slater's paper, but the exigencies of space compel us to defer the publication of an excellent speech to another occasion.)

After a few more words from Mrs. Hallock, the Chairman, and Mr. Shorter,

Mr. Slater briefly replied, stating that he had been much interested in a statement made during the evening to the effect that the temperature of a séance room was oftentimes materially lowered. It seemed possible that a part of the energy employed was obtained in that way. That would be a good subject of inquiry by some of our eminent physicists. The question of energy being drawn from the medium opened up further points of interest. Had a storing up of energy in the medium ever been registered by any of the instruments which existed for that purpose? If so, did the medium part with it to an unusual extent when manifestations, &c., took place? Such were a few of the questions which suggested themselves.

The meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the lecturer.

THE WORK OF THE C.A.S.

Last week we referred to the present time as being, apparently, the commencement of a new era of activity for public work in connection with Spiritualism; and we indicated several reasons for so thinking. This opinion, which we had formed after careful consideration of what, for the sake of conspicuity, may be called "the signs of the times," has been somewhat strengthened by recent correspondence approving of the measures now being taken by the Council of the C.A.S.

That the time is an auspicious one for such action all seem pretty well agreed. There is, indeed, very little doubt that opportunities of attending popular high-class lectures in connection with Spiritualism will be eagerly welcomed by a large section of the public. We say that only which we know to be an absolute fact, when we assert that in many quarters a very lively interest is either awakened or is being aroused with regard to psychological phenomena. The S.P.R. is doing excellent work in that direction, but it is by no means the only agency in operation. Only the other day we heard of a number of clergymen who had associated themselves together for the purposes of investigation. We are not at liberty to give publicity to details, but such is the fact. In another case a pamphlet addressed specially to inquirers, by a writer not altogether unknown to our readers, was advertised by him for a short time in the daily papers. The result was the distribution of some hundreds in this manner, the pamphlets almost entirely finding their way into new hands. In estimating the value of this fact as an indication of public interest, it must be remembered that the applications were voluntary on the part of the people who were sufficiently interested in the subject to be willing to pay the price of the pamphlet and to go to the trouble of writing for it in order to satisfy their curiosity. This, at least, tends to prove that the inquiry was, to a certain extent, bonâ fide in its character.

We allude to these circumstances only to shew that we have good grounds for what we say in regard to the renewal of public interest in Spiritualism. They may be of little account in themselves, but inasmuch as straws serve to point the direction in which a current of water is running, so these trivial details indicate the tendency of popular opinion.

There is also equally good reason for thinking that the revival is due in a large measure to the action taken last year by representative Spiritualists all over the country. The effect of the circular issued by the C.A.S. with reference to dark and cabinet sôances has produced the good result which we predicted would ensue. It has put intelligent and educated Spiritualists right with the public, and if the C.A.S. had done no other good work, the part it took in that matter would alone have been sufficient to commend it to the hearty support of the majority of Spiritualists.

Is there any reason why this sympathy and aid should not be extended to that Association? We know of none; but, on the contrary, several very weighty reasons occur to us why it should be given. The Association has worked intelligently and faithfully in the past; at critical periods, such, for instance, as the defence of Dr. Slade, it secured combined action which would not otherwise have been possible; it is an organisation in full working order, possessing almost unequalled capabilities and material for use, which only required judicious development to again become a source of lasting good and strength to the spiritual movement; and last, but not least, it is an association in which the principle of self-government is recognised, so that the spiritualist public has the power of controlling its own expenditure and directing its own affairs.

We are aware that many have left the C.A.S. and thrown in their lot with another society with which the former works on amicable terms. If these friends feel more at home in the one than in the other, well and good. We think, however, it should at least be remembered that the heat and burden of the day have been borne, and will still be borne, by the C.A.S., and that all interest in its welfare and proceedings need not necessarily cease on account of withdrawal from active membership.

There are others who, from various causes, have ceased their public association with Spiritualism. We have no wish to revive the memory of old grievances. Many of the causes, however, which once operated so adversely are now numbered with the things of the past, and we would ask in all sincerity whether or not there exists the possibility of renewed and united action.

Need we particularise more? Surely not. We violate no confidence in saying that the Council of the C.A.S. stands ready to execute the work of the hour, be it little or great, and to welcome, as it has ever welcomed, any true and earnest worker. The proposed series of lectures is only part of a larger scheme which has been favourably considered and adopted by the Council. The one thing needful now is the sympathetic approval and co-operation of its fellow Spiritualists. This assured, the Council will carry out the plan in its entirety.

Here we must stop for the present. Before we conclude, however, we would press home to the hearts of all who read this undoubted truth—that the individual, personal responsibility of every Spiritualist can only be measured by the benefit he or she has received from the knowledge of a future life as demonstrated by the facts of Spiritualism. Are there any who have received such benefit amongst the readers of "LIGHT"? Nous verrons.

GHOSTS OF BIRDS AND BEASTS.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In regard to the article in your last issue on "Ghosts of Birds and Beasts," I am curious to know whether the word "spirit" employed in connection with a greyhound, a lark, a bay pony, cats, a dog, and a canary, is used by inadvertence or with intention by the various recorders. Many thoughtful Spiritualists are fully prepared to admit that both non-human animals and plants have souls, or a "spiritual body," and also that the souls of individual animals or plants may, under exceptional conditions in regard to their relations with humanity—by the agency of affection, in fact—become more or less permanent after the dissolution of the physical body. But although one may be prepared for many vagaries of opinion on the part of certain sections amongst those of whom it may be said that "some inherit Spiritualism, some achieve a knowledge of its truths, and some have Spiritualism forced upon them," it seems difficult to suppose that the notion of beasts, birds, insects, and plants having spirits—immortal and progressive—can be seriously entertained by any amongst us. The idea of "little flowery, green paddocks, surrounded with hedges of blooming roses, &c.," in which cats, doubtless accompanied by their fleas (why not?), "gambol about or lie basking, &c., tended by shining children," may to some minds appear delightfully poetical; but most of us, I imagine, would hold that it belongs to the worst category of meretricious mediumistic manufacture. Is there a Heaven for infusorials? If not, where is the line to be drawn? Of course the word "spirit"—that through which we are in the likeness of our Maker—has a loose conversational signification, doing duty for "soul," "spiritual body," or "ghost;" and perhaps it was in this sense that the term was used by some of those who recorded the interesting phenomena described in the article I have referred to.—I am, &c.,

MESMERIC CLAIRVOYANCE.

CASE VII.

At the risk of wearying your readers I have still to present another case or two of preternatural perception induced by the mesmeric trance. It will be only by the weight of cumulative testimony from independent, trustworthy, and competent witnesses that so startling a phenomenon can be brought within the category of acknowledged truths. Hence the value of the present piece of evidence, which was given to my friend, Mr. F. W. H. Myers, by a gentleman of eminence in the literary world, but who does not wish his name published.

Dublin.

W. F. BARRETT.

The first time I attempted to mesmerise anyone I succeeded in a somewhat startling fashion. I went on making the passes for ten or fifteen minutes, not being aware that the mesmeric force in me was sufficient to send the person experimented upon to sleep in three or four strokes. It was hours before I succeeded in reversing the effect, and days before the effect entirely disappeared. My second experiment was upon a young lady who was at a small party at my house, in which she had never been before. Seeing how suddenly the passes took effect, I thought it possible that "clairvoyance," of which I had heard, but seen nothing, might be produced in this case. I found the young lady able to reply to my words, but not to those of any one else. I asked her if she could see the rooms above that in which we were. She said that one had the ordinary furniture of a dining-room in it, but that the sideboard was in a small ante-room. I asked her if she saw anything on the side-board. She said there was a statuette in the middle and a silver inkstand on one side of it. Was there nothing on the other side? No. This I thought was a mistake, as there was usually, and then, to the best of my knowledge, another inkstand of rosewood on the other side of the statuette. I went upstairs at once, and found that she was right. Up to the minute before the experiment began, there was no idea of making any such experiment, and it was at my own suggestion that it was made. The young lady had never been mesmerised before. Of course, the only point of interest in the case—if it was, as I could see no room for doubting, a bonâ fide one—is its being a contradiction of a common theory that the "clairvoyante" sees things as the images of them exist in the mind of the person mesmerising.

This was many years ago. I did not like to be handling what seemed so strange a power, and have never mesmerised again, except in one case, when I have been able to give many hours' healthy sleep at a time to a lady who for seven or eight years had never had more than an hour's sound sleep at once.

I ought to add that the "clairvoyante" young lady had never been upstairs, and had never, to the best of my belief, had any means of knowing the arrangement of the room from other persons.

CASE VIII.

The next case illustrates what so constantly occurs, thought-transference merging into something beyond the knowledge of any present. The remoteness of time when the events occurred, some may say, makes the case a weak one, but in conjunction with other stronger evidence that I have adduced, it is, I think, quite worth preserving.

W. F. BARRETT.

SIR,—In your letter published in the Times of the 22nd inst., you say that you should be glad to receive "trustworthy communications as to the direct action of one mind upon another, giving rise to the apparent transference of thought or feeling, such as occurs in cases of mesmeric trance." I therefore beg leave to enclose a statement of facts and circumstances within my own personal knowledge and experience bearing strongly on the case, which I think you will find very interesting; and, although I have not the honour of being known to you personally, I may without egotism say that you may rest assured that it is "trustworthy" and reliable.

I have not in any way exaggerated or mis-stated the facts, and shall be glad if my communication will elucidate the subject.—I have the honour to be, yours faithfully,

M. A. M.

Thorpe-Morieux Rectory, September 26th, 1876.

About thirty years since, when I was living with my father in Kent, I attended lectures on Mesmerism, or animal magnetism, given by a medical friend. I was much interested and impressed by them, and closely watched his actions. The next day I felt a desire to try if I had the power to mesmerise another person. My nephew, who was about 17, rather delicate in health, was there on a visit to my father, and I tried the experiment in my own sitting-room, no one else being present. I was surprised to see how easily he yielded to my "passes," and fell into a state of "coma," and seemed in that state to obey even my thoughts. For instance, in my mind I asked him (without speaking) to kiss the dog then lying on the hearthrug, which he did immediately, saying "Oh, yes, aunt!" He then asked me to bandage his eyes, as "he could see best out of the left side of his head," above the ear. In my mind I then asked him what it was o'clock. He said, "Ten minutes after two by the kitchen clock." I found it wanted ten minutes to two o'clock, and I observed on several occasions that he saw the reverse side of an object, such as a coin, and not the side presented to him. I was obliged on this first occasion to send for my medical friend to get my nephew out of the state of coma into which I had thrown him.

My next experiment was to take him on a mental journey, sitting in the same room. In my mind I said, "Willie, shall we take a walk?" He quickly replied, "Oh, yes, aunt, I am ready; I will get my cap." His eyes were bound, and in answer to my thoughts he said, "I will shut the front door." I then mentally took him for a walk—about a mile—and as my thoughts passed by various objects, he noticed and made remarks on them. For instance, in passing the churchyard where my mother was interred, he said, "Oh, auntie, let us go and see poor grandmamma's grave"; and he expressed the thought in my mind, "Poor grandmamma!" whilst standing by the side. On another occasion, when in the room, I asked him if he could see anything particular in my friend's laboratory. He said, "I see several things under glass cases covered with green baize," which I knew was correct, although he had not seen or heard of them. They were things connected with galvanic experiments. One, he said, looked like moss at the bottom of the glass, another like mineral, and a third like insects crawling about.

On his return to his father (my brother), who lived twelve miles distant, he, my nephew, asked his father to mesmerise him. My brother replied, "My boy, I know nothing about it; I cannot do it." He said, "Oh, yes, papa, only look steadily into my eyes, as aunt does; I shall soon be off." My brother did so, and my nephew immediately fell into a state of coma, and whilst in it a question was asked, "What is your aunt doing?" He said, "She is looking in the Encyclopedia at the pictures of ferns, and at some of her own paintings of ferns, beside grandpapa." Next day came a letter from my brother asking if that was true. I replied it was.

My nephew is dead, but my brother, who is an incumbent of a parish in Kent, is still alive, and remembers the circumstance.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In your last impression there is a misprint in connection with your remarks on my paper on clairvoyance.

The term clairvoyance signifies clear seeing, but that might signify clear mental, logical, or physical vision.

The term therefore conveys no idea as to what is generally understood by clairvoyance.

By that term is meant the power of the mind to see, independently of the physical organs of vision.

I therefore designate clairvoyance as the Auto-Noetic—that is, independent or self-knowing action of the mind.

LECTURES ON PSYCHOLOGICAL SCIENCE.

We are glad to hear that the arrangements for the proposed lectures, a few details of which appear below, are progressing favourably. The Committee hope next week to be in a position to give fuller particulars. In the meantime, however, we have been asked to acknowledge the undermentioned sums, which have been forwarded for the Special Lecture Fund. We sincerely hope that Spiritualists as a body will now come forward and rally round the C. A. S., remembering that "he who gives quickly gives twice." If each one were to put his or her shoulder to the wheel, and do as much as lay in his power, a great success would be assured at once.

The following circular has been issued:—

THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS,
38, Great Russell-street, London, W.C.
Easter, 1883.

DEAR FRIEND,—By subjoined circular you will observe that the Council of this Association are desirous of again engaging in work which has ever proved most useful. They believe that the time is ripe for action, while no period could be more fitting for the inauguration of such an undertaking than this Eastertide, the time of all others in the whole year when we are most forcibly reminded of the bringing of immortality (continued life after death) to light and life.

I am desired on behalf of the Council to appeal to you most earnestly to sustain their hands in this the first effort of the kind which has been possible for some years, and to express a hope that you will not only assist them by giving liberally and generously towards the Special Lecture Fund, but that you will also sustain them by your kindly sympathy and personal presence.—Yours truly,

T. BLYTON, Hon. Sec.

Lectures on Psychological Science.

The Council of the Central Association of Spiritualists desire, in order to meet an evident demand on the part of the public for information as regards Psychological Phenomena, to arrange a series of six lectures during April, May, and June next, which, if successful, will be followed by others. The Langham Hall, in Great Portland-street, can be secured, and it is proposed to hold the series on alternate Tuesday evenings, at eight o'clock. It will be their endeavour to make them thoroughly high-class in character, and at the same time to present the subject in a popular and acceptable manner. For this purpose the Council are seeking the aid of the best talent in our ranks. It is hoped that Dr. G. Wyld will lecture, and Mr. T. P. Barkas has already consented to do so, whilst arrangements are pending in other quarters, full particulars of which will be duly announced. The subjects already fixed are:—

"Clairvoyance; or, the Auto-Noetic Action of Mind as a demonstration of the Existence of the Soul," by Dr. Wyld.

"Personal Experiences in Psychology," by T. P. Barkas, F.G.S.

Admission will be free to the general public, but to meet the necessary expense of hire of hall, fees, travelling, advertising, and other charges, the Council appeal to the liberality of Spiritualists and those interested in the dissemination of a knowledge of the phenomena to contribute to a Special Lecture Fund for this purpose. All donations will be acknowledged in "LIGHT," and a balance-sheet published in due course.

A few seats will be reserved, the cost of which for the course of six lectures will be ONE GUINEA. The tickets will be transferable, and it is hoped that friends in the Metropolis will, therefore, more readily subscribe for them as, if unable always to make personal use of the tickets, they may lend them to others interested in the subject.

It is hoped that the above will commend itself to Spiritualists, and that they will feel disposed to sustain the Council in their proposed work by personal aid and sympathy.

Communications and applications for tickets to be addressed to Mr. Thos. Blyton, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

JOHN WESLEY ON SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA.—Speaking of a disposition of men of learning to give up all accounts of apparitions as mere "old wives' fables," he says: "I am sorry for it; and I willingly take this opportunity of entering my solemn protest against this violent compliment which so many that believe the Bible pay to those who do not believe it; their outcry against the appearing of spirits is 'in direct opposition not only to the Bible, but to the suffrage of the wisest and best of men in all ages and nations. They well know, whether Christians or not, that if but one account of the intercourse of men with separate spirits be admitted, their whole castle in the air (Deism, Atheism, Materialism) falls to the ground. I know no reason, therefore, why we should suffer even this weapon to be wrested out of our hands.'"

PREMONITIONS OF DEATH.

Mrs. T. is a lady residing in the South of England. Some twenty years ago she had a brother, Captain William S., who for some years had been residing in Jamaica. The brother and sister were passionately attached to each other. One afternoon (the day before the West India mail was due), Mrs. T. felt very unwell and went to bed. While, however, still wide awake, she heard a voice exclaim, "Harriet, Harriet, my poor sister Harriet!" Very much alarmed, she called her husband, who was down stairs, told him what had happened, and said, "I know there is something the matter with William." Her husband laughed at her fears. In the night, however, she had a most vivid dream, in which she saw her brother lying dead and being dissected, and near his heart was a small stone which seemed to speak to her, saying, "Harriet, Harriet, my poor sister Harriet!" Mrs. T. then awoke, and rousing her husband told him her dream, and again said how convinced she was that all was not well in Jamaica. He was very cross at the interruption, but in the morning noted down the day and hour of these peculiar incidents. The next West India mail, some little time after, still more astonished them, for it brought the news that on the very day of the dream Captain S. had died, and in his last moments had thought of no one but his sister, and his dying words had been—"Harriet, Harriet, my poor sister Harriet!" While in a great heat he had drunk some cold water and in it had swallowed a small stone, which, lodging in his intestines, had caused his death. I may add that Mrs. T. is a most practical matter of fact person, without the least trace of imagination in her.

I have copied the above verbatim from my cousin's account, who knows the seeress and her family well, and who most kindly procured it for me from the lips of the clairvoyante herself.

"THE TOUCH OF A VANISHED HAND."

Only those who read between the lines of contemporary life and thought can realise how completely the old time views on matters pertaining to the future life have disappeared. To such, however, it is apparent that Spiritualism has been working silently but surely in directions that few dreamed of, until lo! at every turn we are astonished to meet it in different guises and in most unexpected places. So universal is its influence that we can only explain the circumstance by supposing that when failure and obloquy have seemingly been heaviest upon us spiritual truth has slowly been working its way, the little leaven leavening the whole lump, until art, general literature, poetry, and the drama are permeated with its influence. The most popular plays, sermons, works, and songs of the day are full of it. As an example of this, we may instance D'Arcy Jaxone's new and popular song, "The Touch of a Vanished Hand," set to music by Pinsuti. The following are the words:—(the music is published by J. B. Cramer and Co., 201, Regent-street, London, W.)

I.

When the bells that call'd my love to rest were ringing the vesper chime,
I wished their music could bear my soul away from the things of time;
And my spirit was heavy-laden as I breath'd an old, old prayer,
For the cross of care that I carried was greater than I could bear.
As I wept alone in my sorrow, the gleam of the dying day
Thro' the open lattice softly kissed the harp that she used to play,
And sweet as an echo from heaven, I heard its music once more,
And the burden of life was uplifted, and the pain of parting was o'er.

II.

Was it the breath of an angel's wing that passed o'er the golden wires?
Was it the sound of a long-lost voice that fell from the angel choirs?
Was it the touch of an spirit hand that swept o'er each silent string,
And hush'd the sorrows of earth to rest with words that the angels sing?
I heard the sound of an old, old song once more in the mystic strain,
A song we sang in the bygone years, and shall some day sing again;
For it told me I should meet my love at the portals of the skies,
To sing once more as we used to sing, in the land of Paradise.

NEURIC FORCE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Under the above heading one of your correspondents, Dr. Dixon, alluded a short time ago to various apparatus which demonstrate, without the aid of a human sensitive, the existence of a force variously denominated animal, vital, or organic magnetism, mesmerism, and most recently Neuric (or Nerve) Force. He informed your readers that a knife, habitually carried in a strong mesmeriser's pocket, had magnetic properties, and that he had seen the magnetic needle deflected by my pointing at it. Dr. Dixon has just shown me a note from a gentleman, dating from Ilkeston, who writes that he also finds his key and pocket-knife magnetic, and that the magnetic needle is deflected at his pointing at it, provided that his fingers are in contact with the glass of the compass, and, as I understand, that he has kept for a while the compass in his hand.

Perhaps others may find themselves endowed with the same quality. If they are numerous, the scientific may be induced to turn attention to it. Mr. W. H. Harrison told the readers of the Spiritualist newspaper a few years ago,—and in this I think he was backed by the eminently scientific Mr. C. Varley,—that there was no evidence to shew that there was any relation between mineral magnetism and mesmerism. Scientific men would surely examine into facts bearing upon the question if such facts could be numerously quoted.

About two years ago I was giving instruction to a gentleman in mesmerism, and to illustrate the meaning of the word polarity I had placed a compass on the table before us. I pointed at it and remarked with animation upon the fact of the needle always pointing in the direction of the magnetic pole; and as I pointed, to our surprise the needle oscillated and pointed to my hand. I made passes over it at about the distance of a foot, the point of the needle always turning to my hand. My nerve force,—Mesmer's fluide magnetique,—must have been in a certain condition as to quantity, quality, or tension, at the time, for it to have obtained this reaction from the magnetic needle. I find I cannot obtain it constantly.

"M. A." (Oxon.) has just informed the readers of "LIGHT" that a lady in London and Dr. Bell, nearly a century ago, demonstrated this reaction of the compass needle. He reminds us also of Dr. Slade's obtaining it.

That there is a relation between human beings and the magnetism of the earth is shewn by the fact,—pointed out by Reichenbach,—that sick sensitives sleep best with the head in the direction of the magnetic pole. I knew an officer who, in his ordinary health, could not sleep unless his head was in that direction.

About twenty-two years ago there was exhibited in London the "Magnetic Girl," who had the power of tilting a tailor's iron, weighing twenty pounds, by placing the little-finger-side of her hand upon the back part of its handle, and making (if any) a pressure quite inadequate to raising the fore part of the iron—called a tailor's goose. The father was a working tailor, and said that he had discovered the power in his child as she played on his working board. With her hand thus resting sideways upon its handle, the iron accompanied by tilts even quick music, the girl shewing little or no fatigue after a prolonged exhibition. Some averred that the iron at times lost contact with the table. One Spiritualist, a frequenter of the exhibition (Mr. Tiffin), believed that it was through a kind of mediumship, and shewed his faith in the supposed spiritual agent by placing his watch under the iron while it was working, with the request to "take care," and the movements to the music were as rapid as ever, and continued some minutes, the watch not being touched. If my recollection is right, she used to play sometimes with an iron to each hand.

That there was not merely pressure of the hand upon the upper surface of the handle of the iron, but attraction between them, was manifest to all watchers of the phenomena, and the Magnetic Girl drew much attention.

Just when it was hoped that a known scientific gentleman would make inquiry into the subject, it unfortunately received the notice of one of the superficial facetious writers of Dickens' weekly miscellany, who knew nothing of magnetism and evidently wanted to know no more. The "Magnetic Girl" was being exhibited at a watering place where he was staying. Nothing better could be for him to make capital for a long diverting paper; it amused him and paid for his holiday. At that time everybody read and repeated Dickens. Visitors to the little exhibition ceased coming; the scientific said Dickens had explained it; and so her friends withdrew her into private life, the truth untouched, and without the loss of her faculty, which she may still have; she had it, I know, a few years ago, when I saw that she had blossomed into a comely matron.

Neuric force has other qualities awaiting the study of the scientific. Some quality of it may be peculiar to each individual, perceptible, as an emanation, to sensitives and definable by clairvoyants. During one of my lecturing tours years ago I was introduced to a Dr. Picard; he took me into his garden and demonstrated to me the power of his emanation upon plants; he could mesmerise some to quicker life and others to drooping and death.

Emanations in magnetisers vary in quality and quantity, each according to his interior condition and, perhaps, also exterior circumstances; for example, his quality of developing or imparting tone to a subject may depend upon the more or less ferruginous quality of the magnetiser's blood. Perhaps it is when this is at its maximum in him that his force can excite reaction in the magnetic needle.

SUCCESSFUL SEANCES WITH MISS WOOD.

We have again had the pleasure of obtaining phenomena under satisfactory conditions through the mediumship of Miss Wood since my report in the issue of "LIGHT," March 17th. As at previous sittings, we took every possible care that the medium should be so placed that we could not possibly be deceived by trickery on her part, if she were so disposed.

As in the previous sittings, we had three curtains stretched across the corner of a large dining-room, in front of which, and facing the curtains, we seated Miss Wood at a distance of thirty inches therefrom. The light, which was direct behind her, was mellowed down to a dusky greyness by the aid of a light brown paper cover placed over the globe. The light was so good as to enable us to sufficiently distinguish each other and to quite clearly see the medium, who was covered with a white jacket, and had thrown over her head a white antimacassar. Whatever motion she made was easily discernible by those sitting round her, the furthest sitter from the medium's chair being within six feet.

The results of this séance, held on the evening of March 20th, were to all present, every one carefully and critically observing every detail thereof, conclusively the product of a power entirely separated from the medium as far as human sense and human judgment could discern. After conversing, singing, and chatting with "Pocha" for about one hour and a quarter, a large white ball protruded itself from the left aperture of the cabinet, and about four feet from the floor, and about three feet from the medium's right. After remaining in that position for a few minutes a stream of white substance proceeded from the base of the cabinet, and directly underneath the form we have spoken of, and stretched itself along the floor towards the chair whereon Miss Wood was seated. Presently a thick volume of white matter proceeded from just beneath the large white ball we first mentioned and reached forward towards the floor and the medium in an arched form. It appeared to make some strong efforts to move bodily forward from the curtains but could not succeed. The general impression was that a large form was endeavouring to move forward into full view. After moving backward and forward for some time the head of the form was withdrawn from view and was quickly followed by the remaining portions. "Pocha" afterwards informed us that it was the form of Mr. Norris, sometime member of the Newcastle Society; that he had got a head, arm, and some of the lower garments made, but could not further succeed on that occasion. At the conclusion of the séance all the sitters expressed themselves fully satisfied of the genuineness of what they saw. One thing particularly noticeable by all present was that while the manifestations were at their height Miss Wood lay back on the chair perfectly motionless. We found the chair on examination had not been removed in the slightest from where we placed it at the commencement.

On Friday, the 23rd, we held our twelfth séance, the arrangements being the same in all particulars as that of the 20th. After we had been seated for about three quarters of an hour a chair which we had placed at the right of the cabinet was visibly dragged behind the curtains, and a small bell, which had been placed upon it, loudly rung from within, thrown out at the left, drawn back again, and in the space of a few minutes thrown from the curtains, gently grazing the top of my head as it flew to the further side of the room. The large steel fender fronting the fireplace was then dragged from its place and with some of the fire-irons, taken into the cabinet. After this the light which hung over the heads of the sitters was visibly turned down, and upon our complaining was again turned up to a considerable extent; and the medium under control was removed back until her chair touched the knees of the sitters in the centre of the circle, at a distance of about eight feet from the cabinet. After this a few slight manifestations took place and the séance, which was a powerful manifestation of physical phenomena, came to an end.

We have yet two more sances to hold with Miss Wood prior to her proceeding to London, where we trust she will have equally as successful sances as she has had in Newcastle. Should our remaining sances be successful, I shall duly and carefully report them.

I may state that one gentleman who has sat with us, and who had never sat in a séance before we commenced this course with Miss Wood, and who is sceptical upon all matters of this nature, acknowledged that though unconvinced as to the cause of the phenomena, yet he was thoroughly mystified, as the manifestations had no parallel in his experience.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL, 14, NEWMAN STREET, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

The subject of the lecture on Sunday last was "The Divine Revelation." It will surprise no one who is in any degree acquainted with the precision of thought, accuracy of insight, and comprehensive range of practical knowledge, of the controls of Mr. Morse, to learn that, in their judgment, the Divine revelation is neither limited to one book, restricted to one method, nor the exceptional heritage of one people. There is usually something iconoclastic in the introductory remarks of these controls, and yet their genius is essentially constructive: there is a process of weeding out and breaking up of the soil, that the life-giving air may have unimpeded access to every particle of productive earth; but the ground is not allowed to remain bare or fallow, nor can there be any doubt about the promise of luxuriance and beauty for the seed which is always promptly sown under such promising conditions. If, again, we approach the philosophy of the subject upon the lines laid down by our lecturer, it is further desirable to disembarass our conceptions of the idea of the necessity of any form of special intervention, or revelation, detached from the essential nature of ourselves and of our surroundings, as either incumbent upon Deity to disclose His will and purpose, or as required by man for the guidance of his life. In the earlier stages of the career of Humanity everywhere, there has always existed a craving for Divine revelation because of the difficulty of interpreting the external aspects of things so as to reach their inner meanings, and when this craving has been satisfied by some form of exceptional enlightenment, that which in its essence was simply the outcome of imperfectly understood natural conditions has, because so rarely manifested, been regarded as a Divine intervention. We must not confound the results of human endeavour with the expression of Divine interest, nor esteem whatever reaches us from supramundane sources as necessarily Divine. Every advance of thought and disclosure of principles is in the nature of a revelation, and every revelation should be directed to the instruction, advancement, and happiness of those who receive it, should be in harmony with its source, and characteristically indicative of the agency for its production. Especially must revelation by Divine beings be so qualified, to contain within itself its own justification, and in greater or less degree its own history. Modern thought says that while the earth was, at the beginning, without form and void, it was charged with the potentialities of every subsequent unfoldment, and the evolution of the conditions of that unfoldment constitutes the first evidence presented to Humanity of the Divine revelation—an external manifestation, that is to say, of Divine quality within. The revelation of God through nature is the revelation of power and inflexible purpose, and through Humanity that of intelligence needful for the consummation of freedom in thought and being, the mind of man being wedded to the purposes of the Divine. As the potentialities of physical nature eventuate in actualities and manifest a revelation, so, in the nature of man, are there the germs of similar developments whose unfoldment constitutes a further revelation. Progress is proportionate to knowledge of natural laws, and the time shall come when by a righteous understanding of the conditions of life, in ourselves and in the world, we shall discover that happiness is within the reach of our own resources. When we would judge of the real origin of any revelation, we must consider whether it reflects or impeaches the dignity and character of the Divine elements. We are too apt to indulge partial and limited views of the incidents and risks of life. If we would judge fairly of the merits of a painting, for example, we must be careful to place it in a good light, and ourselves at a favourable distance in a given direction; so must we regard the problems of life from the standpoint of the certainty of immortality, for that alone will dissipate the lines and shadows, and exhibit the wisdom of seeking happiness in general harmonies, remembering always that the hurt, the hunger, and the sorrow, which we deprecate, and at which we murmur, are as much the result of antecedent conditions—as much a revelation of the consequences of those conditions, as of others are health, happiness, and peace. Everything is well, and will be better; so will the Divine revelation run. No act of ours can put us outside of Being, and all that we do or can do, mentally, morally, and spiritually, is ours for ever, misuse of knowledge or revelation bringing its own sting, and failures their own punishment, as certainly as virtues develop their own rewards. To see the truth of these considerations is to receive a Divine revelation, for the capacity to appreciate which, and even to give it form as such, we must look to ourselves, for "God is indeed made manifest in the flesh" of Humanity. God's work is ever forward and onward, and ultimately finds indubitable expression or revelation in Humanity itself—in Humanity as a whole as distinct from any class or race whatsoever. As the Divine revelation is, in truth, the unfoldment of the purposes of the central fact of being, first in nature generally, then in Humanity, and finally as these blend and are materially affected, so a reverent and persevering study of nature, of Humanity, and of the immortal worlds beyond, is the only way adequately to interpret Divine revelation. In this manner light reaches us upon all the problems of nature and of God—the final authorities for human well-being and progress. Sin and sorrow are expelled by truth, human life becomes Divine, the God of all moving within us all, in assertion of a common Fatherhood, and in encouragement of universal brotherhood, aiding us, as out of our own growth, to use, and more and more to realise the nature and potency of the Divine revelation.

On Sunday next, April 1st, the first series of lectures, under the auspices of the Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum, will be concluded by the delivery of an address by Mr. Morse, entitled "Day Cometh." On the following Sunday, April 8th, a second series will be inaugurated. The opportunity will be taken for coming to close quarters with the students of spiritual phenomena, by devoting the evening to "Question and Answer," with the view of testing, in some degree, the reality and power of trance-speaking. All interested are invited to bring to the hall, on that date, one or more questions in writing, signed and under cover: to see them opened in the presence of the audience and in the absence of Mr. Morse: then to hear them submitted to, and answered by, his controls. The questions must be of general interest, and the right is reserved to the president to reject any which may be offensively worded.—S.B.

QUEBEC HALL.

Philosophy as well as rational theology is spread before the guests on Sunday evenings at this hall. Mr. MacDonnell addressed his audience on the "Resurrection," as not an impossible fact in the light which modern Spiritualism affords. The remarkable cases of levitation so well known are really more wonderful, we were told, than the re-animation of Christ, and his transport out of sight, especially when surrounded by such a circle as witnessed his final ascent. At the conclusion a stranger raised doubt of the authenticity and reliability of the Gospels, which drew out the replies of some old Spiritualists present, and caused great interest. We were glad to see the room so well attended. A most harmonious, friendly feeling glows on this little battle ground.—COK.

GLASGOW.

For a number of years the meetings of the Glasgow Association of Spiritualists have been held in a veritable upper-room in Trongate, Glasgow, which, however suitable when once admission had been gained, presented many drawbacks in the shape of an unpleasant entry, and in being situated up four long flights of stairs. Several efforts of late years have been made to procure more suitable premises, which have at last resulted in the Association securing a most central and commodious hall, situated at 2, Carlton-place, So-Side. The situation is most happily chosen, being central, and at the same time in one of the quietest parts of the City. The hall will seat comfortably 180 persons, while a smaller hall on the first flat will be used for week night meetings. Arrangements are already in progress to have it artistically decorated, Mr. Ernest G. Barker giving this matter special attention. The opening services, at which Mr. E. W. Wallis, of Nottingham, will be present, are arranged to take place on Sunday, 8th April. Mr. Wallis will also speak the following Sunday. A service will also be held on Friday evening, 13th April, at which Mr. Wallis will take the chair. The Association anticipate that the new and comfortable meeting place will be the means of drawing out some of the old workers in the cause, and so cementing and strengthening the movement. Of late the meetings have been of the most successful kind, large and attentive audiences being present each Sunday. The addresses have been well sustained by a number of the members, Mr. Jas. McDowall, Mr. Gavin Findlay, and Mr. J. Griffin, while Mr. David Duguid has on two occasions given from his stores of experience. Mr. Robert Harper, of Birmingham, has also put in an appearance, and been appreciated to the full. Mr. Hay Nisbet, one of the oldest workers in the movement, will speak in the new hall, on April 22nd, and several other old friends have agreed to follow suit. An American organ of fine quality has been purchased to assist the harmony. Mr. Barker kindly presiding at the instrument. The Association, in entering upon their new meeting place, cannot but tender to Mr. James Bowman their best thanks for his many and varied acts of kindness, more particularly for his so many years' granting them the use of a meeting place at a merely nominal rental.—T. ROBERTSON, Hon. Sec.

LIVERPOOL.

Last Thursday evening the Rev. E. H. Sugden delivered a lecture in the Bootle Town Hall, on "The Scientific Explanation of Thought-reading," illustrated by experiments, the chair being occupied by ex-Mayor Paulson. A large audience paid close attention to the lecture and the experiments which followed. The rev. gentleman ignored the theory that the results obtained by Mr. Bishop, Mr. Cumberland, or himself were due to guesswork, assisted by occasional collusion. Neither did he admit that magnetism or so-called Spiritualism had anything to do with their production. Personally he did not experience the trance-like condition of mind, nor was any vision of place or object created in his mind, as Mr. Bishop had said was the case in making his experiments. Mr. Sugden's explanation was that the results were obtained by muscular action under the influence of strong mental tension. A gentleman in the hall was asked to select some article on the dress of any person in the room, and then to select another person in the hall to whom the article should be given. Mr. Sugden, who had been blind-folded outside, walked almost without hesitation to a gentleman who wore a scarf-ring, and this being the article selected, it was at once taken to the person who had been selected to receive it. After two failures to state the numbers of a bank-note, the third trial proved successful. The lecturer was once out of twice successful in naming the locality of an imagined pain, and various other experiments having been gone through with considerable success, the meeting ended well pleased with the lecture and experiments. Of course, intelligent students of spiritual phenomena are acquainted with the modus operandi of such so-called thought-reading, but the fact is patent that Mrs. Grundy will not look at anything labelled spiritual, but becomes quite enthusiastic when the simplest forms of the phenomena are dished up under cover of another name. So far, then, good is being done by those who are introducing the public, even if inadvertently, to the first steps towards a clearer knowledge of life and its issues. Last Sunday the Rev. L. H. Skewes delivered a sermon in Holy Trinity Church, subject, "Spiritualists deny the Resurrection of Christ, and of everyone else." To this sermon Mrs. Britten is expected to reply next Sunday, April 1st, at Rodney Hall. Last Sunday, Mrs. Wallis, of Nottingham, occupied the platform at Rodney Hall very efficiently. The subject of the morning address was "The Word of God and how to read it," which was dealt with by the lecturer in a comprehensive yet simple manner which evidently brought the audience into close sympathy with the speaker. At the close of the evening lecture a gentleman who was present told the writer that he was an atheist, and that this was the first time he was present at a gathering of this kind; that he was highly interested; and that he would take the first opportunity which presented itself to learn if what Spiritualists claimed to be facts in nature were really true. With earnest wishes for the success of "LIGHT," and that its many able contributions may be fully appreciated.—C. F.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—Mr. Greives, President of the Ashington Society, lectured to the friends at Weir's Court, on Sunday evening last. He shewed how the Spiritualism of to-day was but a repetition of the Spiritualism of Primitive Christianity, so far as its facts and phenomena were concerned. The lecturer illustrated his position with divers parallel examples as proofs of his position, and produced in the minds of his hearers a considerable amount of conviction relative thereto. Mr. Kersey occupied the chair, and after the address, made a few interesting and well considered suggestions.

MICHAEL CHAMBERS.—There is a writer in a northern contemporary of spiritualistic pretensions, who for some time has troubled himself as to my identity, and after many vain inquiries and guesses, has stumbled once again upon a person towards whom he seems to hold considerable animosity. I should advise him for his future good and peace of mind to leave his inventions against that person unsaid, or Spiritualism may suffer thereby. Concerning Michael Chambers and the writer's attempted justification of that so-called medium, I may state that I have sat with him at some of his sances, only to be thoroughly disgusted, as every reliable witness is and has been that I have come across. I have made inquiries within this last week at Heworth, Felling, Windy Nook, Newcastle, Gateshead, and North Shields, and the universal testimony is to the same effect. I think my timely exposure, so quickly and amply confirmed a week afterwards by the Blackburn and North Shields friends, combined with the fact of the screw cutting at Newcastle, and of his taking part about the same time on a conjurer's platform, exposing Spiritualism, is an ample justification of my placing him in his true light, so that fraud may be put from our midst.

GATESHEAD.—On Sunday night last Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Grey, and Mr. Stephenson gave short and effective addresses upon "Death," "Spirit," and "Orthodoxy." Mr. Burton occupied the chair and furnished the meeting with a few appropriate remarks. Tea-meeting.—On the Monday, at 5 p.m., the annual tea-gathering of the Gateshead Society was held at their rooms. The friends partook of a substantial repast which had been prepared by various ladies belonging to the place, and we are glad to say that their untiring zeal in that direction was amply rewarded by a large attendance of Newcastle, West Pelton, Felling and other friends. At 7 p.m. Mr. Burton, President of the Society, took the chair, and made a pleasant opening address upon the progress of the Society, and the upward tendency of the movement in the North. Mr. R. Thompson, who presided at the piano, gave a pianoforte solo, "Phases of Penzance Lancers;" Miss Coxon gave "The Better Land" and "The Miller and the Maid;" Mr. R. W. Thomson gave "When other lips" and "Tempest of the Heart;" Mr. R. W. Thompson and Miss Sephard gave a duet, "Home to our Mountains;" Miss Shepard sang "Good-night, farewell" and "White Blossoms;" Mr. Shepard a comic song, "No place like home;" Mr. Taylor, Mr. Bell, and Mr. Punkney each gave comic songs; Mr. Thompson, of the Newcastle Society, recited "Tell's Speech," and Mr. Barron, of Gateshead, "Billy's Rose" and the "Tight Brigade;" and Mr. Bristol gave a violin solo. Mr. Kersey, President of the Newcastle Society, proposed, and Mr. Stephenson seconded, a vote of thanks to the ladies for the provision of the tea, and the ladies and gentlemen who assisted at the concert. This was carried with acclamation, and Mr. Martin responded for the ladies who provided the tea, and Mr. Thompson for the ladies and gentlemen who assisted at the concert.

NORTH SHIELDS.—On Sunday evening last Mr. Campbell, of Sunderland, occupied the platform and interested the members with an able discourse upon "The Spiritual in Music." At the commencement of the meeting Mr. Crawford (chairman) alluded to a case of a widow whose son, who, unknown to her, had been killed some short time before, appeared to her at the window one morning as she drew up the blind. She was much startled and endeavoured to shake from her mind what she considered an illusion as she believed that he was well and at work. About two hours afterwards a friend came to tell her the sad news of her poor Willie's death, which had occurred the afternoon before.

CONSETT.—Last Sunday Mr. Barker, the well-known North country test medium, held a meeting at the above place and gave several most satisfactory tests to several of those present.

NORTHUMBRIA.

THE GLAMIS CASTLE GHOST.—What is the true version of the oft-repeated and everlastingly-discussed story of the Glamis Castle Ghost? One winter night, nigh 400 years ago, when the snow lay thick and deep around the old Forfarshire Castle, a terrible crime was committed within its walls. The Earl of Crawford, familiarly and historically known as "Tiger Crawford," had been for some time a guest of the Lord Strathmore of that day, and there had been a great bout of gambling, in which the Lord of Glamis had gone on losing deeper and deeper from day to day, until at last he was driven by the madness of despair to stake even Glamis Castle itself, with the fair domain adjoining. Again fate or fortune went against him, and that night Lord Crawford became the winner of this splendid prize. Then it was that Lord Strathmore, finding some frivolous pretext of quarrel, fell on his guest with sword and dagger, and cruelly took his life. Thinking to destroy every possible trace of his crime, and the gambling loss which led to it, he had the room and its contents, just as they were, dead body and all, blocked up by solid masonry. Not even a trace of the doorway was left, and the secret of the room's situation, as well as of its terrible contents, has been ever since sedulously guarded, and the knowledge of it restricted to the Lord Strathmore actually in possession, together with the estate agent, or factor as he is called in Scotland, for the time being. No doubt from time to time curious people have sought by divers devices to unearth this veritable skeleton in the family cupboard, and the stories as to guests hanging towels out of their windows, in the absence of their host, so as to discover the locality of the room; and also to a mason working at the castle having "struck ile" by coming on the room, and of his being immediately sent beyond the sea by the reigning laird, and such like anecdotes, have arisen in this way. But there is little doubt that the account here given is the genuine and true version of the mystery, and the time has now come, I think, when Lord Strathmore himself should openly come forward, and so end once for all the frivolous tittle-tattle about pig-faced imbeciles shut up and still living after all this waste of years.—St. Stephen's Review.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

(With which is incorporated the British National Association of Spiritualists. Established 1873.)

38 GREAT RUSSELL ST., BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.
(Entrance in WOBURN STREET.)

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed for the purpose of uniting Spiritualists of every variety of opinion in an organised body, with a view of promoting the investigation of the facts of Spiritualism, and of aiding students and enquirers in their researches by providing them with the best means of investigation.

The Association is governed by a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Council of thirty Members elected annually.

The Reference and Reading Libraries contain a large collection of the best works on Spiritualism and occult subjects. Spiritualist and other newspapers and periodicals from all parts of the world are regularly supplied for the Reading Room, to which Members have access daily.

The Secretary, or his representative, is in attendance to receive visitors, and answer enquiries; on Saturdays, from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.; on other days from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. On Sundays the Rooms are closed.

Spiritualists and others visiting the Metropolitan are cordially invited to visit the Association and inspect the various objects of interest on view in the Reading Room and Library. Information is cheerfully afforded to enquirers on all questions affecting Spiritualism.

Members' Free Schools are held on Wednesday evenings, at 8 o'clock prompt subject to certain regulations, which can be ascertained on application.

Discussion Meetings are held fortnightly during the winter months. Admission free to Members and Subscribers, who can introduce one or more friends to each meeting. Programmes can be obtained on application during the winter season.

Soirées, at which all friends are welcome, are held at intervals during the season. An admission fee is charged, including refreshments.

Per annum.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Mr. J. W. Slater's study of Spiritualism, from a scientific point of view, is one to which it is impossible to take exception on the ground of unfairness. It is an admirably candid and clear statement of the attitude towards Spiritualism of such scientific men as direct their minds honestly towards the subject. Mr. Slater by no means postulates honesty as the badge of all his race. He frankly admits, what indeed is sufficiently apparent, that bigotry, intolerance, prejudice, and even a fraudulent squaring of experimental results with preconceived theories are not unknown among the priests of modern science. But, excepting such as are unworthy of notice by reason of their unfairness, and omitting those who have given their adhesion to the spiritualist belief, Mr. Slater states fairly the attitude of the average scientist towards Spiritualism. These phenomena, which we record, are new to them, contrary to their knowledge and experience, and—what I believe to be the real point on which to dwell—they do not hook on to any antecedent experience or knowledge that they possess, so as to proceed from it, and form a connection with it. Mr. Slater says:—"In conversation with friends upon incidents which have been described in 'LIGHT' or in the Psychological Review, &c., I have repeatedly heard it declared in substance that 'were we to witness such occurrences we should be more disposed to believe ourselves the victims of some strange illusion, some temporary mental disease, than to admit that the experience of our past lives and of those of our colleagues and predecessors could thus prove itself at fault.'"

That is so, no doubt. But, surely, such a mental condition would not long survive reiterated experience; and surely, also, so long as it does exist, such a man is not in the best state for accurate observation. We are told that "a really good observer, a man who can accurately see, feel, &c., objects presented to him, who can apprehend them in his mind without misconception and who can report them faithfully without mixing his own inferences or preconceptions with the facts, is not very commonly to be met with." If that be so (and I by no means acquiesce in the full breadth of the assertion) then these men of science with their "inferences and preconceptions" are self-condemned as incompetent observers. Indeed, I say advisedly, after long and minute experience, that I have found amongst avowed Spiritualists as much accurate, patient, and painstaking observation as I have among any other class, and I am by no means disposed to admit that I am not a competent judge of phenomena that occur before my eyes, on repeated occasions extending over many years, even though I may not have had a so-called scientific training, and therein have acquired some very prominent and dominant scientific prejudices.

But it would be improper not to admit at once that given the open and unwarped mind, a trained observer, like, e.g., Mr. Crookes, possesses advantages which the sceptical world is not slow to recognise. It has been his business to interrogate Nature, and to devise methods of cross-examination that shall extort her inmost secrets. He is not, therefore, indeed, an expert in astronomy or geology, because he is a famous chemist; but so far he is the better equipped mentally by virtue of his experience. He is not an enthusiast; he will not err on the side of exaggeration, as some incompetent persons unquestionably do. The world sees that, and is disposed to value his evidence accordingly. So when the scientific world, always more than a little irritated by this new thing, heard that Mr. Crookes was about to test its pretensions, there was a general sigh of relief. "Now at last we shall get what we want." Yes, but they did not. Mr. Crookes brought his admitted powers to bear, and gave a decided testimony to what he had found. Only he had not found what was expected of him, and so this impartial tribunal, to which we are referred as the final court of appeal, would have none of his testimony. Now that is not my idea of justice, and I will not appeal to that court.

I have said that this attitude of incredulity in a fair mind cannot long survive. The repeated occurrence of what is at first strange and improbable, if its effect be not thwarted by prejudice and antipathy—in which case the mind ceases to be fair—soon establishes conviction of the objective reality of what the senses take cognisance of. Mr. Slater avers and therein does injustice to his candour and sincerity of mind, that he dare not say he had seen a sea-serpent, even if he should be so fortunate as to meet with one. "The official scientific world" would pass on him a verdict of "temporary insanity." Very likely. But that would not make him insane. And if fifty, a hundred, a thousand observers came forward one after another to give the same testimony, this "official scientific world," whose business it would seem to be to burke truth rather than to spread it, would soon find its occupation gone. It is the cowardice of men who shrink from the petty persecutions that prejudice can still inflict on them which makes the birth of a new truth so difficult, and its growth so slow. We Spiritualists find that to our cost; and I am far from saying that any man should make of himself a public scapegoat while others refuse their share in the obloquy. But I do say that a general and bold assertion of what we know and believe would very soon paralyse persecution, and turn the obloquy into honour. But this demands united action, and Mr. Slater is right enough in what he says about the treatment that one brave man would meet with from this impartial and candid "official scientific world." Only he must not in the same breath ask us to submit to it as our supreme arbiter of truth.

There are many points in this instructive address on which I should like to comment did space permit. As to the question of the source of the energy both the chairman and Mr. Shorter made suggestions which the experience of Spiritualists will confirm. It is a common thing to find the occurrence of special phenomena at a séance preceded by a cold wind sweeping over the hands of the sitters. I have known temperature so lowered that we have sat shivering with cold; but whether a thermometer would have fallen is another matter on which I pronounce no opinion. I have known a medium so depleted of vital energy after some more than ordinarily violent ebullition of psychic force as to fall a helpless mass on the floor, with no power of holding himself upright. It not infrequently happens in a circle not properly formed that absolute silence and stillness prevails, until suddenly, perhaps after two hours or more of waiting, the temperature is lowered, the cold wind is felt, and some one thing occurs and then all is over. No amount of time seems to suffice for the production of any further phenomena. The stored-up energy, whatever it was, has been used, and nothing more can be done. In a well-formed circle, on the other hand, phenomena will occur at once and go on with regularity till the close of a two-hours sitting, and, in spite of the great expenditure of energy, no one will feel any the weaker, nor will any sensation of cold be felt. It would seem, therefore, that there is a direct relation between the whole circle and the results obtained, and not between these results and the medium only. If any one can tell us what is the composition of that luminous vapour which sensitises, and others too for the matter of that, see in a room when physical phenomena are going on, which appears on Mr. Beattie's photographs and on others, and which is the very pabulum which the invisible operators use, he will have put us on the right track.

But in all this we ignore spirit, of the action of which many of us have other evidence than that of which Mr. Slater treated. He was right, of course, in taking account only of what he did. But his bars of iron are no fair analogue of what we have to investigate. Their deportment, no doubt, is found to be invariable, so far as we are able to investigate with our present senses. If these were extended, or increased by the addition of another, probably we should find ourselves in a new world where the iron bar even was not the same. But we deal with intelligent beings, and we have to reckon with them. We do not know what energies they have at their command, and we know little of them or their potencies. Spiritualism, without the spirits, as Captain Burton phrased it, is a mere delusion, a waste of time and trouble. By all means let us try the spirits, and get, if we may, more knowledge of them and their methods. This we shall not do by ignoring their existence and independent action. Mr. Slater inclines to Zöllner's hypothesis of a poly-dimensional space. It may be so; but there are intelligent spiritual beings there, and we want to find out who and what they are. If men of science are disposed to help in the search Spiritualists will welcome their aid. But experience does not predispose us to acquiesce in all their postulates and demands. If they are to be of service the motive-spring must act from within. No crucial experiments, no tests, will convince those who, though temporarily astonished, would soon revert to their old opinion. Not even Mr. Slater's "living ornithoptera from the Moluccas on the council-room table of the Entomological Society" would avail. The wise men would sit upon it (metaphorically), but it would be the old, old story. "Spirit is the last thing I will give in to." And it must be the first.

M.A. (Oxon.)

The Cornubian and Redruth Times often contains news and information about spiritual phenomena. It is one of the few newspapers which always give a fair hearing to such subjects. This is the more commendable inasmuch as it is more difficult, on account of local prejudices, for a country journal to adopt such a course than for one published in London.

The Daily Chronicle of March 27th, spoke favourably of "Lyrics for Heart and Voice," by Thomas Brevior (Mr. Thomas Shorter). It said:—"There is much feeling tenderly expressed in these religious poems, but the majority are more adapted for home reading than the 'Hymnal of the Future,' in which the author desires they should find a place."

UNCONSCIOUS MEDIUMSHIP.

By F. J. Theobald.

Some years before we heard anything of Spiritualism, a beautiful instance of "unconscious mediumship" occurred to my father—Mr. Robert Theobald.

It took place on the first night that he occupied his bedroom after our much loved mamma had been removed from our midst.* She appeared, and spoke to him. Loving her as he did, with all the strength of his affectionate nature, he felt deeply, as we all did, that our loss was irreparable. He was lying in bed, his head buried beneath the clothes, vainly endeavouring to pray for consolation and submission to God's will. But his sorrow had gained complete mastery over his physical frame, and, as he told us, when calmly relating this experience to us the next morning, had it not been for some supernatural aid he must have been prostrated in the delirium of fever before the morning.

Suddenly my father felt drawn irresistibly to raise his head and look up. There mamma stood by his side, radiant in health and beauty. White shining robes were flowing around her, and a bright halo was over her head. She raised her right hand, and pointing with her fore-finger upwards, said in her own natural voice, and looking at him lovingly, "Peace, be still! Can you wish me back?"

The revulsion in his own feelings was instantaneous. The storm of anguish was quelled. He gazed at her with delight, as she gradually rose and faded from his sight.

A few years later on, my father became an earnest Spiritualist and through a long period of terrible suffering from heart disease, was continually cheered by helpful messages from our beloved mother, and also by the conscious presence in his room, of many spirits, who, in various ways, "ministered" to, and helped him in his spiritual growth. In one of the first messages mamma wrote through my hand, she told us that the Father took her from us, because she could better help us, her children, from the spirit-land, than if she had been spared to live on with us in the body. Truly does Elihu Rich say, "What God takes from us, it is always gain to lose."

Our much-beloved grandpapa, the Rev. Stephen Morell, was a very highly developed medium, many years before Spiritualism was known in its present phase.

Well known as a Congregational minister, and for many years one of the Country Directors of the London Missionary Society, he was much loved and respected by all who knew him. For fifty-three years he preached from the same pulpit, and his memory is still revered as one who walked with God. A highly cultivated scholar, he was one of the last who would ever be regarded as fanatical, "imaginative," or likely to yield himself up to a delusion.

Still, it was an accepted fact in his family, although rarely alluded to by himself, that he was in frequent communication with his children who were in the spirit-land; and especially so with the eldest son, who had been ordained to the ministry at the Old Meeting at Norwich only three months before he was called to his spirit home. In rapid succession four of my grandpapa's family were removed, by consumption, at ages varying from sixteen to twenty-four. I will give his own account of these beautiful experiences, as he told them to me.

It was not long after our loved mamma had been taken from us; we had all been much comforted by her appearance to papa; and it was whilst speaking with grandpapa about this that I asked—

"Grandpapa, do you believe in spirits?"

"Ah! indeed I do!" he replied, so emphatically, his beautiful face lighting up with what I thought a heavenly smile.

"Have you ever seen one?" I asked.

"Oh, yes!" he answered, "I've seen your Uncle Stephen many times. I've also seen Mary Ann and Letitia, and all of them two or three times, but," he added emphatically, "Stephen I often see." I asked when he came to him, and what Uncle Stephen talked about. Grandpapa replied, "He comes at night, when I am sitting alone, after you have all gone to bed. He sits with me for an hour or two. I must not tell you, or anybody, what he talks about. Only he often suggests subjects for sermons." Our mamma inherited his mediumistic gift, in the form of clairvoyance, or second sight.

To all Spiritualists the account which Frances Ridley Havergal gives of the way in which her poems were received will be of the deepest interest. I extract the following from the "Memoir," written by her sister, who possibly is quite unaware that these records prove her beloved one to have been "unconsciously" a remarkably developed medium for spirit power, not only as a writing medium, but also clairaudiently. She says:—

"I never set myself to write verses. I believe my King suggests a thought, and whispers me a musical line or two, and then I look up and thank Him delightedly, and go on with it. That is how the hymns and poems come. The Master has not put a chest of poetic gold in my possession, and said, 'Now use it as you like.' But He keeps the gold and gives it me piece by piece, just when He will. . . . Perhaps He will send it all in one flow of musical thought, but more likely, one at a time, that I may be kept asking Him for every line."

Again she says:—

"I have a curious vivid sense of my verse faculty in general being given me, but also, of every separate poem or hymn—nay, every line, being given. It is peculiarly pleasant thus to take it as a direct gift; not a matter of effort, but purely involuntarily." "I have not had a single poem come to me for some time, till last night, when one shot into my mind. It is so curious; one minute I have not an idea of writing anything, the next I have a poem; it is mine. I see it all."

This is a good description of the uncertainty of mediumship, coming as it does to all, sometimes with great and almost continuous power, daily, for weeks; and then quite suddenly leaving the medium, for as long, or longer. Such experiences belong to what Mrs. Watts beautifully describes as the "ebb and flow of the spiritual tides."

A young relative of my own has often told me that when travelling by train, he hears most exquisite music, coming in grand chords, and resembling Beethoven's, or Sebastian Bach's.

My father also, during his long years of suffering, used frequently to hear angelic strains of harmony, "like thousands of voices, rising on the air in the distance," drawing quite near to him and then gradually receding.

Miss Havergal relates exactly similar experiences, as follows:—"In the train I had one of those curious musical visions, which only very rarely visit me. I hear strange, and very beautiful chords, generally full, slow, grand, succeeding each other in most interesting sequences. I do not invent them; I could not. They pass before my mind, and I only listen. . . . It is so interesting; the chords seem to fold over each other, and die away down into music of infinite softness, and then they unfold and open out, as if great curtains were being withdrawn, one after another, widening the view, till, with a gathering power, and intensity, and fulness, it seems as if the very skies were being opened out before one, and a sort of great blaze and glory of music, such as my outward ears never heard, gradually swells out in perfectly sublime splendour. This time there was an added feature. I seemed to hear depths and heights of sound beyond the scale which human ears can receive. Keen, far-up octaves, like vividly twinkling starlight of music, and mighty, slow vibrations of gigantic strings, going down into grand thunders of depths, octaves below anything otherwise appreciable as musical notes. Then all at once it seemed as if my soul had got a new sense, and I could see this inner music, as well as hear it, and then it was like gazing down into marvellous abysses of sound, and up into dazzling regions of what, to the eye, would have been light and colour; but to this new sense was sound."

One circumstance related is of especial interest, shewing as it does the literal truth of the words, "whilst ye are yet speaking, I will hear," and closely corresponding to experiences of my own, one of which I have already given.

When speaking of the way in which F. R. Havergal's hymn, "Reality, reality, Lord Jesus Christ, Thou art to me," she writes:—

"At a prayer meeting on the same day a young Christian prayed earnestly: 'Lord Jesus, let thy dear servant write for us what Thou art, Thou living bright reality!' And urging his plea with increasing vehemence, he added, 'And let her do it this very night.' That very night these verses were flashed into my mind. While he was yet speaking 400 miles away, they were written, and dated. Does not this shew the reality of prayer?"

A new Kardecian journal, entitled Le Spiritisme, has just appeared in Paris. In size, style, and contents it is very similar to our old friend, Le Messager, of Liège. It appears to be the official organ of L'Union Spirite Française.

"GHOSTS OF BIRDS AND BEASTS."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I request to be allowed, on behalf of my wife, to reply to Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald's letter relative to her recent communication on the above subject.

The word "spirit" in that communication is employed, as might, I think, have been reasonably inferred, without any dogmatic significance, in the sense in which the word "ghost" is used in the title to the article, viz., to import an underlying vital principle embodied in a shape.

No intention existed of entering into the distinction between "soul" and "spirit"—an interesting subject, no doubt, but not immediately to the purpose.

The idea of "flowery green paddocks surrounded by hedges of blooming roses," appears to be more offensive to the taste of Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald than that of the "fleas" which he has been pleased to contribute to the picture. He inquires, "Why not fleas?" I am not able to suggest any reason why not, nor am I desirous of doing so. William Blake, the great seer and painter, an imaginative person, with whose works and writings Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald's studies may possibly not have familiarised him, avers that he once saw the ghost of a flea, and he drew it. His portrait of this awesome creature (which, if I remember aright, he mentions he was informed had once been the animating principle of a venomous and splenetic human being) may be examined by the curious in Mr. Gilchrist's Life of the painter.

The possession of a "spirit," or interior animating principle, is not, we may believe, necessarily dependent upon the significance or insignificance of the embodiment.

Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald's letter embodies a spirit which it forms no part of the object of my reply to it to qualify. The spirit of the recent east wind possibly.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

19, Cheyne-walk, Chelsea, S.W.

A. A. WATTS,

SPIRITUALISM ON THE CONTINENT.—Mr. Riko, a Dutch gentleman, who for twenty-five years has given much time and money to the extension of Spiritualism, and who is well-known as a sincere and devoted friend of all the mediums, writing to La Revue Spirite, says that at The Hague the best informed Spiritualists entirely agree with, and have adopted the rules laid down in the circular on séance conditions issued by the Central Association of Spiritualists. The editor of the Revue Spirite, M. P. G. Leymarie, also concurs in the action which we had the pleasure of inaugurating in conjunction with the editor of the late Psychological Review, and further expresses his opinion that those who admit people to séances without previous preparation do little service to Spiritualism. We have insisted upon this more than once, and we believe that the question of the proper initiation of inquirers is one that will, in the near future, require as calm and careful consideration as that which was bestowed on séance conditions. We extend a hearty welcome to our French and Dutch allies.

CURIOUS INCIDENT AT CARNARVON.—A correspondent writes:—"I am not superstitious, but, on the contrary, decidedly sceptical as to the existence of ghosts, and equally doubtful as to spirits that were once in the flesh being permitted to revisit in any shape 'the glimpses of the moon,' or, invisible to man's sight, to walk the earth, and play strange pranks. I am therefore at a loss to account for a singular incident of which I was a witness a short time since. One dark night I walked from the central portion of Carnarvon to Llanbeblig Church, and on reaching that time-honoured edifice, I retraced my steps. I had proceeded about a hundred yards when I observed, ascending the hill towards me, a very bright light. As it approached the illumination appeared to proceed from a black-looking vehicle to which one lamp was attached, and which was drawn by one horse. I could see no occupant or driver as it passed me noiselessly, casting a bright and peculiar glare on the roadway. I looked back up the hill, as it went along, and saw the vehicle apparently go through the gates of a large house. I thought to myself 'The occupant of the house is receiving some guest of distinction to-night,' and curiosity prompted me to turn back as far as the gate of the residence to see who alighted. I found the gate fast shut, and no trace of the light or the vehicle which I supposed had passed through. I thought the circumstance singular, but took no further notice of it at the time. I have, however, twice since encountered this shadowy vehicle at the same spot, and on each occasion been equally at a loss to account for its silent passage along the roadway—even the horse's hoofs making no sound, and also puzzled as to its singular disappearance. I learn that several other persons whose truthfulness cannot be doubted have had a similar experience. I should, therefore, like to know whether this curious phenomenon can be explained by any ordinary inference, or whether it is one of those things which are beyond the present range of our poor philosophy."—Carnarvon Herald.

HAUNTED HOUSES.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The story which I send you herewith, is selected from the records in the possession of the Haunted House Committee of the Society for Psychical Research. The story is noteworthy in itself, and is, moreover, admirably illustrative of the difficulties attendant on investigations of this nature. I first heard of the incidents related below from an intimate friend of the T— family, and endeavoured to obtain through this lady an introduction to the Miss T— of the narrative. But Miss T— was obdurate: it was in vain that I wrote to her repeatedly, and through my friend represented the interest and importance of the subject, and the need for its thorough and careful investigation: she entirely declined to afford us any information. Though deeply regretting the loss of such valuable testimony, I could not but sympathise with Miss T—'s reluctance to revive painful memories, and I was compelled to desist from my importunity.

At the same time we felt that, without in any way impeaching my friend's accuracy, it was impossible to set much value upon her testimony to events of which she had not been a witness, and of which she had not even heard until some years after their occurrence. The matter, accordingly, dropped. A few months afterwards, however, I had the good fortune to make the acquaintance of the younger sister, Miss A. T—, and she willingly accorded the information which her sister had denied me. She had not actually seen the figure herself, but she had heard the particulars of each appearance from the witnesses of it, when the details were still fresh in their memory, and she had repeatedly heard the whole matter discussed in family conclave, when the disturbances were still going on. Moreover, she had herself heard some of the strange noises described. She related to me the incidents described below in great detail; and after questioning her at some length, I drew up the following account in her presence, reading over to her each paragraph as it was written. The account has since been read through by Miss T— herself; and though she still declines to give us any further particulars, she admits that this account is "substantially correct." Though the narrative, therefore, falls in value somewhat below a first-hand account it is very far superior to an ordinary second-hand ghost story, and may, I think, be taken as almost entirely correct. Miss T— would certainly not have allowed any material mistake to pass without comment, even if, which is very unlikely, her sister had made any.

In view of Miss T—'s repeatedly expressed wish that no inquiries should be made of her upon the subject, I fear that further investigation of the past is, in this case, no longer possible. Moreover, Mrs. T— and the unmarried brother mentioned in the narrative are both dead. The family, it should be added, have again removed, but the ghost has not, apparently, followed them.—I am, &c., 17th March, 1883.

FRANK PODMORE.

In 1870 the T— family took a house in West Brompton on lease for seven years. They entered the house in the spring of that year. This house, it would appear, is now, and has been since 1877, in the occupancy of Captain F—. Captain F— has been asked, by a friend of the T— family, whether anything unusual has occurred in the house during his tenancy, and he has replied in the negative. There would seem, however, to be some reason for doubting the accuracy of this statement.

Nothing remarkable occurred during the first eighteen months of the T— family occupying the house. In the autumn of 1871, when Mrs. T— and Miss T— were going upstairs to bed, leaving the hall in total darkness, Miss T—, who was then on one of the upper landings, thought she heard her brother entering the house, and looked over the banisters. She saw a grey figure leave the dining-room, cross the hall, and disappear down the kitchen stairs. Miss T— told nobody of what she had seen. This was the first time that anything abnormal was seen in the house.

During their tenancy of the house this same figure was seen repeatedly by at least five independent witnesses, Miss T— being the one who saw it most frequently. The figure was very tall, dressed in grey drapery. The drapery also partially enveloped the head, though allowing the features to be seen. The "grey" was a light grey—perhaps such a colour as a white object would assume in partial darkness. The hands, it would seem, hung down and were clasped in front of the figure. The expression of the face was very calm and peaceful—a good face. There was no hair on the face, and it was only from the unusual height of the figure, that it was supposed to be that of a man.

There was nothing indistinct about the outline of the figure. The drapery was shapeless—that is, it had no definite shape, such as that of a dressing-gown, or a monk's gown. But the lines of it were firm and clear. But the whole figure was shadowy and unsubstantial-looking. It was never seen save in the dark, and would appear, therefore, to have been faintly luminous, for it was seen in all parts of the house, and sometimes in rooms almost entirely dark. The figure was seen chiefly in Miss T—'s room, or on the landing near; but it was also seen on the bath-room steps, on the stairs, in the dining-room, and in other bed-rooms. The figure never moved its head or hands and never spoke or made, apparently, any sound (with one exception to be noted below).

Sometimes Miss T— would see it when in bed, and she would then frequently put her head under the clothes, to avoid it. But if she saw it when she was about the house she would always look at it until the figure vanished. But she is quite unable to say whether she looked at it for minutes or seconds. It would finally vanish quite suddenly. Occasionally, however, it would glide away into another room. The figure never walked; it glided. There was never any sound accompanying its movements.

The figure was next seen by an old nurse, Mrs. N—who met it on the stairs (in the autumn of the same year, 1871). She looked at the figure until it vanished. She also told nobody at the time of what she had seen.

Some time afterwards a friend of the family was staying in the house. She complained, on the morning after her arrival, that she had been kept awake by the noise of furniture, &c., being moved about in the rooms above her. These rooms were occupied, and no one else had heard the noises complained of. But the occurrence led to a general family discussion. Unaccountable noises had been often heard before in the house, and Miss T— and Mrs. N— then mentioned, for the first time, the figure which they had seen.

Mr. T—, the brother, also saw the figure frequently; on one occasion it was in the hall, when he opened the front door. On another, when returning from his club late one night, he saw the figure, from the street, standing at the drawing-room window.

Miss T— frequently saw the figure in her room standing at her bedside, and on the landing near her room. Sometimes she woke in the night, and found it at her bedside.

N—, the cook, complained angrily to his wife that one of the other servants would sometimes come into his room at night. He had, at that time, not heard of the figure being seen, but he subsequently connected these appearances with the figure.

R— T—, then a little boy of seven, was sleeping in the same room with Miss T—. He complained one morning that he had had a "horrid night"; he had been awake, and had seen L— (Miss T—) standing at his bedside in her night-dress, "only it wasn't L—." Of course, nothing had ever been told the child about the figure which had been seen. It is not clear whether any peculiar feelings accompanied the appearance of the figure; but Miss T— when in her room, frequently experienced a feeling of great coldness and horror, a feeling which she says is quite indescribable. This feeling she always attributed to the presence of a figure in the room, though she was unable on such occasions to see it.

Miss T— would very often hear footsteps and sighs in her room, as if someone were walking about and sighing. The most unaccountable noises were heard all over the house throughout the whole of these seven years—most frequently in the autumn. Footsteps, knocks at the door, bells rung in the daytime, &c. &c. There were also noises as if a heavy weight, such as a bundle of clothes, had been dropped from a great height on to one of the landings—the sound was loud, but muffled. These noises, except the bell-ringing, were heard almost invariably at night.

Sometimes two or three people heard the noises, or were woke up by them. At other times only one person would hear them. On one New Year's Eve, when Miss T— and N— were alone in the house, N— came up from the kitchen to the dining-room where Miss T— was sitting, to see what was the matter. He had heard loud noises, as of furniture being dragged about in the dining-room. Miss T— had heard nothing, and the house seemed perfectly quiet.

On another occasion Miss T— heard the same noise, as of furniture being moved, &c., in the room above hers, which was occupied by her brother, Mr. T—. She went up to see what was the matter, and knocked at his door, but he was fast asleep. These noises, as of furniture being moved about—always in the room above—were of frequent occurrence.

This house formerly belonged to a Mr. G— an artist, who has now sold it. He was very anxious for Mrs. T— to buy it. A few months after the T— family had been in the house, and before they had experienced anything unusual, Mr. G— came to see Mrs. T— and asked her if she was quite comfortable in the house. As she rented the house unfurnished, the question struck her as odd: and she remarked upon it at the time.

In the autumn of 1877 the T— family removed to another house in the same neighbourhood, where they remained until April, 1880. Miss T— was abroad during the winters of 1877 and 1878: but was in the house during the summer months of the latter year. She finally returned in the spring of 1879. It is to be noted that the T—s had never mentioned the subject of visions and disturbances to even their most intimate friends whilst they were still in the first house, but on leaving the house, believing themselves to be free from their persecutors, they mentioned the subject freely. In the spring of 1879 Miss T— heard the same noises as before—footsteps and sighs—but fainter. They gradually, however, increased in intensity until they became as bad as ever. She did not mention the subject. The noises, however, in the autumn were heard by all the household—including Miss A. T—, my informant, who, being only a child, had not heard them in the other house. They were even more loud and frequent than hitherto, and their character had somewhat changed. Footsteps were heard as before: doors were banged, where no doors or only locked doors were; there was a noise as of a metal tea-tray being rolled down stairs.

There was, also, frequently a sound as of a person breathing heavily, and walking about, heard in the bedrooms. Knocks two or three times repeated, were also heard at the doors.

A married brother was staying in the house with his wife and little girl of three years. One night they all three heard the sound as of a person walking up and down the room and breathing loudly. Mrs. T— struck a light and lit the gas, when the noises ceased. They recommenced, however, when the gas was turned out.

One night in September, 1879, when H— T—, a boy of thirteen, had been ill for many months, and was sleeping in the back dining-room, with Mrs. T— in the same room to attend upon him, they both heard a noise as of a door opening into a third room on the dining-room floor being opened, and the window of that room being thrown open. The door then banged, and a match was heard to be struck outside. All the household were upstairs in bed, and the boy became ill with fright. Mrs. T— had to attend at once to him and so did not open the door. In the morning the window was found bolted, and the door of the back room locked.

This noise, as of a match being struck, was afterwards heard several times, both in the middle of the day and at night, and by several persons. Also in different parts of the house; but always outside a door.

From this time, until the date of the boy's death, a fortnight or three weeks afterwards, the noises were louder than at any other time, and disturbed the boy's rest at night.

On Christmas day, 1879, Miss T—, going to early service, saw the figure standing just below her, at the top of the bath-room stairs. She saw the figure again that afternoon at the foot of her bed, when she had gone up in the dusk without a light. She saw the figure again, more than once before she left the house. On one occasion, when sleeping in the same room with Mrs. T—, Miss T— woke and saw the figure standing between the beds, near the foot. There was a noise as of a parcel being dropped on the floor, and the figure vanished. The noise woke Mrs. T—, who wanted to know what was the matter.

A child of three years (the same before mentioned) woke up one night with a scream saying that something had come to take her away. After this occasion the child refused to be left alone, as long as she stayed in the house.

A housemaid met the figure standing on the stairs one evening, and ran down in great fear to tell the other servants.

A nurse, on another occasion, saw a figure which she supposed at the time to be that of her mistress, leaving the bedroom at night.

It is to be noted that during these nine years, Mrs. T—, and Miss A. T—, and two younger children, who were constantly living in the house, never saw the figure. Nor did any other members of the family, except those mentioned, though an elder brother stayed until 1875 with his family in the first house; and a cousin lived with them for eighteen months in the second house.

THE TESTIMONIAL TO MR. TOWNS.

On Wednesday evening, March 28th, a numerous attended and very pleasant gathering of metropolitan Spiritualists took place at Neumeyer Hall, Bloomsbury, to celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of the advent of modern Spiritualism, and to present, at the same time, a testimonial to Mr. W. Towns, a well-known private medium, of upwards of twenty years standing.

Shortly after eight o'clock the proceedings were opened by Mr. Thomas Everitt, who had kindly consented to preside. In a happily conceived speech he stated the objects of the evening, briefly but pointedly referring to the two events that engaged the attention of the friends present. His remarks were most cordially received, and at their close the following excellent programme was executed. The vocal services of Mrs. Georgina Weldon were, as usual, received with the most demonstrative approval; while the musical and vocal efforts of Mr. J. C. and the Misses Ward fairly captured the sympathies of the audience.

The testimonial, consisting of a purse containing £30, was presented to Mr. Towns by Mrs. Hallock, who, in a few well chosen remarks, discharged her pleasant duty in her usual genial manner. In the course of the evening Mr. J. J. Morse made a brief speech, his happy references to the objects of the meeting calling forth unstinted recognition. As the chairman of the evening was compelled to retire at an early hour, Mr. Morse kindly consented to officiate in his stead.

The success of the testimonial was mainly due to the untiring exertions of Mr. J. S. Wootton, who was cordially assisted by Mr. S. Goss and Mr. J. King, and the event was, in every respect, a gratifying testimony to Mr. Towns of the sympathy and respect entertained towards him upon the part of his friends, who evidently have not allowed his twenty years of devotion to the cause of Spiritualism in the Metropolis to pass unnoted.

Amongst those present were Mr. and Mrs. Everitt, Mr. R. Pearce, Mr. M. Theobald, Mrs. Tebb, Mrs. Hallock, Miss Houghton, Mr. and Mrs. Towns, Mr. Landers, Mr. J. S. Wootton, Mr. S. Goss, Mr. Glendinning, Mrs. and Miss Sparey, Mr. and Mrs. Morse, Miss Keeves, Miss Record, Mr. and Mrs. Cowper, Mr. F. Wilson, Mr. E. A. Tietkens, &c., &c.

Programme of Concert.

Part I.—Duet, organ and pianoforte, Mr. C. Davieson and Mr. J. C. Ward; address, Mr. T. Everitt, from the chair; song "Ruth," Ch. ## THE PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY OF SPIRITUALISTS.

In another column will be found evidence of the beneficial influence exercised by the C.A.S. in connection with the Spiritualist movement on the Continent. It will there be seen that the good results which followed the issue of the circular on sance conditions were not confined to this country, but were likewise felt across the Channel. Were further proof required than already exists of the fitness and ability of the C.A.S. to undertake public work, it would, we think, be supplied in this circumstance.

We make no apology for recurring to this subject or for again asking those interested in Spiritualism to support the C.A.S. in their work. Let us look for a moment at one aspect of the question out of many that occur to us.

The absolute demonstration of the existence of spirit which Spiritualism affords is, without doubt, the greatest fact the present century has produced, and it is also equally certain that Spiritualists, as depositories of that knowledge, have certain responsibilities and duties imposed upon them with regard to the dissemination of what has proved so great a boon and blessing to themselves. It appears to us that the practical value of Spiritualism is solely to be measured by its influence on daily life and thought, and only so far as it induces men to turn their eyes from self, and fires their hearts with a desire to do good to their fellows, can its worth be estimated. This practical standard of value is the only one we care to insist upon, and we would earnestly desiderate its personal application. Were this done there would be no need to urge the claims of this worker or that agency to the sympathy and support of Spiritualists, for those whom Spiritualism had brought out of the depths of doubt and unrest would hasten to uphold any endeavour to disseminate a knowledge of its facts.

To put it plainly, we are simply pleading for a recognition of the fact that there is much good and useful work to be done in all directions, and, moreover, that it is of such a varied character that none need fail to find opportunities to their taste. We have strongly urged our readers to actively co-operate with the C.A.S., and still would do so, because to our belief, it is the most efficient organisation in existence at the present time; but if any of our friends feel that it is not worthy of support, there are plenty of other agencies where probably they can find the desired merit, if they only look for it. We shall rejoice if what we have written in any way hastens the accomplishment of what must some time or other be done, and we can only repeat that were each individual Spiritualist to bear a fair share of the burden, the task would be an easy one, and would not, as now, press heavily on a few workers.

LECTURES ON PSYCHOLOGICAL SCIENCE.

We have been asked to announce the following particulars on behalf of the Lecture Committee of the C.A.S.

It is proposed to hold a course of six lectures during April, May, and June, at the Langham Hall, Great Portland-street, W., on alternate Tuesday evenings, at eight o'clock.

The subjects and lecturers already fixed are:—"An Answer to the Inquiry: What is the Use of Psychological Science?" by Mr. Thomas Shorter.

"A Scientific and Spiritual Basis of Belief in a Future Life," by Rev. John Page Hopps.

"Personal Experience in Psychology," by Mr. T. P. Barker, F.G.S.

The general public will be admitted free, but to cover the necessary expense of hire of hall, fees, travelling, advertising, and other charges, the committee offer a limited number of tickets for reserved seats at ONE GUINEA each for the course of six lectures. They also appeal to the liberality of Spiritualists and those interested in the dissemination of a knowledge of the phenomena, to contribute to a SPECIAL LECTURE FUND for this purpose. All donations are acknowledged in "LIGHT," and a balance-sheet will be published in due course.

The secretary informs us that correspondents speak highly of the forthcoming lectures, the following being a few extracts from letters received;—

"I feel much interest in the proposed course of lectures, thinking it an excellent step in the right direction, and have pleasure in enclosing three guineas in aid of the required fund."

"I think the project a wise one, and trust that the other lectures will be of equal ability and suitability to those of the two named. I shall be happy to take a ticket for the course."

"These lectures are just the thing that is wanted to meet the demand for intelligent information on these burning questions. You may rely upon my hearty support."

"Now that you are undertaking such public-spirited action, depend upon it, you will receive the support and encouragement of many who, like myself, have waited for such useful work. Enclosed find cheque for my contribution."

SPECIAL LECTURE FUND, 1882.

The following donations have already been received:—

	£	s.	d.
Mrs. M. A. Staek	...	3	3
The Hon. Percy Wyndham, M.P.	...	2	2
Mrs. E. M. James	...	2	0
Mrs. Parrick	...	1	1
J. S. Farmer	...	1	1

Further particulars and dates of lectures will be announced as soon as sufficient funds to cover expenses have been subscribed.

All communications and applications for tickets to be addressed to Mr. Thomas Blyton, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

MISS WOOD'S SEANCES AT THE C. A. S.—Miss Wood has returned to London for the purpose of giving the second series of sittings with the Séance Conditions Committee of the C.A.S. We hope to be in a position to present a satisfactory report at their close.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.—On Monday evening next a paper will be read by Mr. J. J. Morse, entitled "Concerning the Soul," to be followed by a discussion. The chair will be taken at 7.30 p.m., and we trust there will be a full attendance.

The monthly Council meeting of the Central Association of Spiritualists will be held at the premises of the Association, on Tuesday evening next, at 6.30 p.m., when the arrangements for the forthcoming series of public lectures will probably be brought forward, and other important items of business will have attention.

THE METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.—We are requested to announce that on and after Sunday, April 15th, the services held by this society will be removed from St. Andrew's Hall to the Cavendish Rooms, 51, Mortimer-street, W. The services commence at seven o'clock each evening, and full particulars of next Sunday's arrangements will be found in our advertising columns.

"PHANTASMS OF THE LIVING."

By F. W. H. MYERS AND EDMUND GURNEY.

(Fortnightly Review, April, 1883.)

The Society for Psychical Research are rapidly establishing if indeed they have not already vindicated, their raison d'être, and we, as Spiritualists, can perhaps more than any other portion of the community, appreciate to the full extent the importance of their labours as a contribution to the comparative study of Psychology. Something similar to what Max Müller and his confrères have done for what they describe as the science of religion seems now in process of accomplishment as regards the wider and more varied field of psychical inquiry and research. The facts which Messrs. Myers and Gurney present for consideration, and their method of treatment are alike so good and sound that were it not for the exigencies of space we should feel tempted to give the paper now under consideration in extenso. As it is, we must content ourselves with a very brief summary, referring our readers to the Fortnightly Review itself for further and fuller details.

It will be remembered that the same writers dealt last month with two large families of cases where an impression is transmitted from one person to another without the intervention of the recognised sense-organs; the distinctive feature being that one or other of the parties concerned was in some state other than that of normal waking consciousness—that is to say, was either asleep, or entranced, or in circumstances of excitement or peril. They now deal with a third class, where both the parties concerned are in a state to some extent abnormal. This class is capable of the following general sub-division:—

(a) Cases where two persons, between whom the supposed rapport exists, are dying at a distance from each other at the same time; or where severe illness produces or heightens the sensibility of a distant catastrophe.

(b) Cases where two persons, both entranced or dreaming at the same time, have been together in spirit.

(c) Instances of double abnormality, where the transference of impression is to a sleeping percipient from an agent who is in some state of waking excitement.

These three classes vary considerably in frequency of occurrence, Class a being extremely rare, especially as regards the transference of impressions between dying persons. They quote, however, the following case of the effect of severe illness in producing similar results from Knowledge, of December 2nd, 1882. The narrator, Mr. J. Sinclair, says:—

"A friend of mine (Dr. Goodall Jones, of Liverpool) related to me the following account of a case of premonition. The names and dates Dr. Jones will give, if required:—He called on a female patient on Sunday afternoon at three o'clock; her husband met him at the door, and said he was about to come for him, as the patient was worse and delirious. On going up-stairs, the doctor found the poor woman in a very excited state, asserting that her brother (a Liverpool pilot) was drowning in the river; 'which,' said her husband, 'is impossible, as he is out at sea, to the best of our knowledge.' The doctor did what he could to soothe his patient, and left, convinced that it was a case of ordinary delirium. But in the next morning's paper he read with surprise the account of the pilot's death by drowning in the river on the previous afternoon at three o'clock."

As regards Class b, the writers consider that, as far as the transference of impression between entranced persons is concerned, the evidence has lacked the corroboration necessary to establish it on a sound basis. On the other hand, however, those of the nature of simultaneous dreams are by no means rare, and are easily established. They have come across one case in which the impression was reproduced in a quadruple form, the four persons concerned being at the time in four different countries of Europe. This narrative, which was too long for publication in the Fortnightly, we hope will appear in some future number of the Transactions of the Society.

Cases coming under category c are commoner still. Sleep, it is pointed out, has a peculiarly heightening effect on the percipient's impressibility. There are often striking indications that a transferred impression seems sometimes to have to wait for the sleeping state in order to cross the threshold of consciousness. This state appears also the only condition in which impressions of excitement of a happy kind are transferred. In the waking state these are generally conspicuous by their absence. The two following illustrations are given:—

The Rev. R. B. F. Elrington, Vicar of Lower Brixham, a friend of one of the writers, vouches for the fact that the following occurrence in his parish was described hours before the arrival of the news confirming the fears which it occasioned; and he certifies to the good character of the witnesses.

In the early spring of 1881, Mrs. Barnes, of Brixham, Devonshire, whose husband was at sea, dreamt that his fishing-vessel was run into by a steamer. Their boy was with him, and she called out in her dream, "Save the boy!" At this moment another son sleeping in the next room rushed into hers, crying out, "Where's father?" She asked what he meant, when he said he had distinctly heard his father come upstairs and kick with his heavy boots against the door, as he was in the habit of doing when he returned from sea. The boy's statement and her own dream so alarmed the woman that early next morning she told Mrs. Strong and other neighbours of her fears. News afterwards came that her husband's vessel had been run into by a steamer, and that he and the boy were drowned.

Mrs. Powles, of Wadhurst, West Dulwich, S.E., who is also personally known to one of the authors, furnished the following narrative:—

"I am in a position to vouch for a very curious dream which my late husband, Mr. William Holden, dreamt about a brother of his, Dr. Ralph Holden, who was at that time travelling in the interior of Africa. One morning in June or July, 1861, my husband woke me with the announcement, 'Ralph is dead.' I said, 'You must be dreaming.' 'No, I am not dreaming now,' but I dreamt twice over that I saw Ralph lying on the ground, supported by a man. He was lying under a large tree, and he was either dead or dying.' In December came the news that Dr. Holden was dead; and from a Mr. Green, who had been exploring in the same region, they learnt 'that he must have died about the time when his brother dreamt about him, and that he died in the arms of his faithful native servant, lying under a large tree, where he was afterwards buried.' The Holden family have a sketch which Mr. Green took on the spot of the tree and its surroundings, and on seeing it my husband said, 'Yes, that is exactly the place where I saw Ralph in my dream, dying or dead.'"

Several other narratives are given, but these we must pass over for the present.

Dreams form, the writers consider, the most assailable part of their evidence. The principle of selection is thus described:—

"For our purposes then, the dreams must have been noted down, or communicated to others, directly after their occurrence. If concerned with grave events, those events must be not of a chronic but of a critical kind, such as sudden danger or actual death. If concerned with trivial events, those events must be in some way bizarre or unexpected, not such every-day occurrences as a visit from a friend or the arrival of a present. To all dreams, however, one objection may be taken which has plausibility enough to be worth a minute's consideration. It is said that millions of people are dreaming every night, and that it might be expected, according to the doctrine of chances, that some few out of so vast a multitude of dreams would 'turn out true.' But, in the first place, an extremely small percentage of this multitude of dreams contain as their single or culminating point the definite sight of some one else in unusual or exciting circumstances. There are few exceptions to the rule that we are the heroes of our own dreams, and where a single strong impression survives the moment of waking, an occurrence which in itself is comparatively infrequent, the impression is far more often than not of circumstances in which we ourselves are central. And, in the second place, a dream which leaves on the mind a sense of interest or of disturbance, extending far into waking hours, is with most of us a decidedly rare event, and is a comparatively rare event even with those to whom it occurs oftenest, if the number of their dreams be completely realised. The very fact of a dream being specially remembered and noted may be taken as a proof of its having been exceptional. Far rarer, of course, are the cases where these two rare characteristics are combined, and where a vivid impression of another person in unusual or exciting circumstances, having been first produced in a dream, survives as a haunting and disturbing influence. If the dreams of a single night in England could be counted, it may be doubted whether so large a proportion as one in a million would be of this character. And when this immensely reduced number of dreams is considered, the number of occurrences, coincidently with the dream, of the identical event dreamed of, so far from exemplifying the law of chances, would be found to set it completely at defiance. If it be still objected that this argument at any rate does not apply to cases of coincidence where the event or scene is not of an unusual or exciting kind, and is remembered sufficiently to be noted without the production of any haunting impression, the reply is obvious. Of ordinary and unexciting events and scenes the number possible to imagination is practically infinite; the trivial details of circumstances which any single person can in imagination connect with the various persons of his acquaintance so clearly outnumber the remembered dreams of his whole lifetime, as to put the coincidence of dream and reality again completely outside the law of chances.

In sifting and arranging their material they have not found it possible to press the analogy of Thought-transference as regards this particular class too far. Though it seemed to offer a convenient logical start yet the phenomena break through any attempt to group them under heads of transferred impression; they, therefore, introduce the words telesthetic and telepathy to cover all cases of impression received at a distance without the normal operation of the recognised sense organs.

The rest of the paper is occupied with a consideration of various objections that present themselves. In the first place they think a far larger supply of first-rate and well attested facts is required. Not that they despise those they have already obtained, for they speak of them throughout with assurance. They thus explain their meaning:—

In a matter so anomalous, a number of direct and independent attestations, which would be utterly superfluous elsewhere, is indispensable for getting the scientific reality of the evidence into men's minds at all—for teaching them that that evidence is no shifting shadow, which it may be left to individual taste or temperament to interpret, but more resembles a solid mass seen in twilight, which men may indeed avoid stumbling over, but only by resolutely walking away from it. And when the seant thus deserts the field, the ordinary man needs to have the nature and true amount of the testimony far more directly brought home to him, than is necessary in realms already mastered by specialists to whose dicta he may defer. Failing this direct contact with the facts, the vaguely fascinated regard of the ordinary public is, for all scientific purposes, as futile as the seant's determined avoidance. Knowledge can never grow until it is realised that the question, "Do you believe in these things?" is puerile, unless it has been preceded by the inquiry, "What do you know about them?"

A very pleasing feature is that many of their correspondents allow the publication of names and addresses. If all would unite in disregarding a slight risk of ridicule, the risk itself would altogether disappear. This would also open up the question in a very marked degree. They say:—

Few persons who have not actively engaged in such inquiries as we are pursuing, can form any idea how enormous must be the sum of the phenomena which have been actually within the cognisance of persons now living. The number of those whom our appeal has actually reached forms but a very small proportion of the inhabitants even of a single country; and moreover much of our best evidence has been derived from the limited circle of our own acquaintance. We are justified, therefore in regarding the area which our inquiries have hitherto swept as but a corner of a very much larger field. There may probably be scores of persons in this country who could amass a first-hand collection of narratives quite as good as our own, and quite distinct from it. The commoner difficulties which the collector encounters may be expected to disappear, as it becomes better understood that there is a scheme into which each narrative falls, and that any well-attested fragment of evidence may prove of unexpected value. At present a tone of mind very commonly met with (and it is one with which we are far from altogether quarrelling), is that of the man who prefaces his remarks with an expression of contemptuous disbelief in any evidence that you can possibly bring before him, and then goes on to say "that there is one actual fact which I can tell you, for it occurred to myself." Harder still to deal with are those who, while firmly convinced, not only of their own particular experience of the phenomena, but of the extreme importance of establishing the reality of such experience in general, refuse the direct attestation which they would readily give to any other sort of fact in heaven or earth that they truly believed in, and which alone can insure the result they profess to desire. Taking all these people into consideration, they often seem to us like a multitude of persons standing side by side in the dark, who would be astonished, if the sun rose, to see their own overwhelming numbers. Meanwhile we are greatly at their mercy; with them, not with us, rests the possibility of giving to our subject the status of an organised science.

We pass by, just now, several pages dealing with other difficulties in the way of belief, and must close this notice, hoping, however, to return to the subject and to offer a few remarks of our own at an early date. Meanwhile we append the renewed appeal for facts given by Messrs. Myers and Gurney.

But after all it is not so much controversy or exposition that is the business of the hour, but the collection, the record, and the assimilation, of actual facts. And the invitation to aid in this business should not, we think, be an unwelcome one. We certainly hope to see our inquiry in a more advanced state, as time goes on; but it can never well be in a more interesting state than at the present moment. There is the maximum of stimulus which the sense of a rising cause, of an onflowing tide, can give; there are the alluring gleams of dawning order; there is the excitement of a time when individual efforts, however humble, may contribute in a sensible measure towards the establishment of important truth. The qualities which the research needs, for the present at any rate, are not those of a specially-endowed minority; they are not so much originality and profundity as candour, patience, and care.

THOUGHT-READING AND WILL-POWER AS AN AMUSEMENT.—SIR,—About the time the last part of this Magazine was published, I, together with some friends, had been much interested in the subject of "willing," but had not heard of "thought-reading," and I must confess that the former is much more interesting than the latter. It may be worthy of note that, about the time your article appeared, two sermons were preached in this neighbourhood, in two different churches by two different clergymen, on this subject. Some of our experiments were very remarkable, and may be of interest to many readers. After the patient to be operated on had been sent out of the room, it was arranged that he was to be "willed" to open the door of the conservatory. He was then called back, and two persons having placed their hands lightly round his neck, he, after some slight hesitation, went to the opposite end of the room, staying there for a few moments, and then with considerable reluctance turned round, walked to the conservatory, moved a chair out of the way, and opened the door: this all being accomplished without being blindfolded or the eyes closed. Another remarkable instance was when a young lady was willed to fetch the mat from the hall-door, and place it on a couch in the dining-room, which she did without the slightest hesitation. The same person was on another occasion willed (with her eyes blindfolded) to find a small card-table and turn it upside-down, and then roll up the hearth-rug. She turned the table top-side-turvy, but would not roll up the hearth-rug, although going down on her knees before it. Further trials were made, among them being the following. While blindfolded the subject was willed to remove a basket from a table in one corner of the room to a chair in another, then take the scoop from the coal-scuttle and place it on a particular chair, both of these tests being most successfully accomplished. Out of nine persons who have been willed, only two have failed to carry out what was desired; but in regard to thought-reading, only two experiments have been successful, both "readings" being by one who cannot be "willed" to do anything. It is certainly a very interesting amusement.—I am, Sir, &c., R.S.H. —Cassell's Magazine.

PERSONALITY AND THE UNIVERSAL MIND.

By John E. Purdon, M.B.T.C.D.

The question of the relation of man to God under the form of Personality, regarded as medium of relationship between distinguishable entities, appears to be the one of all others upon which the champions of the three great systems of the day, viz., Agnosticism, Eastern Revivalism grafted upon German Idealism with its Unknowable God, The Absolute, and lastly, Christianity can afford to give no quarter; for upon the application of that principle to the conduct of human affairs the polity of the Christian Republic is based. Men now-a-days are determined to have their just due, and that religion which gives to the individual his full rights as a citizen of this world is the one which, sooner or later, must conquer and absorb all others. Christianity claims for the individual the conduct of his own affairs, and it instructs him, a free being, how he is to act as best for his own interests and those of his fellows here and hereafter. In face of this mighty possibility of a future state of existence all reference to selfishness, &c., is out of the question; for no man allows himself to be trampled to death in a crowd out of pure politeness—nor should he allow his friends either to be trodden under foot if he can prevent it. In addition to being a religion which places all men upon an equality, Christianity has the advantage of being one the principles of which can be grasped by the vulgar or ignorant man, who has no difficulty in understanding what is meant by my God though it might take a good stiff course of reading to make him understand with any degree of clearness what is really meant by the Unknowable or even Absolute Brahma; which too a really extended course of study might induce him to believe were only limitations of self with a negative flavour, depending upon the nature of the formal laws within the domain of which, as a matter of fact, the human intellect is obliged to operate.

It is contended that the principle of Christianity is such that the understanding of it is not confined to any aristocracy of talent, though the detailed exposition and the defence of the same against organised attack must always be the privilege of the devoted few, whose lives are spent in the service of that power to Whose Majesty they bow while resting calmly in the certainty of His love. There are, however, certain points of general interest, though falling within the metaphysical and theological limits, which may require exposition at the hands of men, who, though neither professed metaphysicians nor profound theologians, may yet, from their training, reading, and method of study, be better suited to handle mixed questions than the more recognised experts.

The English language has concealed within itself the materials for most admirably illustrating the theory of correspondence, in rational terms, through the multiple significance of its words; and this, which may appear the result of accident and adaptation from expediency owes its existence in reality to that instinctive analogical faculty of the human mind which so often, and notably in the case of females, takes the place of a more systematic analysis. This is well illustrated in the case of the word person. The Latin word persona, a mask, from which our English word is at once derived, indicates that the significance of external and its relative internal, evident and its relative concealed, objective with its relative subjective, exoteric with its relative esoteric, are all included in the ideas which, from association and analogy, are suggested by the use of that thing, the mere name of which in time became appropriated in a primary sense to the body of a man, and in a secondary sense to the oneness and individuality of the thinker himself; who was thus prepared to accord to it a tertiary significance by the acknowledgment of a similar and distinct thinking principle or individuality in the case of any man to whose body or mask the word, in its primary significance, was accorded. I have purposely chosen this view of exposition since, even if it be not altogether in accordance with the historical order of the changes which the word has undergone, yet it is that which is demanded by the analysis of the intellectual powers when the formal laws of their operation are presented under a mathematical form, as will be afterwards shewn to be the case. It is not necessary that the logical significance of the term person or man should have been presented, step by step, in the education of the race, to establish the truth and value of the distinctions above mentioned; for development comes first and analysis afterwards, in order of time, and truth requires no apology so long as there is no confusion. There is no doubt that in the order of time, as in the ordinary language of everyday life, the terms man and person are synonymous even when used by the individual in speaking of himself. Thus, in the sentence "Stand up; I myself also am a man," no special analytical significance is intended to be conveyed by the words "I myself"; for St. Peter simply contrasts his bodily configuration with that of Cornelius, who had thrown himself down before him, at the same time that he reads him a lesson upon the equality of all men in the sight of God. We may, therefore, say that the word man, and the word person, outside the limits of rigid speech, are synonymous. This is confirmed by the common usage, which does not permit us to consider an imbecile to be a man in the full and general acceptance of the term; or again, when it feels very chary in applying either the term man or the term person to that which shews fair grounds to be regarded as a disembodied spirit or active intelligence. Once, however, within the limits of exact science, there must be no doubt as to the significance in which the term man or person is to be used. The practical definition of the word person is that of a single thinking being who uses an organism to express otherwise hidden changes to all beings similarly constituted under the same laws of existence. It is quite evident that if we are not content with this definition, and demand a further definition of the terms, organism, expression, constitution, and laws of nature, that we are not prepared to accept plain language which reasonable men can understand for our proximate definitions; and that we risk breaking up our definite conceptions into pieces, by demanding a description of the component parts in language which compels us to use terms of such an order of minuteness that we are in danger of losing sight of the original integration altogether. I do not say that we ought to stop short of that which will fully satisfy our wants; but I do say that in considering abstruse subjects we must follow the rule of expediency, and in our limited condition make the best practical use of our faculties, leaving to a future time those refinements of distinction which we cannot separately appreciate, and which after all may be practically valueless. Views which are true, and hypotheses which are sufficiently exact to meet facts, and group them with facts of a higher order, are found to fit together by an agglutinative power of their own, so that the harmony of the whole is the final test to which they conform, and which, if found to be satisfactory, is sufficient to cover all minute and less scrutable verification; the human intellect by its own inner light absolving itself from all minor faults of omission.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

SIR,—Some persons have a strange passion for superseding old and universally understood names by new ones. Thus the late Serjeant Cox wished to re-christen the "Spiritualist" Society, and to call it the "Pneumatological" Society, and this without a shadow of reason—for the new name has the same sense etymologically, and only exchanges a familiar and popular word for one which sounds dry, foreign and pedantic.

And now Dr. Wyld proposes to "designate clairvoyance as the Auto-Noetic,—that is, independent or self-knowing action of the mind." In so doing he strangely overlooks the fact that the new name absolutely ignores the very essence of the faculty, nay, the faculty itself—which is seeing. He forgets the seeing part and repeats the blunder of "Hamlet" without the Danish Prince. Now Clairvoyance is a beautiful, resonant and familiar word, which has made the tour of the world, and is incorporated in all languages.

It comes as near to the sense as it is possible to do—clear-seeing—i.e., the soul seeing by its own innate power, its vision not dimmed or obscured by the intervention of the bodily organ. Pray let us leave well alone.

G. D. HAUGHTON.

MISS WOOD'S SEANCES.—An esteemed correspondent at Newcastle, writes:—"We had our last sitting with Miss Wood, previous to her departure for London, on Friday last. We had an excellent seance (in the light, and medium in full view of the circle); we measured the distance and found that she sat a clear 2ft. 3in. from the curtain, whilst the form was about 4ft. from her. I hope you may get as good results; there is no doubt that the Peterborough affair gave her mediumship a shock from which she is only slowly recovering."

SUCCESSFUL SEANCES WITH MISS WOOD.

I am glad to say that the opportunity is afforded me of recording two more eminently successful seances with Miss Wood. In fact, the most conclusive that have been held during the whole course we have just concluded are these last two. As in the previous seances, we took every precaution to pursue our investigations in such a manner as to preclude the possibility of even the appearance of fraud. The cabinet was arranged, as before, in the corner of the room near the fire-place, and the medium's chair was placed in front of the centre of the cabinet, with the back directly opposite the chandelier, one jet of which was used, with a light brown paper cover placed over its globe to mellow down the light. After all our arrangements had been made, Miss Wood was brought into the room, and in our presence covering herself with a white jacket, provided for her, with a white antimacassar on her head, she took her seat, at a distance of two feet from the cabinet.

On Tuesday evening, March 27th, we held our thirteenth seance with Miss Wood, under the above conditions, the light being good, and every movement of the medium visible. We sang and conversed with each other for some time, chatted with Poeha, and had a few tunes played on the violin by one of the sitters. In the space of about one hour or a little over, we had the pleasure of seeing the chair that we had placed against the wall at the right of the cabinet with a bell and tube on it, dragged quickly into the cabinet and in a short time heard the bell ring from within. This was soon afterwards followed by a dusky white form protruding itself from the right aperture of the cabinet and standing forward to within about a foot of the left of the medium. After making several motions backwards and forwards, the medium all the while being perfectly motionless and quite easily visible, the form disappeared behind the curtains, to re-appear in a little while at the left aperture of the cabinet, standing clearly visible at a distance of about two feet from Miss Wood, who lay back in the chair as perfectly motionless as when the form appeared at first.

Our fourteenth and final seance held on the evening of March 30th, was, in every respect, the most conclusive we have had. The arrangements were the same as at the previous sitting in every particular, save that we had more light than on any prior occasion, and Miss Wood sat a little farther from the cabinet, the distance being 2ft. 3in. from the nearest point of the curtains to her knees. We sat for about one hour and three-quarters, singing, having tunes on the violin, and conversing. We had begun to despair of success, when it was suggested that we should all change seats, so that the conditions might be altered, and possibly improved. We did so, and strange to say, in the space of about a minute, the chair at the side of the cabinet was visibly dragged from view, and lustily knocked about the inside of the cabinet. Soon afterwards a clearly defined white form presented itself at the right of the cabinet and stood forth, distinctly detached from Miss Wood, and at a distance from her of about a foot and a-half. Two or three times it retired behind the curtains and re-appeared. Afterwards it presented itself at the opposite or left aperture of the cabinet, and moved from the curtains to within two feet of the end sitter at the right of the circle, leaving a clearly visible space of about two feet between itself and the medium, who lay in an apparently exhausted position with her head thrown back on the chair, her whole person being perfectly motionless. This last form struggled forth from the cabinet several times and finally disappeared. When the seance was concluded we found Miss Wood seated as we had placed her, and at the same distance from the curtain as at the commencement.

During this course of seance we have had several sitters who never before came in contact with this phenomenon, all of whom have expressed themselves as thoroughly mystified, or highly satisfied with the genuineness of what they have experienced.

Probably I may not be out of place in making a few suggestions as to what I have experienced as the best method to adopt in procuring the best results in regard to these phenomena. The light must always be directly behind the medium so that it cannot possibly fall directly upon any part of her face, and it should be so shaded as to give a dusky hue to the room. By this means a really better light can be got than by a naked light, when turned down to suit the manifestations; those with physical mediumistic tendencies should be placed at the ends of the circle, and a number of strongly positive persons should not be allowed to sit next each other in the circle. Singing and pleasant conversation will assist the phenomena materially, but disputations and an over anxiousness will militate against them.

HENRY BURTON.

P.S.—I sincerely hope that in the forthcoming seances with Miss Wood in London as complete a success may be obtained as with us at Newcastle. Certainly she is with old friends down here, which must tend to make her feel more comfortable and secure than anywhere else. However, with good conditions, I have no doubt the results will be equally as favourable. I sincerely hope they will be more so.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

"The Banner of Light."

Our Boston friends were (at the time of issue) making extensive preparations for a "grand celebration of the thirty-fifth anniversary of the advent of modern Spiritualism." It is right and helpful to meet at intervals in sympathy and to gather force. A Mr. Seybert for a number of years before his death, which took place on March 3rd, 1883, was interested in Spiritualism, and, while recognising the fact, he held that its phenomena merited the closest investigation in order to prove the truth or falsity of their claims. In giving to the University of Pennsylvania the sum of 60,000 dols. for the endowment of the chair of mental and moral philosophy, he stipulated, therefore, that an impartial investigation should be made of modern Spiritualism, as well as of other systems assuming to represent the truth. Mr. Seybert is, we believe, the first who has endeavoured in such a way to benefit Spiritualism, and his liberality is all the more creditable inasmuch as he does not appear to have been an avowed believer. Mem.—If any wealthy professing Spiritualist desires to follow suit we shall be very happy to forward post free on application the requisite forms. We notice the Banner is just entering on its fifty-third volume; may its shadow never grow less. At a fact meeting held in Boston, Mr. John Wetherbee related an incident of how a young man dying under the influence of strong drink made his presence known through a medium before any person present was conscious of his death, "thereby," says Mr. Wetherbee, "proving the phenomena to be beyond the scope of mind-reading." We have several times observed indications of a misunderstanding on the part of our transatlantic friends with regard to thought-reading, and it may not be out of place to offer a word of explanation. They apparently think this theory is put forward as an explanation to cover the whole of the ground. That is not so. While it is contended that it explains some of the phenomena which have hitherto been attributed to disembodied human beings, yet it is clearly admitted there are facts to which this explanation does not apply.

"The Medium and Daybreak."

Two numbers of this periodical lie before us. Mr. Burns, in "A Few Last Words," announces his intention of retiring from public Spiritualism. Every worker the less is so much loss, and we feel sure, however one may have differed as to details with Mr. Burns, that all will regret his decision, if for no other reason, on account of the excellent pioneer work of the past. The Ven. Archdeacon Colley's sermon entitled "The Brazen Serpent, or Evil its own Cure" has a true ring about it. Mr. Colley inculcates in forcible words the necessity of self-sacrifice—the crucifixion of the baser faculties of our mortal nature. A.T.T.P.'s control this time treats of "The Changes Coming Upon the Earth." The more we read these papers the more we are puzzled. Whatever their origin, however, they certainly contain much sound truth suitable for these times. This instalment especially is well worth reading.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON &amp; THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL, 14, NEWMAN STREET, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

It will perhaps be convenient to introduce the usual form of report of the lecture, delivered at this hall on Sunday last, by a repetition of the inquiry which, as a quotation, served the controls of Mr. Morse for opening their subject:—"Watchman, what of the night?"—the reply being the title of their address, "Day cometh."

Every reformer thinks of this contingency as the certain result of the success of his first scheme, and is mercifully fed by his hopes until he perceives that only a pile of ashes remain to represent his burning desires, whereupon, instead of analysing causes, he fondles the other extreme of his emotional nature, becomes cold-hearted, and a pronounced cynic. All efforts for the amelioration of the surroundings of life achieve some good, however, and when the mass of apparent refuse, suggestive only of a large number of more or less abortive projects, is got together, here a little and there a little, it is found that quite a respectable advance has been made after all. If, nevertheless, instead of a boundless ambition, directed to the reform of the world all round, these ardent souls would limit their operations to some particular purpose, progress would be accelerated, inspiration drawn for fresh exertion, and days which are desperately dark and direfully sad would be gradually lengthened and cheered, until a fulness of brightness, in excess of our wildest dreams, would be reached for humanity, whose course shall certainly be as from the night to day, from the winter of discontent to the spring-time of happiness, and thence to the summer of perfected glory.

Our attention was then directed specially to four epochs in the world's history, when truly, although to the apprehension of mankind imperfectly, it might have been justly said "Day cometh." The first voice of response to the watchman, thus indicated, was that of Jesus of Nazareth; the second, that of Martin Luther; the third, that of Thomas Paine; the fourth, Modern Spiritualism.

When a foul accretion of wrong and superstition was fastening upon the vitals of the Roman Empire, and threatening to suffocate her people, the watchman would have hesitated to say "Day cometh," and yet a voice of heavenly quality was presently heard which, sadly misunderstood as it has been—for "men have ever played the fool with truth"—asserted even then a nearer kinship between man and his God; and the voice yet lives, although the glory of the Roman Empire and the splendour of the Jewish nation have alike departed. The day came, and the life and times of Jesus laid the foundation for a new spiritual departure, which—unaffected by the fact that so-called Christianity has since carved and fretted and painted and gilded itself into a spiritual masquerade, has eaten and got fat, and, truth to say, a trifle lazy—we claim as an epoch in the world's history. There is a tendency to misjudge our utterances about the man Christ Jesus; but if we protest against the abuses and errors of a sacerdotal and corrupted system, it is precisely because we know that the life of Jesus, its nominal founder, has never yet, in its supreme beauty, been fairly judged and righteously applied.

A certain range of these errors and abuses culminated, as you know, some hundreds of years ago, in such an excess of worldliness and so conspicuous an absence of spirituality that another voice was needed. To claim liberty of conscience then was attended by the risk of violent death and of tortures worse than death; but the needful courage was not lacking when, amid much imperfection, the determined Martin Luther established a new departure, and Rome trembled while the world was in a measure liberated. Both of these voices thundered, "Day cometh!" both deserve honourable mention from this platform.

Another interval, during which the tyranny and associated corruption of the dominant classes wrought such widespread mischief and wrong, in the political and social departments of life, that from the thick smoke of two revolutions—the "Stars and Stripes" and the "Tricolor"—another voice was vehemently called for. This time, 100 years ago or thereabouts, the response came pleading for right and justice on behalf of injured peoples, insisting upon the "rights of man"—"To be; to be happy; and to be the cause of happiness to his fellows." The voice was heard amid vituperation from all parties, on two continents, demanding now mercy for the King of France, and again, across the Atlantic, justice for an oppressed people. Whose was this voice? Ordinarily the political martyrs of today are the great and pure-minded statesmen of to-morrow, to whose memory we build costly monuments; but this man whose life and action were devoted to the redress of wrongs of the first magnitude, is still so far misunderstood that the political, intellectual, and religious influence of his voice is only now growing. The voice was that of Thomas Paine, a man of discriminating criticism, who rejected nothing that was good, who was neither atheist nor infidel, whose chief ambition was to rid the world of forms of superstition which were holding men's very souls in bondage. Of this man it may be truly said, "The world was his country; to do good, his religion," and these characteristics are the natural expression or outcome of an honest mind.

Presently, when the world had grown absolutely deaf to the late-life music of the angel spheres, and neither prelate nor clodhopper could speak to the character of the next stage of existence, if any; when the prevailing tendency was towards doubt and dread and definite infidelity, another voice was needed and it came. And yet it was scarcely a voice, for the spirit of the murdered pedlar, hovering in the small township of Hydesville, in the State of New York, came—as it were yesterday, remember, thirty-five years ago—rapping, and again rapping on the wall, until, as you well know, the interpretation, as of old, from the mouths of babes and sucklings, came also, and the ecclesiastical negotiations of the day were relegated to the burial ground of the huckster's wares. Then was proclaimed the assurance of immortality, and a progress which has since gladdened the hearts of millions, and is preached to you Spiritualists to-day.

But is this the full and perfect day for which we are looking and waiting? Unhappily, no, not yet. When you make of your Spiritualism an eclecticism comprehensive enough, broad enough, high enough, deep enough, to embrace the development, destiny and progress of the whole human race in every department of life, then only will the day truly come. So long as you maintain a sectional Spiritualism you do injustice to your cause, and it will fail of its full and due results. You must have variety in thought, in action, in development, and that must be sufficiently comprehensive to embrace, upon a common base, every legitimate interest. Begin, we advise you, with the health of the community. If your labour is not to run to seed you must heed physical conditions, for they affect not merely the health of the body but are needful for the growth of the mind, and the outpouring of soul, blending with, and materially influencing, in fact, the whole being, moral, spiritual, and intellectual. Your Spiritualism must be of that robust character which shall persistently oppose wrong everywhere, regardless of consequences to yourselves, for the day cometh only when health of body, soundness of mind, and purity of morals combine, when men shall be ashamed even to think a lie, remembering too that the coming of such a day—of the day—is hastened by every good deed done, by every true and earnest life.

The peroration of this lecture—itsself the last of the series covered by the first term of the Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum—was exceptionally moving. These eloquent controls spoke of their grandly-finished utterances, and comprehensive and righteous teaching of the past eleven weeks, as of a simple endeavour to reach our heads and hearts, and generously commended those whom they were pleased to call the "earnest men and women" who are loyally trying to second their efforts. They are prepared, they added, to continue the work, and will do so without one day's interruption, asking only for the renewed and regular attendance of all who have heard them, and such a measure of active sympathy as shall constrain everyone, individually, to sustained exertion to persuade others to attend also.

S. B.

Sunday next will be devoted to "Question and Answer," and the meeting will be held at St. Andrew's Hall, 14, Newman-street, Oxford-street, W. Other particulars are given in the advertisement on the first page.

BRADFORD.

LECTURES BY MRS. BRITTEN.

On Sunday, the 25th ult., Mrs. E. H. Britten visited Bradford, and addressed crowded and enthusiastic meetings in the Mechanics' Institute. The discourse in the afternoon was devoted to the elucidation of the topic "The God of Men, and the God of Spirits: or, are all men immortal?" which was listened to with rapt attention.

At the evening meeting Mrs. Britten invited the audience to send up topics for her to deal with, and it was decided that the best way to deal with these would be for six gentlemen, to be chosen from the audience, to select six out of the number, which were as follows:—

"Did God make Adam, and set him in the Garden of Eden and give him all the luxuries of life, and then set a trap for his downfall?"

"Redemption."

"Can anything be proved to exist outside and beyond Matter, Force, and Law?"

"If they hear not Moses and the Prophets neither will they believe, though one rose from the dead."

"In the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils."

"The Spiritualists say the Cross is of more ancient origin than the Christian religion. If so, kindly explain its meaning and its origin?"

On the following evening, Monday, 26th ult., Mrs. Britten again lectured at the above place upon "What new thing has Spiritualism taught? What good has it done?" and again the audience listened to a brilliant oration, which was followed by replies to numerous questions. The meetings proved a great success, and were evidently full of interest to all present.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—Mr. E. W. Wallis, of Nottingham, to the delight of many of the friends at Newcastle and Gateshead, after absenting himself for some time from the North, once more made his appearance on the N.E.S. platform last Sunday. In the morning he discoursed on spiritual gifts and how best to develop them, and handled the subject in a thoroughly practical way. In the evening his subject was "A Religion for Humanity." The discourses were listened to by large and appreciative audiences. Mr. H. A. Kersey occupied the chair. On the Monday evening Mr. Wallis again lectured to a fair company, and gave a most effective address, entitled, "The Message of Spiritualists to the World." Mr. Thompson officiated as chairman.

GATESHEAD.—Last Sunday evening Mr. Henry Burton gave an admirable lecture to the friends of the G.S.E.S. upon "Crucified Saviours, and the Lesson to be derived from them." Mr. Sheppard occupied the chair.

ASHINGTON.—Our good friends at this place had a visit from Mr. W. H. Robinson on Sunday last, when he lectured to them on "Spiritualism: Its Theories and its Facts."

NORTH SHIELDS.—On Sunday Mr. Gardiner, of Sunderland, lectured before the society at that place on Shakespeare and the Bible. The address was highly appreciated. Mr. Appellby occupied the chair. On Easter Monday the annual tea and entertainment took place, when upwards of 100 persons sat down to a comfortable repast. At the subsequent meeting several of the ladies and gentlemen present gave songs and readings, which were much appreciated and afforded considerable pleasure to the company present. On Tuesday evening, March 29th, the members held their annual meeting. The annual report shewed that the society was in a very healthy condition, the funds shewing a balance in hand of £4 6s. 11½d. The officers for the ensuing year are as follows: President, Mr. Henry Appellby. Vice-Presidents, Mr. T. M. Burnside, Mr. J. G. Welch, and Mr. M. Keller. Secretaries, Mr. J. G. Welch, 64, Norfolk-street, North Shields, and Mr. J. Eskdale. Treasurer, Mr. J. Barker. Librarian, Mr. T. Patterson. Committee, Messrs. Crawford, Eskdale, Little and Miller.

NORTHUMBRIA.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We cannot guarantee the insertion in the current issue of letters arriving at our office later than Monday morning.

He thinks there is much evidence, but he desiderates more investigation :

"Time and opportunity do so utterly fail us for the prosecution of such research, but I beseech any lady or gentleman to whom the chance may occur to investigate the point, and, if the experiments succeed, to favour me with an invitation to their repetition. In a somewhat cloudy way I seem to fancy that considerable issues hang on the simple question whether any effort of anybody's volition ever did, or ever could, make a cedar pencil move six inches on a table. Proof of such occurrence would bring, at once and for ever, mind and will into the category of Correlated Physical Forces. It would abolish the distinction between the natural and the supernatural, between physics and metaphysics ; it would make miracle a thing to be regarded with complacency and intelligence, rather than with amazement or repugnance ; it would extend knowledge and strengthen faith, by supplying a key to many a doubt and mystery ; it would hasten on what, of course, is only postponed by our own ignorance, the reconciliation of science with revelation, and link together wondrously the past, the present, and the future."

Dr. Monckton should join the Society for Psychical Research, if he has not already done so. It is doing precisely what he wants.

I should be much obliged to any of my numerous correspondents who would put me in the way of securing complete sets of the earliest Spiritualist publications in this country. Perhaps some have duplicates that they might be willing to dispose of. The Spiritual Telegraph or any that preceded the Spiritual Magazine would be welcome. If any correspondents who have such sets will communicate with me at the office of "LIGHT" I shall be obliged.

M.A. (Oxon.)

We have often referred to the anomalous yoking together of Spiritualists and Materialists at the Antipodes. It is not surprising, therefore, to find that these opposing camps do not always work amicably together. There is only one way in which the lion and the lamb can lie down with each other, and the lamb does not by any means get the best of the arrangement.

THE PROGRESS OF SPIRITUALISM IN AMERICA.—Dr. Crowell, in the course of a letter, thus describes the state of Spiritualism in the United States :—"I am happy to say that Spiritualism is making steady and even rapid progress in this country amongst our best classes, and the influence of this increasing element is shown particularly in the retirement of the noisy, vulgar element which has been but too prominent in our ranks for many years past. I feel assured that our cause has passed through the darkest period of its existence, and that the immediate, like the remote future, is wonderfully promising."

"KNOWLEDGE" ON PLANCHETTE WRITING.—The correspondence on this topic is continued in Knowledge for March 30th. "M. A. B." relates:—"Some years ago I experimented for months with a Planchette, and in other ways endeavoured to convince myself of the truth of certain physiological facts that had given rise to the theory of Spiritualism. I was so circumstanced that the want of all interest in those I was associated with, amounting, in fact, to opposition, caused me reluctantly to give up all further investigation, and to cease all argument with those whose minds are so constituted that, as De Morgan says, they 'infer imposture from the assumed impossibility of the phenomena asserted, and then allege imposture against the examination of the evidence.' The 'Planchette' proper is, as its name implies, a little board of thin wood, heart-shaped, and mounted on three tiny brass castors that move easily in every direction. At the pointed end of the board, which is turned away from the operator, is a hole through which a pencil is fixed. The hand is placed lightly on the Planchette, that in a short time runs about making wild flourishes all over the sheet of paper placed under it, and in some hands quickly settles down into steady writing. Its own light weight can hardly be considered, and the easy castors make the frictional resistance almost nominal. I can assert with confidence that under the hand of an honest experimenter, the pressure exerts no influence in forcing the Planchette in any particular direction ; on the contrary, when fairly imbued with whatever force may move it, the thing rushes about in directions quite uncontrolled and unexpected by the person whose hand is on it." The editor of Knowledge, Mr. R. Proctor, in a note, seems to attribute any movement of the instrument to conscious or unconscious fraud, because he finds "no tendency whatever on the Planchette's part—under my(his) hands only, or in company with another pair of hands—to anything like movement caused unconsciously." Strange reasoning that for a "man of science." A certain class of phenomena have not come within Mr. Proctor's personal experience ; ergo they do not exist !

INSANITY BY THE LIGHT OF SPIRITUALISM.

The last report of the Société Scientifique d'Etudes Psychologiques of Paris contains a speech delivered by Dr. Chazarnin, at its anniversary banquet, with reference to the above subject, of which the following is an abstract :—

"Physicians are often consulted in disorders inexplicable by orthodox science. They characterise them as obscure nervous disorders, hysteria, hallucinations, illusions, &c.

"I had some knowledge six or eight years ago of a respected young mother of a family. Some months ago she began talking about seeing and hearing persons whom no one else saw or heard, in her apartments, in the street ; heard people talking to her without seeing the speakers ; saw lights at night in her chamber, about which, she said, objects moved ; heard noises, felt even her bed move, &c. Medical advice was sought ; and she was, in consequence, sent to St. Anne's Asylum as a lunatic. But her symptoms were not pronounced enough for that establishment, and after being there ten days the patient was restored to liberty, but not to freedom from the sights and sounds she complained of. Then she was induced to consult the eminent chief of the Salpêtrière Hospital, who put her under the action of bromide of potassium. This being of no effect he dismissed her to seek the advice of Dr. X., so great in disorders of the sense of hearing.

"Then she resolved upon coming to me. I viewed the case, under the light afforded by Spiritualism, as one of undeveloped mediumship, where there is often apparent disturbances of the faculties of sight and hearing. I explained in ten minutes my view to her, and for all treatment advised her to attend a well-ordered Spiritualist circle of my recommendation. There she happily received demonstration of the correctness of my view. She understands her condition now, and is a good medium.

"The practice of medicine cannot but draw great advantage from Spiritualism, as it has done from magnetism. Magnetism, at first repudiated by the faculty as charlatanism, is now being studied by it, and is found to furnish an additional means of curing disease. Spiritualism is, in one of its divisions, a special magnetism, the magnetism of invisibles. All mediums tell you that they are magnetised by spirits. Spiritualism, like magnetism, will command respectful attention as soon as its phenomena, together with their analogy to those of magnetism, are recognised. If the existence of spirit is admitted, then one must also admit the existence of an envelope to it and organs ; for without these it could not act, could not reveal itself to us ; could not be, or would, to us, be as if it did not exist. Electricity manifests itself to us as force, light, or heat, only by means of apparatus, which are organs to it, whether from the hand of man or furnished by nature.

"The spirits' envelope being fluidic, of rarefied matter, can only become visible to us by the condensation or materialisation of its constituent substance. To this condensation there are obstacles. One of these is light.

"We know how effective a current of electricity is in precipitating certain salts from their solutions, and also in transforming hydrogen and oxygen into water. We have to believe in the potency of light. And we have to admit that the vital electricity or the magnetic fluid of certain mediums and a circle, furnish the force to the invisibles required by them for condensing or materialising their envelope, to render it visible and tangible to us.

"And if the spirit has a fluidic body and organs, why should it not act as well upon a sensitive, a medium, as a magnetiser acts upon a somnambule.

"A magnetiser can, once he has put his subject into the magnetic sleep, deprive him of sensation, catalepsy him, annul his will, transfer his own active will to him, and use his brain as if it were the operator's own.

"Orthodox science of the present day is receiving—for in all the Paris hospitals magnetism is now more or less studied—proofs of the possibility of spiritual phenomena. It must soon see that its next duty is to study these. Let physicians do this without prejudice, merely conforming to the conditions required for their production, and they cannot fail to be convinced that they are real, and that there is an intelligent cause behind them—disembodied spirit, and that such spirits act by their particular, special magnetism upon mediums ; can communicate through them with us ; and can shew themselves to us.

"These are not miracles. They are phenomena belonging to a science as old as the world ; but a science which has not hitherto been studied with the strict experimentation required to enable us to come to a knowledge of all its laws."

LIFE PROLONGED UNDER MAGNETIC ACTION.

Under the above heading the Revue Spirite quotes the following remarkable case from a recent report to the Belgian Academy of Medicine, by Dr. Warlomont :—

"Madame X., aged forty, had for some years been suffering from Staphyloma, a disease of the eyes, which rendered her blind. The constant pain accompanying it deprived her of sleep. She had no appetite, and whatever food she was induced to take was rejected by the stomach. She was quite emaciated. Her friends seeing her thus sinking obtained the attendance at last of an eminent English physician (Dr. C.), practising at Brussels.

"On one of his visits, this physician, who had in his student days witnessed some treatment by mesmerism, finding her sufferings unusually intense, bethought him of trying the soothing effect of the almost-forgotten mesmeric passes. He made some ; the pains abated ; he continued them and she soon went into the somnambule sleep. Recognising the condition as one that he had witnessed long ago, Dr. C. asked her if she could now take some food. She replied in the affirmative. She ate and drank well. The stomach being quiet, Dr. C. made reverse passes, and she returned to her ordinary state. She had no knowledge of having eaten. The pains of the malady soon returned, but the food remained and was normally digested.

"To keep the patient up was Dr. C.'s solicitude, so he visited her twice a day to magnetise her into that condition in which she could receive and retain nourishment. She proved so susceptible that to induce the second condition, as Dr. Warlomont calls it, all that Dr. C. had to do was to take her hand into his, and will her to pass into the somnambule sleep. She having taken her meal, it was equally facile for him to recall her into her ordinary condition.

"This was done for two years and a-half, when she succumbed to the malady."

So much for Dr. Warlomont's report. Seeing the patient's quick reaction to magnetism, so far as it was used, it gives one pain that Dr. C. was not better instructed in the subject. If he had been he would have sought to obtain from the patient while in the somnambule state, indications for the treatment of her malady, and we might then have had a record of her return to health, instead of a prolonged deliverance from painful disease.

J. D.

Dr. J. M. Peebles announces his intention of shortly making another visit to England to see his old friends again.

Dr. Berks T. Hutchinson, well-known to many of our readers as a prominent Spiritualist at Cape Town, has invented an improved railway carriage for colonial use.

BOUND VOLUMES OF "LIGHT."—A few volumes of last year's issue of "LIGHT," neatly bound in half-cloth, can be obtained at our office. The price is fifteen shillings per volume.

BOOKS RECEIVED.—"William Fletcher : Clairvoyant," by S. E. Gay.—"The Religion of the Future ; or, The Higher Law of Truth and Right," by Hugh Junor Browne.—"The Battle Ground of the Spiritual Reformation," by S. B. Brittain, M.D.

The members and friends of the Dalton Association held a soirée at their rooms, on Thursday, the 5th inst., to celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of modern Spiritualism. There was a good attendance, and an excellent programme. A carpet dance closed the proceedings.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY AND MATERIALISTIC IDEAS.—Rightly or wrongly, medical men, as a class, are generally supposed to lean somewhat to a materialistic view of things. Be this as it may, such a charge cannot be made against the Lancet, a well-known and popular exponent of medical science. It is, we believe, one of the few journals, if not the only one of its class, which recognises the existence of a spiritual principle in man. Speaking recently of the "dislike of doctors" which exists in some quarters, it said in part, doubtless, this feeling may arise from the recognition that "doctors" stand very much in the same relation to the body and mind as the minister of religion occupies towards the conscience. "A medical man lifts up the veil and sees the psycho-physical being behind it. Probably in a certain proportion of instances the sense of being known is not pleasant. The feeling that a fellow-mortals possesses a deep insight into the actual condition of the organism, and is able to form a clear and approximately full and accurate estimate of the character, may, in some instances, be disquieting, while in others it engenders that sort of self-consciousness on the part of the patient which is experienced by devout penitents in the presence of their confessors—a feeling of mingled trust and anxiety, of satisfaction and regret. We cannot believe that any other form of 'dislike of doctors' than that many-phased feeling to which we have alluded can prevail. The medical adviser is, or ought to be, the best known and the most sincerely trusted of all the friends of his patient. His friendship should be even more thoroughly a sentiment of the inner life than any other. It is in this light the lay public should view their family doctors, and in this esteem the practitioner should aim to be held."

PERSONALITY AND THE UNIVERSAL MIND

I have aimed at presenting the idea of person as involving that of substance, and I have a subjective conviction that it is only from the standpoint of substance that real value and significance can be attached to the personality of another. Each holds his own personality secure from all assaults, unless he is willing to betray his trust ; but it is not so as regards that of another. The personality of one man is not presented as such to that of another, and this being acknowledged it is contended by the adversary that since there is nothing substantial in the case of my neighbour there is therefore nothing substantial in the case of myself ; since his outward appearance and my outward appearance would be found to be identical at the utmost minuteness of dissection. The voluntary surrender of the fortress of substance through pride or timidity is that which gives to the argument of the adversary its irresistible power ; pride which derives intellectual satisfaction from the reduction of the world to a formula, and timidity which fears to grasp the rights which devolve upon man by virtue of his immediate kinship with the Creative God. There is no escape from the situation ; man is in substantial unity with God, or there is no God whom man can understand, or who can ever be understood, as long as man is man. This doctrine is not new : Jesus proclaimed the substantial oneness with the Father, and creeds or councils cannot destroy the innate simplicity of the doctrine, much as they have endeavoured to do so with the assistance of their theological metaphysics manufactured for the purpose. Berkeley proclaimed that the Deity, the Author of Nature, conversed with man through the medium of a language, which is the visible universe obedient to its laws of space and motion, and here too the substantial oneness refuses to permit itself to be obliterated ; for that which is the transient thought and image of the permanent with man in time is the truth of God in substance, the archetypal verity of the real, the organised and the useful. Thus when man looks upon Nature he can justly say, All this is ours ; His through creation, mine through inheritance, through adaptation of means to ends. Nor is it at all necessary that that process of Creation, that substantial evolution, should be pictured step by step ; the idea involves an absurdity.

We require and we possess working formulae which, when understood, can lead to no harm ; for the Creator cannot be expelled from His universe as long as man asserts his right to interpret the principle of relativity to the greater glory of God.

Again, I repeat it is the argument from common sense, patent to all, that is most powerful in proving the absolute necessity of a belief of God in Nature. Let man once understand that he has no right to allow a personality to his neighbour except from the standpoint of substance, and he will at once adopt substance with all its consequences ; for man believes in his neighbour as much as in himself. He believes that the world is common property and his common sense will scatter any scientific teaching to the winds of heaven which says him nay. And when his neighbour's body (not his neighbour's substance) shews signs of disturbance he will be prepared to study its changes objectively as phenomenal, and he will be prepared to account for changes in that phenomenal consciousness which lies no deeper than that appearance which to the observer is the motion of ultimate parts of the material organism, the interpretation of which motions into the universal language comes naturally to him with an unclouded consciousness.

Let me not be misunderstood : there are certain disturbances which are always being translated into conscious terms, even the weird and the strange ; but again there are other disturbances which require the eye of another to render them into the same language and to estimate their value. It is a matter of fact that that which can be put into the language which is common to all, i.e., that of the external senses, space and motion, is less likely to be mistranslated than that which is confined to the subjective life of one individual, who is by hypothesis in a sensitive or hyperæsthetic state, and who, therefore, being deprived of his highest standard of comparison, the undisturbed nervous system, is the more likely to lend himself to an influence which he cannot truly estimate and to set a greater value upon the deliverances of a consciousness which is the resultant of a nervous system influenced ab extra, than are those observers, who, taking those bodily changes from their objective side and giving them their purely universal value, attempt to draw from them, as natural data, the materials for the construction of a general theory of nervous disturbances under such influence as that hinted at. The personality, being signified by the man's body when it conforms to general law so as to be instrumental to the action of a general language, is given to his neighbours only in the permanence of that correspondence; so that when an interference is observed in the natural correspondence a reservation must hold during the investigation of the special case.

The light of the permanent in Nature is steadier than that of the fleeting and ephemeral, however true the latter may be. It is far beyond the range of ordinary probabilities that the great movement in favour of the study of individual psychological experiences of the extraordinary, with the view to their unification into a system, forms a part of the spiritual evolution by which the Spirit of God in Nature has ascended, as it appears to our darkened vision, through the lower stages of human civilisation to identify itself with that of man in his present advanced state, carrying man with it and elevating him from the animal and natural to the spiritual and angelic condition; but it is no less true a fact that this silent work has been accomplished not by the spasmodic convictions of isolated individuals that such is the case, but by the steady operation of general law. The latter is for the race, the former for the individual, who has ever failed to convince his brethren that he was right until long after his ashes were mingled with the dust. The individual is, no doubt, the sensitive being who yields to the pressure and interprets the coming changes wrought already by the world-spirit in the embryos lying prepared in the womb of time, but though the individual is the gainer, the race must wait for their deliverance at full time. And from the intellectual side of experience the growth of general formulae plays the part of the operation of general law on the physical. The individual has an experience and knows that he has it, feeling satisfied that he is correct in his judgment; but he fails to convince his neighbours of his truth or of the value of his discovery. Why? They do not and cannot share in his personality; there is as yet no principle of identification between individuals, no medium of communication, as it were, between these islands of substance, the personality of individuals. The language which unites minds has yet to be constructed: this is no more than the reduction of the newly discovered fact or the new inspiration to the terms of a general formula which proclaims its universality and the manner of it. Then, and not till then, personality becomes fluent, and men run together and think with one mind. But in the meantime they all work to keep the currents seething and moving in that mother of truth out of which will crystallise in due season the formed ideas ready prepared for adoption by the religious and scientific instinct of the rising generation—the most important work in which man can be engaged.

The philosophy of obliteration has miserably failed in the task which it undertook, i.e., to demonstrate the utter futility of man's hopes of a condition of existence in which the laws of matter, such as we know it, no longer rule with an arbitrary power which defies alike the hopes of men and the power and love of a free creative agent in nature. That philosophy argued from inductions built upon the data of the undisturbed nervous system. While denying an absolute being and loudly asserting the dominance of the principle of the relativity of knowledge, it has stultified itself by accepting the fiat of the normally conditioned nervous system as absolute; being either too incredulous or too lazy or too ignorant to investigate the newly observed though ever present causes operating in the souls of men.

It was remarked above that granting the fact of the substantial relationship between God and man, we are not forced to realise the steps of the creative process whereby the universe has been evolved. The fact is, all such conceptions are crude, and relative to human capabilities. So simple a process as the relationship established between man and man has taxed our powers of investigation to their utmost limits. Where each unit proclaims itself to be person and substance the question of reconciliation of conflicting claims seems a matter of difficulty. If each proclaim himself to be the only begotten Son of God, one with the Father and Creator and co-equal with Him in the fact of His eternity and His divinity, where is the truth to be discovered except in the fact of the self-conscious personality, one substantial, and essential to the human race and only subject to the category of quantity when we count the heads before us and make the human race a noun of multitude?

Which of us has ever been outside of his personality, and which of us has ever felt himself cut off from God? The fact of personality is undistinguishable from that of the existence of God: the conscious moral self is the origin and term of the universe, and is the fact of creation to which all minor processes conform. Jesus Christ solved the problem of creation once and for ever for each and all of us; for the solution of the problem is the recognition of its truth. The plastic process which has exercised the imagination of cosmogonists in all ages is given from time to time in terms of the knowledge of the age it is a mere indication of the state at which the process has arrived in time during its progress towards a final consummation. It is only natural to suppose that in our age it should find its most exact expression, when the creature who is its exponent has his greatest command of nature and of symbolic methods for its interpretation.

We are one in God and God is one with us:—this is the last word of metaphysical science, up to which all the physical science of the day tends. We are hidden from each other only in so far as we are hidden from ourselves; and we can know one another only through the understanding of the significance of certain sensations which are our own and not another's. We are conditioned so that when we know, we know only symbolically, though when we act and while we live as we are so conditioned, we deal directly with substance and, acting as causes are agents in the production of results which as effect are the faithful and identical reproduction of the entire chain of causes. With that symbolic knowledge is given us the fact of the numerical destruction and isolation of the individual man, whereby the forms of the lower creation are used to minister to the Divine intention to multiply Himself indefinitely in the hearts of His superior creatures. The isolation conferred upon us with the fact of individuality does not reach deeper than the surface of nature; for so far as we may be united by means of the instrument placed in our hands by the Almighty, language, we are perfectly united, and further still in the unity of the sensuous apperception which gives from one plastic source many identical impressions. Though I perceive my neighbour in my field of view, and though I know that he at the same time perceives me each containing the other, yet I free myself from all fear of the objection that we have presented to our separate selves worlds which do not correspond, and which therefore may be to some extent out of joint, by the recognition of the fact that it is my own impression of my neighbour which I perceive, a substantial sign, which, so far as I am I, cannot deceive me. But if my neighbour should have a subjective experience different from mine under the same conditions, it is his substantial fact of experience which has not transferred itself into the external, formal, or symbolical expression, whereby it may become common property (for it is then our substantial experience), which permits us to feel differently under apparently the same conditions. It is possible, however, that his experience may be of such a nature as to be incommunicable to me; but if so it is from the impossibility of my bodily configuration in its minutest parts conforming to the configuration of his; for it is axiomatic in modern psychology that identity of organic conditions involves identity of functional outcome and vice versa. Man is thus truly cut off from his fellows in so far as he is in advance of them, or is actually deficient in his power of realising his own higher possibilities. The empirical knowledge of Self is similar to the only possible knowledge we can have of our neighbour, being given through the aid of language: for it would appear that even though processes of ratiocination take place below consciousness, it is still by means of the aggregation of symbols which stand for fixed ideas, on which ground we account for the perfectly formed conceptions that spring all alive into the mental field of the artist or geometer; while on the other hand the mind, pregnant with a new idea, in which life and truth are felt to throb, may be obliged to wait for years until a happy chance delivers that which already lives and is to the keeping of the empirical consciousness. Most of the great truths of existence have, in the form of allegory or parable, struggled to the light in this tentative manner.

SPIRITUALISM IN BOHEMIA.—The Daily News of April 4th said that in Bohemia Spiritualism is taking such alarming dimensions that the Bishop has caused a declaration to be made from the pulpits placing it on a par with heresy, and stating that whoever persists in it will be refused absolution after confession.

UNCONSCIOUS MEDIUMSHIP.

By F. J. Theobald.

In a short record of the life of Robert Annan (published, I believe, by the Christian Evidence Society), I met with the following incident. This eminently Christ-like young man was of poor parentage, and quite uneducated. On Wednesday, 24th July, 1867, just seven days before Robert Annan went home, he was standing upon a raft, and as he floated about he was suddenly visited with an extraordinary manifestation of God, to his soul. He had long ere this attained to close, habitual, and almost unbroken fellowship with his Great Redeemer. But now, he was brought so near, that for the time he knew not that he was in the body. The heavens seemed to open to his view. The glory of the Lord filled his soul with a radiance, well nigh insupportable. So near did Jesus come, that he felt as if he were talking to Him, face to face. So glorious did the Lord appear in His Majesty, that Robert bowed his head with awe; and yet, so ineffable was the love and condescension of that Peerless One, that His disciple was filled with a strange, overpowering joy. How long this lasted, he could hardly tell, but the shaking of the raft upon the water reminded him that he was still outside of heaven. Robert spoke of this to his Christian friends, and said "Jesus came to me on the water and I thought that I was home."

Near the very spot where this occurred, seven days afterwards, this young Christian met with an accident (by drowning), and passed on to his spirit home.

I now offer a deeply wonderful narrative copied from the preface to a book called "The Principles of the Hidden Life," by Dr. Upham, who is well-known in the American colleges as the author of many valuable standard works upon mental and moral science. This introduction is written by Mr. Pearsall Smith. He relates that during an interview he had with Dr. Upham shortly before he passed away, this friend told him that he had once experienced

A Spiritual Manifestation.

He then gives the account in Dr. Upham's own words as follows:—

"When I retired to rest, my mind was much occupied with the subject of personal holiness, which for some months had been exceedingly precious to me, and in connection with which I had been spiritually benefited in a high degree. I consecrated myself anew to God, and felt that I was His. In the night I awoke suddenly. I felt a distinct, peculiar, and somewhat powerful sensation, which I cannot better express than by calling it the breath of the Holy Spirit, pass rapidly through my system.

"It seemed to be a distinct agent; but had the tenuity, the quick and electric movement, and refining power of a purely spiritual being. The thought occurred to me that it might be from natural causes, so, as I was fatigued, again fell asleep. Again in the night, I awoke suddenly, and experienced precisely the same sensation only in a somewhat increased degree. Then I knew that the Lord was around my pillow. . . . I thought of rising from my bed, and engaging in acts of worship; but I knew not what to pray for, and it seemed best that I should wait the movements of the Lord: . . . and then I seemed to see upward, as it were, somewhere in the heavenly region, these memorable words written distinctly and brightly, "Thou art my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." . . . From that important moment I feel called in an especial manner to bear the full image of Christ. . . . I must, therefore, hide myself in Christ in the most solemn and abiding sense, being one with Him, and thus, one with God."

How interesting and wonderful it is, to observe the light that Spiritualism throws over many of the most inexplicable events of human life! The supernatural, instead of being called the "Dark Side of Nature," may, by the Spiritualist, rather be called its bright side! or the silver lining to the dark cloud of materiality which lies around us whilst in the body. Do not many of our dreams, even, become "Rifts in the Veil," and, must we not always be thankful to the loving Father, who, by His gift of mediumship, "Unconscious" though it be, grants to His frail children on earth, continual proof of the reality of an unseen universe and glimpses of the supernal world, which is as closely corresponding to, and connected with our spirit-life as the material surroundings of this world are with our bodies?

Thus, whilst the traditions or legends of olden times are clouded and mystical to the ordinary reader, who knows not of Spiritualism,—to the Spiritualist they are clothed in beauty, because, to him, it is given to interpret the symbolisms and understand the correspondences which lie hidden in them. The following spiritualistic incidents in connection with the life of Edward the Confessor, I take from Dean Stanley's most valuable work, "The Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey." This king, like so many people, was, unconsciously, a powerful medium, and thus placed en rapport with the spirit-world. What Dean Stanley calls

The Legend of the Seven Sleepers

occurred at Eastertide, about the year 1064, some few months before Edward was taken to the spirit-world. Whilst sitting in the midst of his courtiers, suddenly "he sank into a deep abstraction. Then came one of his curious laughs, and again, his rapt meditation"—i.e., his deep trance. "He retired to his chamber, followed by Duke Harold, the Archbishop, and the Abbot of Westminster.

"To them he confided his vision. He had seen the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus suddenly turn from their right sides to their left, and recognised in this omen the sign of war, famine, and pestilence for the coming seventy years, during which the sleepers were to lie in their new position. Upon hearing this vision, the courtiers sent messengers to Mount Celion, where they 'found the Seven Sleepers' as the king had seen them.

"The truth of this portent at once confirmed the king's prevision, and received its own confirmation in the violent convulsions which disturbed the close of the eleventh century."

The next instance is called the

"Legend of the Pilgrim,"

and is of especial interest.

Edward the Confessor had a peculiar veneration and affection for St. John, the "Apostle of Love," and was on his way to the dedication of the Chapel of St. John, when a beggar implored him, for the love of this saint, to bestow alms upon him. The almoner was not to be found. In the chest there was no gold or silver.

The king remained in silent thought, and then drew off from his hand a ring, "large, royal, and beautiful," which he gave to the beggar, who vanished.

Two English pilgrims, from the town of Ludlow, shortly afterwards found themselves benighted in Syria; suddenly the path was lighted up, and an old man, white and hoary, preceded by two tapers, accosted them.

They told him of their country and their saintly king, on which the old man, "joyously, like a clerk," guided them to a hostelry, announced that he was John the Evangelist, and special friend of Edward, gave them the ring to carry back, with the warning that in six months the king should be with him in Paradise.

The pilgrims returned. They found the king at his palace in Essex—said to be called from this incident "Havering atte Bower"—and with a church dedicated to St. John the Evangelist.

Edward acknowledged the ring, and prepared for his end accordingly.

A few short months passed on, and King Edward, worn out by the excitement attending the consecration of Westminster Abbey, sank into a deep stupor, and was laid in the chamber in Westminster Palace, which for long bore his name. "On the third day—the last day of the year 1065—a startling rally took place. His voice again sounded loud and clear; his face resumed its brightness." "A few incoherent sentences broke from his lips, describing how, in his trance, he had seen two holy monks whom he remarked in Normandy, and who foretold to him the coming disasters, which should only be ended when the 'green tree,' after severance from its trunk, and removal to the distance of three acres, should return to its parent stem, and again bear leaf, and fruit, and flower."

Those to whom the king related this prophecy were "terror-stricken." Stigand alone had the courage to whisper into Harold's ear that the aged king was doting.

Five days later on, and with "the hope that he was passing from the land of the dead to the land of the living," King Edward breathed his last.

A horror of darkness filled the land, as with him (the last lineal descendant of Cerdic), it seemed as if the happiness, the strength, and the liberty of the English people had vanished away.

The courtly poets of the next century rejoiced to trace in the "three acres" (of the prophecy, given in Edward's last trance) the reigns of the three illegitimate kings who followed him, and in the resurrection of the "parent stem," the marriage of the first Henry with the Saxon Maude, and their ultimate issue in the third Henry.

LUDGATE CIRCUS, E.C.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

Reports of the proceedings of Spiritualist Societies in as succinct a form as possible, and authenticated by the signature of a responsible officer, are solicited for insertion in "LIGHT." Members of private circles will also oblige by contributing brief records of noteworthy occurrences at their sances.

The Editor cannot undertake the return of manuscripts unless the writers expressly request it at the time of forwarding and enclose stamps for the return postage.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

The Annual Subscription for "LIGHT," post free to any address within the United Kingdom, or to places comprised within the Postal Union, including all parts of Europe, the United States, and British North America, is 10s. 10d. per annum, forwarded to our office in advance.

ADVERTISEMENT CHARGES.

Five lines and under, 6s. One inch, 4s. 6d. Half-column, £1. Whole Column, £2 2s. Page, £1. A reduction made for a series of insertions. Orders for Papers and Advertisements may be addressed to Mr. J. J. MONSE, the business agent. All other communications should be sent to "The Editor," Cheapside and Post Office Orders may be made payable to EDWARD T. BENNETT, at the Chief Office, London. Halfpenny Postage Stamps received for amounts under 10s.

Orders for Advertisements may also be sent to "The Ross Publishing Company," 4, Wine Office Court, Fleet Street, E.C., on or before Wednesday in each week.

THE SPIRITUALIST'S WORK OF TO-DAY:
A SUGGESTION.

Within the past quarter of a century a very marked change has come over the spiritual movement, and in more ways than one there is a very vivid contrast between the old and the new Spiritualism. We say "old" and "new" advisedly, for no one glancing over the history of the past thirty-five years can fail to appreciate the material advance which psychological science has made during that period. We do not hesitate to affirm that our facts and methods of investigation rest upon a sounder scientific basis to-day than ever before.

Were we asked to indicate how, and when, this change had occurred, we confess we could not exactly define it. Still the fact remains. The probable explanation is, that like all progress either in nature, physics, or intellectual and religious thought, the transition has been so slow and gradual that it has been almost imperceptible, although none the less sure, and no one would venture to deny its existence in either branch of human thought and inquiry.

The change of which we are speaking lies, not so much in the nature of the representative facts of the old and new phases of spiritual science, as in the manner in which they are evolved and studied. The phenomena are the same, but the methods are different.

We of to-day, however, can claim little if any credit for the change. We are simply reaping the harvest sown by others. Our work and duty lies in so using the improved knowledge and opportunities at our command as to ensure another step forward in days to come.

The work of to-day is essentially constructive. There are plenty of materials ready to our hands; opportunities for their use are not lacking; and the one thing needful is an earnest and wise discretion in our method of building up the spiritual science of the future.

In view, therefore, of this obligation, we propose from time to time to bring forward for discussion, and if possible or advisable, for united action on the part of our fellow Spiritualists, various problems which appear to need careful and urgent consideration. The first topic which we offer is, perhaps, the most important; at any rate, it is practical in its bearings, for everything depends upon the kind of foundation we lay for the edifice which we desire to rear. Renewed interest and keen inquiry greet us on every hand, and according as our methods of dealing with the question are wise and sound will the new blood now being infused into the spiritual movement prove a source of strength or weakness. The subject is one which we have on several occasions indicated as pressing for consideration, and which may be formulated thus:—

The Preparation of Inquirers for Investigation, and the Graduation of the Phenomena.

We shall be pleased to open our columns for the discussion of this topic, and we trust the expression of opinion will be as free and representative as that which took place with regard to sance conditions.

LECTURES ON PSYCHOLOGICAL SCIENCE.

We publish this week a complete list of all donations received for this Fund up to the time of going to press. The Lecture Committee have now pretty well completed all their arrangements, but are unable to make a definite announcement until the Special Lecture Fund has attained somewhat larger proportions than it now presents. Will all friends who are intending to subscribe, either to the Fund or for course tickets, kindly do so at once. It will greatly simplify matters for the Committee.

SPECIAL LECTURE FUND, 1883.

The following donations have been received:—

	£	s.	d.
Mrs. M. A. Stack	...	3	3 0
The Hon. Percy Wyndham, M.P.	...	2	2 0
Mrs. E. M. James	...	2	2 0
J. F. Haskins	...	2	2 0
Dr. Dixon	...	2	2 0
E. Dawson Rogers	...	1	1 0
Mrs. Parrick	...	1	1 0
J. S. Farmer	...	1	1 0
Morell Theobald	...	1	1 0
Rev. W. Miall	...	1	1 0
B. Petersen	...	1	1 0
H. Wedgwood	...	1	1 0
R. Donaldson	...	1	1 0
Sandys Britton	...	1	1 0
W. Theobald	...	1	1 0
Miss H. Withall	...	0	10 6
Mrs. Sainsbury	...	0	10 0
Thomas Stocking	...	0	10 0

Full particulars and dates of lectures will be announced as soon as sufficient funds to cover expenses have been subscribed.

All communications and applications for tickets to be addressed to Mr. Thomas Blyton, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

We have been asked to announce the following particulars on behalf of the Lecture Committee of the C.A.S.

It is proposed to hold a course of six lectures during April, May, and June, at the Langham Hall, Great Portland-street, W., on alternate Tuesday evenings, at eight o'clock.

The subjects and lecturers already fixed are:—"An Answer to the Inquiry: What is the Use of Psychological Science?" by Mr. Thomas Shorter.

"A Scientific and Spiritual Basis of Belief in a Future Life," by Rev. John Page Hopps.

"Personal Experience in Psychology," by Mr. T. P. Barkas, F.G.S.

The general public will be admitted free, but to cover the necessary expense of hire of hall, fees, travelling, advertising, and other charges, the committee offer a limited number of tickets for reserved seats at ONE GUINEA each for the course of six lectures. They also appeal to the liberality of Spiritualists and those interested in the dissemination of a knowledge of the phenomena, to contribute to a SPECIAL LECTURE FUND for this purpose. All donations are acknowledged in "LIGHT," and a balance-sheet will be published in due course.

The secretary informs us that correspondents speak highly of the forthcoming lectures, the following being a few extracts from letters received:—

"I feel much interest in the proposed course of lectures, thinking it an excellent step in the right direction, and have pleasure in enclosing three guineas in aid of the required fund."

"These lectures are just the thing that is wanted to meet the demand for intelligent information on these burning questions. You may rely upon my hearty support."

"Now that you are undertaking such public-spirited action, depend upon it, you will receive the support and encouragement of many who, like myself, have waited for such useful work. Enclosed find cheque for my contribution."

CONCERNING THE SOUL.

A Paper read by Mr. J. J. MONSE, before the members and friends of the Central Association of Spiritualists, on Monday, April 9th, 1883.

To those who have devoted time and study to the investigation of modern phenomenal Spiritualism, and who, as a result of their inquiries, have become satisfied of the reality of post-mortem life for their departed friends, and thereby inferentially assured of the continuity of life after death in their own cases, the existence of the soul is a problem that, up to a certain point, has received an affirmative solution. But, after the first feelings of thankfulness and gratitude arising from a realisation of immortality, as thus demonstrated, there comes to most minds of a reflective character a period of rest, in which the question is forced upon the attention, "Does this demonstration of future life throw any additional light upon either the nature or origin of the soul?" There seems to be a consensus of opinion expressed by the communicating spirits which leads us naturally to infer that these intelligences retain consciousness, and memory, and will, and are therefore largely representative in character, and nature, of what we knew of them previous to their departure from this life. Yet it would seem that, leaving aside the question of increased activity, due to improved circumstances, they do not present any better field wherein to study the origin of the soul, than is presented by mankind on earth.

The Origin of the Soul Shrouded in Mystery.

It is pronounced by some that the origin of the soul is shrouded in a mystery that the human intellect will for ever remain incapable of penetrating. That this may be true to-day, and for some future generations, is most likely, but that it will always be so is a question that needs to be accepted with great reserve, especially when we bear in mind the increased acquaintance with the manifestations of the soul that physiology, and psychology, are constantly affording us. Of the existence of a something that is I, and which will survive death, I have every assurance, as a result of observation and personal experience in the matter of spiritual investigation, but as to where that something which is me has come from, the machinery that has created it—if it be created—candour compels admission of the fact that there is not the same certainty, or directness of evidence, presented to my mind, as could be desired. Of theories, and speculations, to choose from, there are sufficient indeed, embodying undoubtedly earnest convictions, and much patient thought, stretching from the palmist days of Hindoo psychology, through the long lapse of time, down to the theories of modern days. Some of these are so subtle that the original idea seems to have been hopelessly attenuated. Others again are better adapted for the purpose of supporting a belief, rather than demonstrating a truth. While yet again there are some so fanciful, that one might almost charitably assume that hashesh having possibly been their cause, a lunatic asylum would most likely be their conclusion. What then in such a case is to be done? Confess one's inability, put the question on one side, and content one's self with daily duties and requirements? Such a course might purchase ease, and pleasure of a sort, but at what a price! Nothing less than the narrowing of the spiritual view, the limiting of the mental horizon, the foregoing of man's proudest prerogative—the right to reason upon every question; to which may be added an utter stultification of every faculty of inspiration, which unites us to the ever-reverberating harmonies of eternal being. Putting on one side the experiences of modern Spiritualism, adopting as far as possible a negative position, in regard to all beliefs and things spiritual, let us endeavour to briefly trace the course of inquiry which it appears has been pursued by those who have been interested in this question in past times.

The Inquiry is a Reverent One.

And here let it be observed that such an inquiry need not be considered by any means as irreverent. It is by inquiry into the facts of nature that the wondrous achievements of science have been gained, and the facts of nature are, equally with the origin of the soul, the works of God. The existence of the soul is not disputed. Its origin is the matter of pursuit. The objections that will be urged against this inquiry are that the matter is purely a spiritual one, and that it is utterly impracticable to attempt its solution by any of the ordinary intellectual processes, and further, that being a spiritual question it is folly to attempt its solution while embodied in mortality, to say nothing of the concurrent opinion that to make such inquiries savours largely of presumption. Yet in all ages the inquiry has been made, and if therefore presumption is expressed by the present querist, he can claim honorable company in the past and present.

The Theory of Emanation.

Probably the first theory accounting for the origin of the soul is that of emanation, which if it be admitted, at once places us in essential nature, in direct relationship with Deity. A pleasant enough speculation, flattering to our vanity, agreeable to our assumptions of superiority, and altogether calculated to give us (which in the majority of cases is unnecessary) an exceedingly good opinion of ourselves. But the difficulties are to account for the incorporation of this emanation into the physical organisation, and the immense deterioration in expression, if not in nature, which that incorporation seemingly entails in many cases.

Granting that these differences may be physiologically and psychologically explained, as doubtless they can be to a large extent, the two supreme difficulties remaining are, first, the one already mentioned, the means of the introduction of this emanation into physical being, and secondly, the possibility of the segregation of the Divine unity. While also may be suggested that if we emanate from the Deity the counter-proposition of our re-absorption into Deity assumes an air of plausibility that, to say the least of it, if true, would apparently entail the destruction of previously existing individuality, consequent upon being merged into the central fount again.

The Theory of Pre-existence.

Pursuing the inquiry a stage further, and seeking information from another school, one is told that the difficulties in regard to the origin of the soul can readily be met by assuming its previous existence, which, if true, again brings us face to face with the first difficulty enumerated in the previous consideration, and certainly involves us in a series of very awkward circumstances, which will be considered presently. There are several points of view, though, from which this doctrine may be observed. The previous existence may either have been super-human, or sub-human. It may either have been angelic, or diabolic, or bestial. Pleasant it may be to imagine that angels and seraphs clothe themselves in flesh, and spend a temporary existence in the execution of deeds of mercy to the needing world, which being blessed thereby, reflects blessings on these angelic visitors in return, who, departing, leave a breath of Heaven behind them as a benison. Yet on the other hand there may be those who come, as our great poet puts it, "with blasts from hell," and insinuating themselves into fleshly life, may so befoul this life of ours that untold misery for others may ensue, to say nothing of the possibilities for wrong and wickedness which such demon visitors may create in our midst. But if our child be angel, or devil, as the case may be, "ties of blood" and "links of kindred" are phrases of little meaning, and the relationships of life from its holiest, the ties of parentage, down through every relation to that of friendship, are reduced to chaos, and wild disorder reigns supreme. Still, the third alternative, the ascent of the soul from bestial sources, implying, its descent similarly, is altogether too curious a speculation for sober treatment, for with regard to the rise of the soul from the brute kingdom, it might be argued that the soul, having obtained one physical incarnation, the second incarnation could be no more marvellous than the first, and an old writer once quaintly observed that "there be men that would disgrace a dog, yet there be dogs that would honour humanity," and as expressing the two sides of this section of the doctrine of previous existence, a poet once said:—

"Had I been born a four-legged child methinks
I might have found the steps from dog to man,
And crept into his nature: are there not
Those who fall down out of humanity
Into the storey where the four-legged dwells?"

If we accept the doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul, and assume its being here is accounted for thereby, and that the reason of its coming is either to expiate an offence in another state, or to render good service out of pure desire to humanity, as a means of its own ultimate advance, still the question of the origin of that soul, or any soul, remains as great a mystery as ever. It is only referred back from this state of existence to another state and in no wise answers the question that perplexes the inquirer's mind.

The Creative Theory.

Again thwarted in our desire, we turn to those who profess, with authoritative answer, to resolve all doubts. Their statement is that the soul is created by the voluntary power of God. Some writers have held that all souls were created by the Divine fiat at the beginning of the world and laid up in a secret repository whence they are drawn as occasion calls—the doctrine of Infusion. This implies the introduction of a special soul into the world at each birth, bringing us again in front of our previously considered difficulty, which in this case, can only be escaped from by adopting the theory of miracle, easy enough of acceptance upon the part of those who desire to elude the difficulties of the position, but utterly unacceptable as a means of truly solving the points at issue. That, in a certain sense, the soul is created by God, is probably unquestionable, but that individual souls are so created is quite another question.

The Transmitted Theory.

Still yet another answer has been given by Tertullian, the essential import of which was, that all human souls have been transmitted or brought over from the soul of Adam. As it is the result of theological exigencies, and pre-supposes that we were all originally contained essentially in the body of Adam, it can be allowed to remain in the limbo of forgetfulness, into which it has undoubtedly sunk.

The Monad Theory.

Another theory is presented in the monad theory of Leibnitz, which assumes the whole created universe, visible and invisible, to consist of monads, which are not particles of matter, but metaphysical points of power. The truth of this theory remains to be demonstrated.

Is the Soul Outside Nature?

The main conclusion deducible from all the preceding is, that the soul is a something outside of nature, which at a certain period becomes associated with nature by incarnation in the human being. This has very much the character of the miraculous. It certainly seems to be something apart from the evolutionary processes of physical development, and while it may afford a basis for a speculative immortality of itself, since being superior to terrestrial existence it will not be subject to the limitations belonging to such existence, yet it does not, as must frankly be confessed, lend itself to that unity of personal being which, starting with an admitted predicate, gradually works up to every succeeding result as a legitimate unfoldment of precedent possibilities. Is it impossible to associate the origin of the soul with the creative function of man, or must we limit the question and thereby prevent its solution, to an extra-natural series of sequences? One would hesitate to build their hopes of immortality on such a basis. In every department of nature that which is, is alike the result of that which has been, and the foundation of that which is to be. Only in such way can differences in races, nations, or individuals be accounted for. The influences of experience, conditions, of all kinds, and racial characteristics, are the modifying causes and stimulating energies in developing and improving the characteristics of the individual or of a race. One should not be ambitious to claim celestial kinship, nor is there need to assume its opposite, nor should we seek to find in spiritual realms the causes of our being, when such may be traceable in our present sphere. Genesis, or miracle, are the only two solutions. Miracle must date from Eden's garden, while Genesis must have its root in the commencement of life itself, and be, as it is, the expression of God's energies through nature's activities. As the possibility of the loveliness and fragrance of the rose that adorns the brow of beauty was contained within the chaotic earth in her days of fire-mist, so also must be admitted she contained the potentialities that have now become the consciousness and intelligence in humanity, which have been gradually evolved through nature's realms, and by the creation of her various forms of organic life, each form of life a prophecy of something better, and each better as it came, rendering more possible the human form which crowns them all, and in which form the universally diffused life of God was ultimately enabled to assume its individual conscious being, and create and sustain an independent existence and relationship with the life of which it formed a part.

The Conclusion of the Whole Matter.

The conclusion then presented is that while the cause of the soul's existence must ever be associated with that inscrutable power, call it by what term you will, yet the origin of the soul's existence, so far as this life of ours is concerned, must not be sought in miraculous interventions, or interferences with the laws of nature, but is rather in harmony with those laws. We must thereby conclude that nature is not the dull, dead, inert condition usually accepted, but that in every department she pulsates with a life Divine, thrills and glows with latent potentialities, which as she grows old in her work, will surely unfold themselves into forms of ever increasing loveliness and beauty until in the ages yet to come the fairest, brightest, and best that we know of now, shall be infinitely transcended. Age too, mankind having learned that the expression of the soul is dependent upon the conditions that environ it, will so apply the knowledge that they will then possess, that bodily conditions and mental furnishings of that sort that shall make of men kings indeed, shall be supplied to all who enter into conscious being through man's contributory processes. Not in the fanciful speculations of the past revived to suit the exigencies of the modern speculative Spiritualists, not in the affirmations of a theology that ignores nature and repudiates investigation, not in accordance with theories that minister to our own self-importance, that are not honest enough to tell us the truth for fear of offence—not in any of these directions must we search for the origin of the soul, but in listening to the teachings of Nature. Though she rob us of our assumed angelic kinship, though she rudely dispel the supposition that we have been created by the hand of God, though she tear from us the pretty figment that we have ranged through other lives celestial, and even though she tell us, that we have not come from regions infernal or from realms brutal, yet let us trust her to tell us truly, when she tells us that within her realms are contained the essential elements of every possible development which mankind has expressed or will express on earth. In a word I would say, Nature is sufficient to account for her own phenomena, and so far as we are related to her, for the existence and development of our souls. A rational genesis for the soul is the required accompaniment of a rational immortality, and this should ever constitute the central idea of an intelligent Spiritualism.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.

SECOND SERIES.

This series of Spirit-Teachings, like the former, is made up of selections from a great mass which have been automatically written during a series of years. They are selected on no other principle than that of printing what has been valuable to the person for whom they were originally given, in so far as the can be done without trenching on what is merely of personal and private application. The latter consideration excludes a great mass of what would otherwise be interesting and valuable matter. The phraseology has been preserved, as far as possible, intact, names only being omitted. The series follows directly on the first, from which, indeed, it is separated only by the accident of its publication in another journal, and after some considerable interval of time. The publication is resumed in deference to many repeated requests.

No. XXXVII.

[A season of great spiritual depression had come upon me. I felt unable to resolve many problems that perplexed me.]

You are perplexed and distressed. Be of good cheer. It is inevitable that one round whom the battle rages should be ill at ease. This is not the time for rest. Leave every doubtful question to a more peaceful time. Exercise yourself in patience. It is the most successful device of the Adversaries to suggest doubts and difficulties to your mind. It is the most assailable side. Your courage they cannot touch. Fix your mind on that and resist the first temptation.

Yes, I believe that is so. But it is very hard to act on such advice.

Nevertheless, it is necessary. You must occupy your mind and not allow it to brood. Be of good cheer.

[I had found it hard to get any automatic writing; and as I wanted direction, I forced on what I regarded as a communication, but which was, in point of fact, only the reflection of my own thoughts. It was a most instructive experience, and I never repeated the experiment.]

You are mistaking your own thoughts for our guidance. We do not influence you in your decision as to associating yourself with others. You err in attributing to us any impression in your mind. It is the result only of attempting to decide when the arguments are evenly balanced.

What do you advise?

Nothing. We do not meddle. Some of our friends are desirous that you should remain at peace as far as possible now. Others would urge you on to further publicity. It is for you who know circumstances to decide.

But every attempt to gather up arguments ends in a negative.

Then act on the negative. It depends on your own feeling.

You have nothing to say on the principle of organisation.

No, it does not apply. It is not wholly good or bad.

Is the chief here?

May the blessing of the Blessed One be on you.

I want to put before you some words of O's, and to ask you whether you will tell me the truth about my progress or the reverse. O. does not, I think, understand me or my state just now. The part I allude to is this: "Who is beset by elemental spirits and returning human elementaries," and the reason he gives, viz., the possession of mediumship. He also assigns M.'s greater progress to the lack of the faculty of mediumship. These statements open out subjects which have long been in my mind, and I should like to hear what you have to say.—[This was written in 1875.]

You have not put out the whole statement. Our friend, of whom we speak with all respect, is in many ways wrong in what he says; and he errs from want of perception. He does not understand what he says about you; nor has he any power of looking into your mind. He is entirely in error as to your mediumship. He would call it splendid when in the full play of development in the circle. When through its exercise results greater than any previously wrought in that special phase were achieved by our friends; when they were producing results which would have astonished any men who saw and heard them; and which, but for our controlling will, would have been very largely increased, he would have called you a splendid medium. He does not know how much nobler and grander is the present exercise of your powers; how far more acceptable to the higher intelligences is the devotion of them to mental and spiritual work in spreading abroad the knowledge of our work. Had it not been necessary for us to lay the foundations securely we never should have permitted the use of your powers for such purpose and for so long a time. That which to him is splendid to us was lamentable. And we have not seen with any such pleasure as we derive from the gradual sealing up of those avenues of physical manifestation, anything connected with your mediumship. The transference of your power from the material plane, the quickening of the perceptions, and the development of the inner spiritual faculties, the recognition in a normal way of our nearness, and the ability to see and converse with us without the dangerous conditions of trance; these are, to us, splendid. They are the inception of the most perfect form of life possible to man; that Enoch life in which he walks with God. In proportion as mediumship is diverted into strange and abnormal channels, it becomes dangerous. Any repeated and constant exercise of the power for physical purposes other than mere equilibration is fraught with risk, inasmuch as it develops that which is unnatural and abnormal, and in the end must deprave the medium. Deprave, we say, and the word is not too strong. Either the vital forces will be sapped, and physical health destroyed, or, more frequently, the mental balance will be destroyed, or, most frequently of all, the medium will become the instrument of intelligences devoid of high moral consciousness, and so his morals will be deteriorated. In one or more of these ways harm will sooner or later ensue. This is the perversion of mediumship, and should only be tolerated in the case of those who are sacrificed for the public good in spreading conviction to those who can be reached in no other way. The spread of it is not to be encouraged beyond what is absolutely necessary. Far other is that higher form of mediumship when the human spirit soars from the material to the spiritual plane, and in developing its own innate powers gains means of intercourse with the pure and good who are above its present state, and can elevate, purify, and instruct it. In development of those powers is no risk of contamination, no association with the impure and ignoble, the brutal and depraved. The whole picture is reversed. The vital forces are directed normally; the spirit soars as its instincts lead it; the thoughts suggested are pure and good, the aims put before it are elevated, the deeds inspired are such as enable and win a good report from men. It is for want of recognising this truth that spirit communion is so evil spoken of. Not until it is recognised and acted on so far as the unprogressed condition of men will allow, can the science make much progress.

We rejoice far more than we have ever rejoiced concerning you that you are relinquishing the phenomenal side, and are devoting your faculties to their higher use. We rejoice that you are ceasing to waste your strength on that which to us and to you is, or should be, profitless. We hope that you will refrain, so far as may be, from wasting yourself on vain contentions and curious questionings. It must be that you contend for the faith, but do it with discretion; and refrain from any attempt to prove to those who do not seek for it, facts that they are not able to appreciate; at any rate do not devote your powers as a medium to any such end. Let them be consecrated to nobler work. Withdraw as much as may be from the contentions which please the world; and contend only for truth. When contention is at an end, you will find that progress has been made by you. But look to peace as your end. The work best worth doing is the cultivation of your highest powers, the development of your own spirit, and communing with us who are able and willing to instruct you. For this reason we drew your mind to the subject which, in our friend's case, has absorbed all else, and has grown out of due proportion. It is necessary that you learn to know yourself; but your knowledge must not end there. It is necessary that you learn the power of your own mediumship, but you must not merely play with it on the plane of matter. It is necessary that you learn the nature of the spirits who surround your earth, in order that you may dominate and keep them at bay. It is necessary that you see the depths that yawn for the evil and abandoned, in order that you may turn to the pure and good. Hence, the nightly agonies, the awful glimpses of horror, the crowds of the Adversaries who surrounded and mocked at you. Hence the necessity for that ordeal. It was ordained for far other reasons than those which our friend supposes. He seems to consider that in the progress of the novice to the inner realms of knowledge, it is necessary for him to encounter beings whose business it is to guard the entrance, and that in proportion as he is ignorant of their presence, or callous to their influence, he is safe. This is one of the distorted views of truth which the old writers inculcate. The truth is that your medium-ship has been to you the one avenue of knowledge. But for it you would now have been utterly incredulous of our power: and would have been in the number of those who mock and scoff at our very existence. Through it you have gained proofs which others do not need, and which could have come to you in no other way. Our friend has never grasped the truth that mediumship such as is yours, controlled by spirits such as we, is the highest form of blessing if it be rightly used: and only hurtful when deliberately abused and misused. He has no knowledge of such influence, and so mistakes. We have already told you, in directing your development, that we were compelled to allow you to be used for phenomenal manifestations for a time. When it was possible for us to stop that phase, we permitted you to be brought in contact with others of our friends in order that you might learn of the power of your own spirit, and might gather up the wisdom stored for you by those who have gone before. Moreover, it was necessary to give you practical proof of the existence and operation of spirits other than those known to most men. If we desired to do this, we knew from old and repeated experience that it was useless to explain and tell you. You must prove and experience for yourself. Hence your nightly trials. We were at hand to protect, but you did not need it. You passed through your experience without fear, and in doing so gained what we wished you to gain. It may be that you will find such experiences to recur, but never again with their first force. Had our friend known you as he imagines, he should know that in winning your way through these opposing Adversaries, you have achieved a victory and progressed to a degree to which nothing in your previous development can compare. Nothing in your previous life compares in our view with its past year, except the days of seclusion, and the then period of earnest meditation and devoted prayer. The wild development of the previous years, necessary for a time, had little charm for us, and no benefit for you. Our American friends are not able to grasp the full beauty of that inner growth which is now beginning to spring from it: and they entirely misunderstand the object with which it was permitted. It is not wise to compare rates of progress. Progress so seldom runs on parallel lines that comparisons are deceptive. But we have watched with joy and helped, so far as was possible for us, the growth in inner knowledge and spiritual perception of your friend. His nature is being refined and purified in a way that was very needful for it; and he is undergoing the preliminary training necessary for him. What was needful for you is not so for him. He is having his necessary discipline through which we see his passage with joy. His spirit needed purification by trial, and that trial he is having in two ways which he will recognise. Through it all his progress is real and assured. The points of contact between your lives vary from time to time, and at some periods are less intimate than others; but your progress is side by side though events may in the future separate between you. It is well for you to labour each for himself, and to remember that discipline is not the same for all.

There are many points of truth there. I am quite conscious of distinct growth; and I never felt more conscious of victory than in defeating the attacks of those grinning fiends. I also suspect that I gained a point in casting off the attempted subjugation of reason to a mere idea which our American friends put forth. The Lodge seemed to be getting seriously oppressive; and the explanations were only bewildering. I felt that I could not afford to walk in the dark. Has the time come when you can give me any direct information or advice?

There is little to tell. It is not well for you to take any steps in uncertainty. We never intended that you should. We encouraged you, as we have said, to look into these questions. We never intended you to give up all your life to the study of magic. Without a life dedication such studies are full of risk; and you have other work to do. Be content to gather up store of knowledge, and trust direction to us. But do not be advised by our friends to despise and condemn what has been to you your chief blessing:—the power of communing with us.

No. I do not think they understand me or my mediumship at all. They certainly make statements very wide of fact; and take shots which miss the mark sadly.

Their information of you is imperfect, and they err in judging you by other mediums. Nevertheless, you have learned much and may learn more from them. Be content to wait. All is not over yet, and new developments are in process of evolution. Cease now.

DIRECT SPIRIT WRITING.

The following message was given by direct writing—that is, without physical contact—at a séance at which Mrs. Everitt was the medium. The circle was composed of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Everitt, Mr. Frank Everitt, Dr. J. C. Clark, Mrs. Clark, Mr. J. Hindes, Mr. Woods, Mr. Smart, and Mr. Morell Theobald. Though the message consists of nearly six hundred words it was written, as nearly as could be estimated, in about three seconds:—

"The time present seldom affords sufficient employment to the mind of men. Objects of pain or pleasure, love or admiration, do not lie thick enough together in life to keep the spirit in constant action and supply an immediate exercise to its faculties. In order, therefore, to remedy this defect, that the mind may not want business, but may always have materials for thinking, she is endowed with certain powers that can recall what is past and anticipate what is to come. That wonderful faculty, memory, is perpetually looking back when there is nothing present to entertain it. It is like those repositories in several animals that are filled with stores of their former food on which they may ruminate when their present pasture fails. As the memory relieves the mind in her vacant moments, and prevents any chasms of thought by ideas of what is passed, other faculties agitate and employ her upon what is to come, the passions of hope and fear. By these two passions you reach forward into futurity, and bring up to your present thoughts objects that lie hid in the remotest depths of time. You suffer misery and enjoy happiness before they are in being; you can set the sun and stars forward or lose sight of them by wandering into retired parts of eternity. Who can then possibly imagine that the existence of a creature is to be circumscribed by time whose thoughts are not? Actual real enjoyments are so few and transient that man would not be a very happy being were he not endowed with this passion which gives him a taste of these good things that may possibly come into his passions. He should hope for everything that is good because there is nothing which may not be hoped for and nothing but what our Father is able to give. Hope quickens all the still parts of life and keeps the mind awake in her most remiss and indolent hours; it gives habitual serenity and good humour. It is a kind of vital heat in the soul that cheers and gladdens her when she does not attend to it. It makes pain easy, and labour pleasant. No kind of life is so happy as that which is full of hope, especially when the hope is well grounded and when the object is of an exalted kind and in its nature proper to make the person happy who enjoys it. Therefore, a religious life is that which most abounds in well-grounded hope and such an one as is fixed on objects that are capable of making men entirely happy. This hope in a religious man is more sure and certain than the hope of any temporal blessing, as it is strengthened not only by reason but by faith. It has, at the same time, its eye perpetually fixed on that state which implies in the very nature of it the most full and complete happiness. The influence of hope in general sweetens life, and makes the present condition supportable, if not pleasing. But a religious hope has still greater advantages. It does not only bear up the mind under her sufferings but makes her rejoice in them. It has this advantage above any other, that it is able to revive the spirit when passing from the earthly sphere and fill it with secret comfort and refreshment, with rapture and transport, so that he springs forward with delight to the great object which he always had in view—a life beyond the present."

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The "Religio-Philosophical Journal."

Our Chicago contemporary gives in two instalments Mr. Heaphy's celebrated ghost story with which our readers are already well acquainted.—In the course of a leader on the Salvation Army mania, the Editor points out that midst much that is foolish and unlovely there is a good side to their folly; that enthusiasm is better than indifference; a superstitious belief than no belief at all; erratic life than pulseless death, for then there is some hope. If we could give them the steady foundation of fact and knowledge and take in exchange some of their enthusiasm, the outcome would be the most potent power the world has yet seen for its salvation. This does not mean that we should endorse the Salvation Army, its creeds, or its methods. They are altogether repulsive. "But," says the Religio, "we do wish often that Spiritualists had vigour enough to live as if Spiritualism were true, enthusiasm enough to spend more time, effort, and money to spread what they know to be truth. . . . There are hosts of Spiritualists; would there were more spiritual energy among them." So say we.—The most important item calling for attention is the report in the Journal for March 24th of the Rev. M. J. Savage's experience with Mrs. R. C. Simpson, a slate writing medium of Chicago. It will be remembered that the Banner and the Religio some time since charged Mr. Savage with a want of honesty in his public utterances about Spiritualism. He has, however, openly and boldly come forward and plainly and unhesitatingly acknowledged the reality of the phenomena he has recently witnessed in the presence of Mrs. Simpson. We purpose summarising the report for next week's "Light," and hence leave the matter here for the present.

The "Harbinger of Light" (Melbourne).

We are exceedingly glad to note that the Harbinger of Light enrolls itself in the ever-increasing ranks of those who desiderate more careful methods of investigation. It will, we are sure, be a long time before the full benefit produced by the C.A.S. circular on séance conditions is completely realised. We had occasion recently to point out that its influence had extended to Continental Spiritualism; and now our Australian exchanges bear witness to the same fact. The Harbinger, a few years ago, would have dissented from any action of the kind; but careful observation of the effects on the public, and also upon mediums, has necessitated its endorsement of the action recently taken by the C.A.S.—"M.A. (Oxon.)" contributes a short letter on "Materialisation Conditions," which we shall reproduce in our next issue.—The contents of the present number of the Harbinger are bright and varied; it should have a wide circulation amongst English Spiritualists.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL, 14, NEWMAN STREET, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

The appropriation of Sunday evening last, at this hall, as a "ballot night," when, in the form of "question and answer," the controls of Mr. Morse met all comers who had complied with the invitation of the Council of the Lyceum to submit inquiries of general interest, seems to have been very generally appreciated, for there was a large and intelligent audience, courteously ready to recognise the sincerity of the efforts which were being made to test the reality and the resources of trance speaking.

Every question was read over, and, with the exception of two of a personal nature, excluded by the regulations, and three or four others introduced by inquirers already accepted for one question each—for whom further time could not be spared—the whole were answered. The following is an abbreviated summary of the questions submitted to the controls.

1. Can you say when the soul enters the body, whether it is created, or where it exists before entering the body?
2. Having for many years witnessed the experiment of rings, composed of iron or wood, being passed over the hands of sitters at séances, when the hands were tightly held or tied together, I ask whether the rings are disintegrated or the flesh of the arm?
3. When we enter spirit life are we clothed with a spiritual body; if so, do we at some future time throw off that body and become pure spirit?
4. Can the spirits once living on this earth explore other supposed worlds, and are these in advance of this earth?
5. Will you give an opinion upon the origin and truthfulness of "The new Bible, Oahspe," and say whether you know anything of the Jehovah who is said to have dictated it?
6. What were the objects of Jesus Christ's mission to mankind?
7. What mission have the controls of Mr. Morse, and are they sent by a higher power than themselves?
8. Being told that only when spirits are in perfect harmony can they communicate with each other, or even know of each other's presence, and remembering how impossible is such harmony, how shall we in spirit life recognise or communicate with our friends?
9. Is there a path of progress open to all spirits, especially to those lower spirits who visit the earth?
10. Is Ireland justified in demanding land reform and Home Rule: has the English Government ever done their duty to Ireland except after explosions and murder; and what may be the future of Ireland?
11. If man's actions are influenced by spirits how can his will be free, and if thus influenced to evil is it right to punish him?
12. Blasphemy: is there such a crime known to moral law?
13. Are Comprehensionism and Spiritualism similar?
14. Why do people have to suffer for the sins and misconduct of others, and for their own committed in ignorance; how do you reconcile the fact of such suffering with justice?
15. Why is one born to suffering and another to ease? Where and when will human woes and misery cease?

It would be impossible in the limited space allotted to this report to quote the substance of all the excellent and pertinent replies to these questions, and invidious perhaps to make distinctions; but as a shorthand note was taken of each, the whole can be printed verbatim, and then sold at sixpence per copy if a sufficient number of applications for the work are received by the secretary of the Council on or before the 17th inst., on Sunday, the 15th, at the place of meeting, or on any day, in writing, at 53, Sigdon-road, Dalston, E.

A respectful expression of the thanks of the meeting was then tendered to the controls for their instructive and valuable replies, and most cordially acknowledged by them. During the collection Miss Dixon relieved the choir by an effective rendering of Beethoven's solo, "Creation's Hymn."

The subject of the lecture by Mr. Morse on Sunday, the 15th, will be "Man's God," and on the 22nd, "God's Man."

NOTE.—The meetings will, on and after Sunday next, the 15th inst., be held at the Cavendish Rooms, 51 and 53, Mortimer-street, W.

LIVERPOOL.

Mrs. Britten's visit to Liverpool has resulted in an attack upon Spiritualism by the Rev. J. H. Skewes, who in two sermons, somewhat of the De Witt Talmage sensational type, and entitled "The Death-blow to Spiritualism" and "Spiritualism in its Coffin! The Lid Nailed Down," brought forward various objections which to the uninformed seem to have some weight. Mrs. Britten has replied quietly, and in the main most effectively. The editor of the Protestant Standard, in which paper the reply appears, is, however, most offensive, and we should counsel our Liverpool friends to decline to continue the discussion unless a more courteous spirit is manifested by the antagonistic party.

Next Sunday Mrs. Britten will again occupy the platform at Rodney Hall, and on the Monday following, April 16th, will deliver a short address—subject: "Is Spiritualism of Divine Origin?"—to be followed by a discussion, clergymen being specially invited to take part in the debate.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—On Wednesday evening, April 4th, a very pleasant and enjoyable entertainment was given to the friends at Weirs Court, by Mr. Baliol, a very successful and able North country conjurer. His sleight of hand proficiency was truly remarkable, and was greatly appreciated by those present. The entertainment was varied by some excellent readings by Mr. Carver. On Sunday last Mr. Westgarth lectured at the hall of the N.E.S. on "The True Religion," which subject had been chosen by the audience. Mr. H. A. Kersey occupied the chair. On the 23rd of April, Shakespeare's birthday, Mr. Mahoney will give an evening of readings from Shakespeare.

GATESHEAD.—Last Sunday evening Mr. J. G. Gray discoursed to the members and friends at Gateshead on "Watchman! what of the night?" He endeavoured to show how the night of ignorance and deformity had to be dispersed by the full daylight of knowledge and truth, before the spiritual unfoldment of the race could be satisfactorily ensured. Mr. H. Burton occupied the chair.

ASHINGTON.—Mr. Stevenson, of Gateshead, lectured to the friends at this place on Sunday last on "Spiritualism." The lecture, a very instructive one, was highly appreciated.

NORTH SHIELDS.—On Sunday evening last Mr. Mordey, of Sunderland, spoke on "The Philosophy of Divine Providence." The subject, a most interesting one, was handled in a manner which gave the greatest satisfaction. On the preceding Thursday Mr. E. W. Wallis, of Nottingham, delivered an able discourse on "Spiritualism" to a large and intelligent audience.

MRS. BRITTEN.—This eminent lady is engaged to lecture to the friends at Newcastle and Gateshead on the last two Sundays of April and the first Sunday in May.

NORTHUMBRIA.

MR. E. DAWSON ROGERS.—At the Council meeting of the C.A.S., on Tuesday evening last, an unanimous vote of sympathy was passed by all present to Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, the President of the Association, in the great bereavement he and his family had recently sustained by the death of his youngest son. Mr. Rogers replied briefly, stating that at first both Mrs. Rogers and himself had felt the blow very much, but that now they realised how much consolation Spiritualism gave at such times.

HUDSON TUTTLE.—We regret to hear that Hudson Tuttle—whose name, and also that of his wife, are almost household words amongst Spiritualists—has been seriously ill. Writing to us on the 27th March he reported himself as "just recovering," and we trust his progress towards complete restoration has not been retarded in any way. He further says:—"We have had a fearfully cold winter, and it is still cold. I live near Lake Erie, which is a solid mass of ice as far as I can see to-day." Mr. Tuttle's last literary effort is a novelette entitled "Clair: A Story of Mormon Life and Perfidy," which has attained a somewhat wide circulation on the otherside of the Atlantic. Its avowed object is to expose the dark ways of the Mormon missionaries, and the wrongs of the people whom they dupe. A few copies will shortly be obtainable in England.

Mrs. Hardinge Britten will lecture at Liverpool, April 15th and 16th. Newcastle-on-Tyne, April 22nd and 29th. Gateshead-on-Tyne, May 5th. Belper, May 13th. Cardiff, May 20th and 27th. Address, The Limes, Humphrey-street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We cannot guarantee the insertion in the current issue of letters arriving at our office later than Tuesday morning.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

(With which is incorporated the British National Association of Spiritualists. Established 1873.)

38, GREAT RUSSELL ST., BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.
(Entrance in WOBBUR STREET.)

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed for the purpose of uniting Spiritualists of every variety of opinion in an organised body, with a view of promoting the investigation of the facts of Spiritualism, and of aiding students and inquirers in their researches by providing them with the best means of investigation.

The Association is governed by a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Council of thirty Members elected annually.

The Reference and Lending Libraries contain a large collection of the best works on Spiritualism and occult subjects. Spiritualist and other newspapers and periodicals from all parts of the world are regularly supplied for the Reading Room, to which Members have access daily.

The Secretary, or his representative, is in attendance to receive visitors, and answer enquiries; on Saturdays, from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.; on other days from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. On Sundays the Rooms are closed.

Spiritualists and others visiting the Metropolis are cordially invited to visit the Association and inspect the various objects of interest on view in the Reading Room and Library. Information is cheerfully afforded to enquirers on all questions affecting Spiritualism.

Members' Free Schemes are held on Wednesday evenings, at 8 o'clock prompt subject to certain regulations, which can be ascertained on application.

Discussion Meetings are held fortnightly during the winter months. Admission free to Members and Subscribers, who can introduce one or more friends to each meeting. Programmes can be obtained on application during the winter season.

Societies, at which all friends are welcome, are held at intervals during the season. An admission fee is charged, including refreshments.

TERMS OF MEMBERSHIP.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon)"

We are indebted to the Pall Mall Gazette for the subjoined frank confession of the spread of Spiritualism. I do not quarrel with the "irrational and time-wasting superstition" out of gratitude for the rest of the note. But a "superstition" that rests on the severest tests of scientific evidence can hardly be "irrational," nor is it apparent to me that I waste my time in demonstrating existence outside of a material body, any more than the geologist does in speculating on the age of the earth, or the entomologist in classifying his bugs and beetles. But every man to his taste. I have a great respect for research even of the minutest and least practical nature; but I reserve my greatest respect for that noblest study of man which the Pall Mall superfluently sneers at.

"A new deadly sin has been discovered by the Church, which, alas! has in all ages been much more skilled in inventing sins than in reclaiming sinners. The new heresy, which has been proclaimed in Bohemia, is Spiritualism, where it is said that table-rapping has attained such dimensions that an episcopal proclamation has been issued placing it on a par with heresy, and stating that whoever persists in it will be refused absolution even after confession. In Bohemia, therefore, we suppose the faithful must understand in the future that all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men, but whoever believes in Spiritualism it shall not be forgiven him neither in this world, neither in that which is to come. An irrational and time-wasting superstition has seldom received harsher sentence even from unbelieving materialists."

From the Indian Mirror of March 6th, I learn that Colonel Olcott is working some remarkable cures in India. The method he adopts is that of mesmeric passes, and he especially repudiates any external aid. He conceives himself to be the efficient cause. The following testimony is very direct and conclusive :—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "INDIAN MIRROR."

SIR,—As Colonel Olcott, the President-Founder of the Theosophical Society, will accept of no compensation, nor is he desirous of receiving any thanks for the trouble he has taken in curing my grandson, Ashu Toah Bysack, I, in justice to myself, beg to make a public acknowledgment of the same. The boy in question is now aged twelve years. He has been suffering from epilepsy for the last six or seven years. The best physicians, allopathic, homoeopathic, and Native, have treated him, but to no effect. The disease became latterly so violent that in one day and night he had no less than sixty fits, and was unable to get up or walk. In this state he was brought to Colonel Olcott, and has now been treated by him for seven days. The boy has so much improved that he can run and walk without difficulty, looks very lively, and appears perfectly healthy; besides which he has had no fits during this period. His appetite has returned, costiveness is gone, he gets sound sleep, and is enjoying life like other boys for the first time in seven years.—Yours, &c., SURJI KUMAR BYSACK. The 1st March, 1883.

Another case is thus recorded in the same journal :—

A young Brahmin was brought by the relatives of the epileptic boy for treatment. He had a facial paralysis which prevented his closing his eyes, projecting his tongue, and swallowing liquids, in the usual way. The paralysis of his tongue prevented his speaking without the greatest efforts. In our presence and that of other witnesses, Colonel Olcott laid his hands upon him, pronounced the command, Aram Hao! made some passes over the head, eyes, face, and jaws, and in less than five minutes the patient was cured. The scene, which followed, affected the bystanders to tears. For a moment the patient stood closing and opening his eyes, and thrusting out and withdrawing his tongue, and then, when the thought flashed upon him that he was cured, he burst into a fit of tears of joy and with exclamations of gratitude that touched our hearts, flung himself on the ground at the Colonel's feet, embracing his knees and pouring out expressions of the deepest thankfulness. Surely, no one present can ever forget this dramatic incident.—Yours, &c., SRINATH TAGORE, SHAUCORRY MUKERJI, NIVARAN CHANDELA MUKERJI.

Mr. Denovan, an Australian gentleman of position, formerly member of the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, is an ardent Spiritualist, whose zeal is beyond question. In this ponderous volume* of 700 pages, he has gathered together a number of his own experiences, and has fortified them by records of various phenomena "culled from the writings of eminent authors, mediums, magazines, and newspapers connected with the great spiritual movement of my time." This culling from what is so oddly described has not been conducted, I am bound to say, with discretion. The paste and scissors have been used with a freedom that is in itself hardly permissible: and some extracts of enormous length have been reprinted without permission, and in defiance of the announcement that they are under revision for the purpose of publication in book form. It is charitable to suppose that the author was not aware of this. Indeed there is a genial kindness pervading his remarks about those whom he so liberally quotes that makes it impossible to conceive that he would voluntarily do them harm. Still the fact remains that there is much quoted from my own published articles which I have under revision; some that I had determined to excise: and very much that, had I been consulted, I should have declined to republish in the form which it now occupies.

The same criticism applies to the selected extracts from other writers with but few exceptions. The excerpts are of inordinate length, of ephemeral interest in too many cases, and most of them might well have been omitted, (as, e.g., Dr. Sexton's twenty pages on Spirit-mediums and Conjurers, delivered ten years since) or condensed to a tithe of the space now occupied. Admitting the permanent value of such a monograph as that of William Howitt's on "Stone-throwing by Spirits," it is evident that nearly thirty pages is an inordinate amount of space to give to such a subject. Mr. Colley's long account of his experiences with Monck would have borne condensation, and have gained by the omission of irrelevant verbiage. And the sixty pages devoted to Spirit Photography would have been none the less cogent for the omission of all reference to a confessed impostor, even though there be good reason to believe that he was no less an impostor in his confession than in his trade. The book throughout bears the impress of haste and clumsy construction. Opinions and writings are not always credited to the right person. There is a lack of orderly plan and compact method which makes the reading of it distasteful; and there are also omissions which are very glaring. This is all consistent with the desire, which, indeed, is stamped on every page, to do all in the author's power to convince others of what he is so thoroughly convinced of himself. The author is transparently sincere; but I am bound to say that he is not fitted for the very difficult task which he has imposed upon himself.

When we come to the original matter, we are met with the grave difficulty of deciding what portions of the records are exact. I am by no means inclined to exaggerate the difficulty of getting perfectly trustworthy evidence when I say that the author's mental attitude and habits of thought do not present him, on his own showing, as an unimpeachable witness. Here, again, his transparent sincerity has caused him to write his own condemnation. As chairman of a circle that met twice a week in Sandhurst for upwards of five years, Mr. Denovan contributed to the journals various accounts of phenomena observed at its meetings. The mediums, who are not named, were private members of the circle, and some very noteworthy phenomena are recorded as occurring in their presence. But when we have read many pages of these, it is distressing to come upon this: "On Sunday, the 6th of December, there was a thunderstorm raging outside, and therefore the manifestations were anything but satisfactory. [Indeed they were!] The lightning was so vivid as to light up all the room, thus enabling all of us to see, to our astonishment, the unconscious medium passing round the circle with King's light in his hand and some drapery on the front of his body. There was no attempt at concealment, but, at the close, King, speaking through the medium, said:—'In consequence of the disturbed state of the elements to-night, the materialisations have been very imperfect.' Our candid author naively prints this, and then goes on to argue that it 'would appear to favour Serjeant Cox's theory of psychic force!' A dressed up man with a bottle of phosphorus and a few shreds of muslin, imposing on confiding people because it thundered and lightened! That is a new illustration of psychic force.

It is a matter of honest regret to me that I cannot estimate this book as a serious addition to the literature of Spiritualism. The author is not equipped for his task, which, indeed, demands gifts that he does not possess, and time beyond that "leisure hour at night" which he modestly devoted to it. Where so much is included, there must needs be some records of value. Such are the accounts of the Melbourne circle drawn up by Mr. Terry, and various cases of mesmeric healing by Mr. G. M. Stephen. There are also many cases of psychography, chiefly with Slade, that make an excellent impression when collected together.

M. A. (OXON.)

Allan Kardec's works are chiefly known in this country through Miss Anna Blackwell's admirable translations, which, however, have had but a very limited sale. They are, however, very popular on the Continent, and "The Spirit's Book" is in its 29th French edition; "The Medium's Book," in its 17th; and "The Book of the Evangelists" in its 16th. Most of Kardec's works have also been translated into the Portuguese, Spanish, Italian, and German languages.

ON THE CONDITIONS FOR MANIFESTATIONS.

By J. DIXON, M.D.

To the materialist, the alleged facts of spirits appearing, or otherwise manifesting their presence, are held to be impossible, while to him who holds that behind the material is the spiritual, that souls come out of some previous state into this for development, such facts would be very possible.

To the latter the visibility of a spirit, by some process of interblending with matter, would not be repugnant to his conception of the natural; but he would understand that for spirits to present themselves to us, who are spirits in material bodies, there must be conditions; and that these might relate in part to them and their state of being, and in part to us and ours,—conditions beyond willing or wishing on either side. This was the state of the present writer's mind when he heard of modern spirit manifestations.

Conditions for spirit manifestations have been studied, and rules for forming circles to witness them have been printed; but all such rules have always seemed to me only partial. They are all good so far as they tend to bring fresh inquirers into preliminary orderliness. But the very title of spirit-circle, for which the rules are written, implies the interrelation and possible interblending with it of spirits.

It has always seemed to me that spirits, from their side, perceive more or less clearly the conditions required, perhaps better than we do. One objectionable condition perceptible to spirits, and the circle, is the presence of self-asserting investigators who come bristling with notions of fraud being somewhere, and of their duty to detect it. A less strong, but still objectionable condition is the presence of those whose self-importance urges them to reject evidence which is not presented to them in the way they think it ought to come. Spirits' operations are often nullified by such presence; sometimes, however, they are enabled, by the circle being otherwise favourable, to manifest in some way their presence.

These reflections apply, according to my observation, to every phase of manifestation, but especially to that of materialisation. The clearest manifestations to the mind and senses have been, in my experience, those in which the spirits have suggested or dictated the conditions, including the persons who were to form the circle, because each member of the circle would be co-operative with them. Even when a circle is held for investigators, those who believe that spirits are there, should speak and act as if they acknowledged their presence.

Dr. Chazarnin's observations on this point, in his narrative of séances at Paris, interested me much, especially as they were evoked by phenomena similar to those recorded by myself, in a series of séances nine years ago, in the Spiritual Magazine. The phenomena I speak of were, I believe, the first of spiritual-materialisation among us; and as they bear upon the present subject, may be considered to the point here. I will only recall the first séance of the series. But I must introduce my short account with a few words about spirit-photography.

It is just ten years ago that our friend, Samuel Guppy, obtained photographs of Mrs. Guppy's spirit-friend "Katie." He had discovered that a neighbouring photographer, Mr. Hudson, was a medium, and that through his and Mrs. G.'s mediumship, and Hudson's studio, conditions were to be had for obtaining spirit-photographs; and there he obtained the portraits of "Katie" and other spirits. Afterwards it was found that other mediums, with Hudson, could also furnish the requisite conditions; among them was notably Miss G. Houghton—who has since published a valuable work on the subject, with many specimens—Mrs. Olive, and Messrs. Herne and Williams, then holding séances together. Hudson's visitors became so numerous that he could not meet all claims upon his time for séances, so many had to be content with buying out of the stock in his parlour; this stock consisted of extra copies of spirit-photographs which sitters permitted him to sell to Spiritualists. Here the door was opened to trouble. Hudson was a man of mild, impressible character, and was evidently in poor circumstances. After a time it began to be said that he added fictitious spirit-photos to his selling stock. There was an outcry. Of the two Spiritualist newspapers, one expressed sorrow that poverty had, as it seemed, tempted the photographer, hoped friends would help so undeniable a medium for photography into better conditions, and continued to recommend visitors to his studio. The other paper, not being moved by such charity, was firm in its censure, and insisted that the work in general from Hudson's studio was thrown into doubt. This view was reiterated in every number of the paper for a long time. These perpetual censures reflected upon the mediums who attended Hudson's studio, and as this became less and less frequented, so Herne and Williams found fewer and fewer visitors came to their séances. On calling once upon them they told me that they had not had a visitor for a séance for so long that they had thought of giving up, and would have done so, had not "John King," their leading spirit, told them, in a sitting with themselves that "Katie" and he were considering conditions for making themselves visible without the aid of photography, and that inquirers would come to their séances more numerous than ever.

A few days after this one of them called upon me to say that "John" had asked for an experimental circle at which "Katie" and he would try to shew themselves, naming the time and the circle, of which I was to be asked to form one.

On the evening arranged we met, one of us coming twelve miles, all known to each other and harmonious, and all in the habit of meeting "Katie" and "John King," myself for years through these, and other mediums along with our friend B. Coleman. We were a circle of seven including the mediums. We sat as for a séance: by "John's" voice the mediums were directed to take seats in an angle of the room, while we were to form a semi-circle in front of them. "John" rapped the signal for turning off the gas. The mediums went at once into trance, denoted by their breathing. Presently small white lights appeared at the ceiling, above the mediums, which descended wavily, grew into fingers, then hands, each finger tipped with a phosphoric flame. The hands, their outer aspect towards us, as they came near us, were waved circularly, revealing faces, and delicate drapery, "Katie's" of oriental type with beautiful dark eyes; "John's" large and manly with full dark beard, the same faces as revealed by Hudson's photographs; their voices, familiar to us for years, asked each of us by name, through lips now visible to us, "Do you see us?" "Do you see us well?" Gladly we assured them that we did. John seemed delighted, asked us to sing, and joined loudly in singing "Shall we gather," clapping his hands in time with the singing. High over the mediums he called out, "Here am I, John King, once Sir Henry Morgan! God bless you all!"

I omit a great deal. Not only did "Katie" and "John" manifest themselves at this séance, but we had the visible and audible presence, but not so palpably, of someone dear to each of us, as if they had come to witness the experiment; the originating of which "John" said was due to "Katie."

Before we broke up, pleased and excited at the result, "John" asked for the same circle to meet twice a-week for a while, to enable them to confirm the experiment, one or two other sitters to be added at each séance. This was done at the selection of the mediums. At the end of a month John said the process was assured, and outside inquirers might be admitted by the mediums, whose rooms were again well visited.

I have witnessed many materialisations since, and have witnessed them of all degrees, from thin and partial aggregation of matter upon a spirit to such an aggregation as made the spirit appear solid. They have appeared in drapery more or less fine and white. These differences have appeared to me to arise, in some instances, from difference of knowledge of the process on the part of the spirit, but oftener from differences in the conditions furnished by the mediums and the circle, from whom the material is derived for the spirit's manifestation. The clothing has sometimes been of our worldly manufacture. This is a subject into which I do not go now, but mostly it has been as transient as the spirit's materialised form. Atmospheric and other conditions have also had their effect. But the study of them must be imperfect until we recognise invisible participators in the work, and take them into counsel with us. As conditions vary with the circumstances and the individuals of a given circle, so the counsel of spirits, necessarily, would not be always the same.

On Monday evening next, 23rd inst., at the Fortnightly Discussion Meeting of the Central Association of Spiritualists, 38, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, Mr. Iver MacDonnell will read a paper entitled, "The World 200 years hence." The chair will be taken at 7.30 p.m.

SPIRITUALISM IN AMERICA.—It is interesting to note, as an indication of the hold Spiritualism has taken on American soil, that the newspapers published in the large towns regularly, and as a matter of course, advertise spiritual meetings just as freely as, and in conjunction with, the gatherings of various religious organisations. For example, a recent number of the Boston Herald has, in its "Engagement Column," the announcement of about twenty meetings connected with different religious bodies, and immediately following, under the title of "Spiritualist Meetings," comes the announcement of no less than thirteen different Sunday lectures, &c., to be held in Boston, and we understand this is by no means an isolated case.

THE LIBRARY OF THE C.A.S.—We understand this library—the finest in the world of its kind—will shortly be re-arranged and a complete catalogue made with a view to facilitating the use of the circulating portion by the general public and inquirers into Spiritualism at a moderate monthly charge. We learn that a friend is willing to give upwards of seventy volumes to the Association for their circulating library on two conditions; (1) that every effort is made to facilitate their use by the general public; and (2) that the fact be announced in "LIGHT," and an appeal made for contributions of books on the part of well-wishers of the C.A.S. We gladly give effect to the second condition, and trust that if any of our readers have spare copies of works likely to be useful they will make use of them in the manner indicated. Books on any branch of psychology, mesmerism, mind-reading, clairvoyance, spiritualism, theosophy, the occult sciences, physiology, or liberal and reform subjects, will be specially valued.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—The following circular has been issued:—"A general meeting of the members of this Society will be held on Wednesday, April 25th, at Willis's Rooms, King-street, St. James's-square, S.W. The president of the Society, Henry Sidgwick, Esq., will take the chair at 4 p.m. The meeting is open to members and associates. Members are at liberty to invite friends. Papers to be read: I. Mr. Walter H. Coffin, F.L.S., Report of the "Reichenbach" Committee. II. Prof. Barrett, F.R.S.E. Report of the Committee on Thought-transference; illustrated by diagrams. III. Mr. G. J. Romanes, F.R.S., Mr. F. Podmore, Report of the Committee on Mesmerism. IV. Prof. Barrett, F.R.S.E., On some Phenomena associated with Abnormal Conditions of Mind. V. Dr. Purdon, On Perturbed Vision in Sensitives. In addition to the general meetings, at which the official reports of the Society are read, the Council have decided upon holding meetings (at the rooms of the Society, 14, Dean's-yard, Westminster), which may be attended by members and associates, and at which they shall be at liberty to introduce one friend each. At these meetings papers will be read, and discussed, and occasionally experimental demonstrations given. The first two of these meetings will be on Tuesday, the 8th of May, and on Tuesday, the 26th of June, 1883, at 4 p.m."—Edward T. Bennett, secretary.

MRS. HARDINGE BRITTON will lecture at Newcastle-on-Tyne, April 22nd and 29th. Gateshead-on-Tyne, May 5th. Belper, May 13th. Cardiff, May 20th and 27th.—Address, The Limes, Humphrey-street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

THE "HARBINGER OF LIGHT" ON PROFESSIONAL MEDIUMSHIP.

The subject of mediumship, and more especially professional mediumship, is exciting considerable attention in London at the present time. Opinions are divided as to the advisability of countenancing or discountenancing professional media; but there seems to be a consensus of opinion as to the necessity of demanding more stringent conditions than are usually adopted in connection with persons professing to be mediums for the production of physical phenomena by spirits, and who are peculiarly interested in the evolution of such phenomena.

At a recent meeting of the Central Association of Spiritualists, London, Mr. Thomas Shorter, an old and respected Spiritualist (author of the "Two Worlds," and some minor works on Spiritualism), gave an address on Physical Mediumship, wherein he dispassionately reviews the situation, presenting the pros and cons with great impartiality, but coming to the conclusion that professional mediumship should be discouraged, not only in the interests of Spiritualism but of the mediums themselves.

We are aware that many will dissent from this conclusion, and a few years since we should have been amongst the number, but a careful observation of the effect of phenomenal mediumship upon the public mind and upon the exhibitors of it necessitates our endorsement of Mr. Shorter's opinion, as far as it relates to purely physical phenomena.

The strongest arguments that can be presented in favour of public physical mediumship are first, the comparative rarity of the power to evolve the higher class of phenomena; second, the improbability of those who are found to possess the power being able to exercise it to any appreciable extent without neglecting their ordinary avocations; third, that there are numbers of persons who cannot be convinced of Spiritualism by any other means.

Now, admitting the rarity of this class of media, though we have reason to think that the power is latent in a much larger percentage of individuals than is generally supposed, is there any valid reason why everybody should witness these particular phenomena? Are not the opportunities for personal investigation of the facts of astronomy, and many other branches of science, equally rare? What proportion of the civilised world who accept spectrum analysis as a fact have had the opportunity to personally verify it? Is it not infinitely better that men who are qualified by known intelligence and long practical experience in psychological science should systematically and philosophically investigate and report to the public their results, than that thousands of persons totally ignorant of the philosophy, and with opinions and theories as varied as their idiosyncrasies, should be presented with the bare fact? It is only by the practice of the former method, and the accumulation of scientific data, that a belief in phenomena so far beyond and apparently opposed to known laws as materialisation, and the passing of matter through matter, can become general.

It is well-known by those who have had any extensive experience in physical phenomena that mediums deteriorate in nervous and physical energy and become depleted of the mediumistic power by excessive application. Philosophical investigators would naturally gauge the generating power of their instrument, conserving the medium's energy to ensure the best results; and whilst their experimental meetings could, as a rule, be so arranged as not to interfere with the ordinary avocations of the individual, there should be little difficulty in remunerating him for lost time, without exciting his cupidity, as is too often the case where mediums are dependent upon results for a living. The third objection is an unsubstantial one, because, in the first instance, it overrates the influence of such phenomena which rarely convinces anyone of the fact of spirit intercourse, unless accompanied by some mental evidence proving the action of a distinct intelligence outside the medium and investigators; and, secondly, that in most instances where conviction is forced upon the individual he is, as a rule, not benefited one iota, his mind not being prepared to utilise the fact thrust into it, and which in many cases nothing but a morbid curiosity prompted him to seek for.

There are, however, other forms of professional mediumship to which these objections do not apply, and where scientific acumen is not an essential to conviction, plain common sense and a mediocre intellect being the only requisites for their examination. Among the most striking of these is the test-mediumship of such media as Charles Foster and Ada Foye, who have to our certain knowledge been the means of bringing conviction of the continued existence and identity of those passed from material life to their friends and relatives here. Purely physical phenomena dealing only with matter give no impulse to the mental and spiritual parts of the medium's nature, and unless he has a strong moral basis, or is supported by a circle with an equivalent, there is a tendency to moral degeneration; but with the mental phenomena the sympathies are constantly awakened and the higher moral faculties brought into play, tending rather to the elevation and development of the mediums, who cannot fail to be benefited by the emotions of love and sympathy that are constantly aroused within them.

It is urged by some advocates of the present system that numbers of good physical mediums will be thrown out of employ and unable to exercise their gifts if professional mediumship is discountenanced; but this objection, even if correct, is puerile. If the abolition of this form of mediumship is for the good of the many, the few, as in all other matters connected with the progress of the race, must give way; but as a matter of fact there are no mediums for physical phenomena who cannot by aspiration and application develop some higher form, and all those who cannot find congenial employment in some other sphere of usefulness may, with advantage to themselves and their fellows, climb a step higher. This is the true course of all media; they cannot remain stationary for any length of time; it is either advancement or retrogression.

"PSYCHISCHE STUDIEN" for April contains Mr. Riko's protest against public dark and cabinet séances. The little leaven is leavening the whole lump and no more useful work was ever taken in hand than the consideration of this question by the Council of the C.A.S.

THE CASE OF CHARLES H. FOSTER.—We are pained to announce that there seems no hope of the recovery of this once widely-useful instrument in the field of spirit-mediumship. Indeed, the cases of himself and his father are both hopeless so far as presenting any prospect of recovery.

MR. EPES SARGENT'S WORKS ON SPIRITUALISM.—The right of republishing these works in England has been entrusted by Mr. Sargent's literary and business executors to the Psychological Press Association. To meet the wishes of friends, the original plan has been slightly modified so as to ensure as wide a circulation as possible for these standard works. Full particulars will, we understand, be announced shortly.

THE TRANSVAAL.—The exploration of the mineral wealth of the Transvaal, which ranges from gold to coal, has not proceeded far, but the reports of the engineers who have been sent out from this country and America, conclusively establish that there is probably not a richer mining region in the world. Companies are, consequently, being formed to take over the concessions to which we have referred. Capital, and the civilising influences which must attend its employment in the enterprises now contemplated, will, therefore, of necessity sap the Boer stronghold far more surely than an army at Laing's Nek. Among the companies which are preparing to financially conquer the Transvaal, by far the most important would seem to be the South African Syndicate, of which Lord Robert Montagu is the chairman. The share list of this company, which was formed mainly for the purpose of exploring the gold-fields of the Transvaal, was closed a fortnight ago, and a new company is, we learn, in course of formation, with a capital of £4,000,000 or £5,000,000, to take over the business of the syndicate, and at once commence operations. Delagoa Bay will, it is believed, be before long connected with the possessions—amounting to some 2,000,000 acres—of the company by a railway, in the construction of which the King of the Belgians takes great interest.

UNCONSCIOUS MEDIUMSHIP.

By F. J. Theobald.

It is certainly most interesting and encouraging to see how our orthodox leaders, whilst either ignoring so-called modern Spiritualism, or persistently attributing it to the 'devil,' still do a good work, by teaching the most beautiful phase of it; that spiritual phase, most valued by all Christian Spiritualists, as well as by those who, without identifying themselves with any special religious movement, are glad to find confirmations of the truth of Spiritualism in the experience of the unconscious mediums of olden times, who had no language which they could apply to their own condition.

Not only is the doctrine of the "restitution of all things"—which is but another term for the Spiritualist's teaching of progressive spirit life—taught from many of our pulpits, and earnestly discussed in our leading religious papers, but our cheap religious tracts and magazines, issued by the tract societies for the especial benefit of Sunday-schools and the poorer classes, really abound in marked incidents of spirit intercourse, which could only occur under strong mediumistic conditions. For instance, quite recently I found a strictly orthodox friend revelling in John Bunyan's "World to Come." The book was a collection of his remarkable writings, published in a cheap form so that it might be scattered broadcast amongst "the million." My friend was incredulous, and shocked at my audacity when I assured her that the truest title would be "Spiritualism in the Life of John Bunyan," and I believe she was scarcely willing to lend it to me for the purpose of making the following few extracts in striking proof of John Bunyan's Mediumship.

The fact that his "Pilgrim's Progress" was given to him by spirit mediumship, as attested to by his own words in the introduction, is too well known to need quoting here. But it is possible that many are not aware that he was for years clair-audient; that what Spiritualists know as the "inner voice," was developed in him to a most remarkable degree, and was almost continual for years.

This is now a very ordinary form of medial power, and, unless it is understood (for which a knowledge of Spiritualism is necessary), it may cause great distress. It was often so to Bunyan, until he became convinced that the source of such communications was truly helpful to him in his times of deep religious depression. For want of space I will only give one or two instances. He was, like so many good people, perplexed beyond every thing by evil suggestions. At one time when especially tried, a spirit voice said to him, "Look at the generations of old, and see: did any ever trust in God, and were confounded? Begin at the beginning of Genesis, and read to the end of the Revelation, and see if you can find that there was ever any that trusted in the Lord, and was confounded?"

"So, coming home," says Bunyan, "I presently went to my Bible to see if I could find that saying, not doubting but to find it presently. For it was with such strength and comfort on my spirit, that I was, as if it talked with me. Well, I looked, but found it not, only it abode upon me. Then did I ask first this good man, and then another . . . but they knew no such. . . . Thus I continued above a year, and could not find it; but at last, casting my eye upon the Apocrypha books, I found it in Ecclesiasticus. . . . This at the first did somewhat daunt me, because it was not in those texts that we call holy and canonical; yet, as this sentence was the sum and substance of many of the promises, it was my duty to take the comfort of it, and I bless God for that word."

On another occasion he writes:—"I was much followed by the Scriptures: 'Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you.' (Luke xxii. 31.) Sometimes it would sound so loud within me that once, above all the rest, I turned my head over my shoulder, thinking verily that some man had, behind me, called me, being at a great distance, methought he called so loud. It came, as I have thought since, to have stirred me up to prayer and watchfulness: it came to acquaint me that a cloud and a storm was coming down upon me. But I understood it not. . . . About the space of a month after, a very great storm came down upon me, and handled me twenty times worse than all I had met with before." Bunyan tells us that at one time of his life he was so far influenced by a friend, who was an avowed Atheist, as to find his belief in God much shaken. To a man of so strongly religious and sensitive a nature, we may be sure this was a spiritual trial of no ordinary kind. So deep was his distress at last, that he was actually upon the point of committing suicide, when the "inner voice" expostulated with him so effectually that he says he "flung away" the instrument he was about to use, and, suddenly awaking to a sense of the enormity of his sin, and of gratitude to the "Invisible Eternal Power" which, "beholding his thoughts and actions," had thus stayed his hand, he knelt down to return humble thanks for his deliverance. On rising from his knees, he sat upon the grassy bank by the roadside, and was meditating upon this providential interference, when he says: "I was suddenly surrounded with a glorious light, the exceeding brightness whereof was such as I had never seen anything like it before. . . . Whilst wondering from whence it came, I saw approaching me, a glorious appearance, like a man, but circled round about, with lucid beams of inexpressible glory, which streamed from Him all the way he came. His countenance was very awful, and yet mixed with such sweetness as rendered it extremely pleasing, and yet I knew not how to bear his bright appearance. Endeavouring to stand upon my feet, I found I had no strength in me, and so fell flat down upon my face." Thus Bunyan describes the TRANCE condition into which he was thrown, even as Daniel the prophet does: "And I retained no strength. Yet heard I the voice of his words. . . . and my face was toward the ground." (See Daniel x. 8, 9.) Bunyan continues: "By the kind assistance of his arm, new strength was put into me, and I spake saying, 'Oh my shining deliverer, who has invigorated my feeble body, and restored me to new life, how shall I acknowledge my thankfulness, and in what manner shall I adore thee?' The spirit replied—(compare with Revelation xxii. 8, 9)—'Pay thy adorations to the Author of thy being, and not to me, who am thy fellow-creature, and am sent by Him, whose very Being thou hast so lately denied.' After some further converse the spirit said to Bunyan, 'Well, that you may never doubt, any more, of the reality of eternal things, the end of my coming to you is to convince you of the truth of them, not by faith only, but by sight, also; for I will shew you such things as were never yet beheld by mortal eye.' In astonishment Bunyan exclaimed, 'Oh! my God! who is sufficient to bear such a sight.' The spirit replied, 'The joy of the Lord shall be your strength. Fear not, for I am sent to shew thee things thou hast not seen. . . . For I am a ministering spirit, sent forth to minister to those that shall be heirs of salvation.'

THE "SOUTH AUSTRALIAN ADVERTISER" ON SPIRITUALISM.—Commenting upon the work undertaken by the Society for Psychical Research, this Melbourne paper says that whether their researches do or do not advance our knowledge of the mysteries dealing with the mind of man, it cannot be doubted that the records of such investigations have in themselves a distinctive social and historical interest. It considers "the fact that such men as Wallace, Crookes, and Zollner, should have been 'perverted' to a belief in what the majority regard as simple imposture, is in itself a curious phenomenon of the day. Without mentioning others these three had everything to lose and nothing to gain by expressing their belief in any reality behind modern Spiritualism, and in doing so they confronted a vast mass of scientific prepossession and social incredulity. Had they declared that after years of investigation they had discovered that all was false, their testimony would have been accepted by the world as conclusive." Just so: a kind of "heads I win, tails you lose" Court of Appeal to which intelligent Spiritualists may well be excused presenting their case.

THE PHENOMENA OF DEATH.—A Philadelphia physician has made a special study of the phenomena of death, both through his personal observations and those of others, and his conclusion is that dissolution is painless. "I mean," he explains, "that it approaches as unconsciously as sleep. The soul leaves the world as painlessly as it enters it. Whatever be the causes of death, whether by lingering malady or sudden violence, dissolution comes either through syncope or asphyxia. In the latter case, when resulting from disease, the struggle is long protracted, and accompanied by all the visible marks of agony which the imagination associates with the closing scene of life. Death does not strike all the organs of the body at the same time, and the lungs are the last to give up the performance of their functions. As death approaches, the latter gradually become more and more oppressed; hence the rattle. Nor is the contact sufficiently perfect to change the black venous into the red arterial blood; an unprepared fluid consequently issues from the lungs into the heart, and is then transmitted to every other organ of the body. The brain receives it, and its energies appear to be lulled thereby into sleep—generally tranquil sleep—filled with dreams which impel the dying to murmur out the names of friends and the occupations and recollections of life."

PROPHETIC DREAM OF DEATH

OCCURRING SIMULTANEOUSLY TO THREE MEMBERS OF A FAMILY.

In the beginning of the present year Mrs. Dawson was living at Worthing with her two daughters of the age of eighteen and sixteen. A young lady, called Nelly Clark, who had been a school-fellow of the Misses Dawson, was living at Tottenham, but there had been no communication between the families for a long while and nothing had occurred to bring Miss Clark to the thoughts of her friends, when, one night, about the middle of February, Mrs. Dawson and her two daughters each dreamed that Nelly Clark was dead. Mrs. Dawson dreamed that the intelligence of the death was communicated to her by Miss Wilbraham, a common friend of the two families. The eldest daughter only saw the blinds of the Clarks' house drawn down and seemed somehow to know that Nelly was dead. The other sister saw the hearse standing at the gate and the coffin brought out; while a sister of Miss Clark's was standing by crying, and Miss Wilbraham was also there, seeming to be much affected. In the morning Mrs. Dawson went into her daughters' bedroom, and was at once greeted with the exclamation: "Oh, mamma, we have both dreamt that Nelly Clark is dead!" "How strange," said Mrs. Dawson, "I dreamt the same thing."

Nothing was heard of Miss Clark for some time; and in the early part of March, on the subject of dreams being incidentally mentioned, Mrs. Dawson told her sister, Mrs. Showers, her own and her daughters' extraordinary experience.

Shortly after this, Mrs. Dawson had a letter from Miss Wilbraham, who occupied so prominent a place in the dreams. It was dated the 9th March, and contained the following passage:—"I saw Mrs. S. a week ago, and she told me that dear little Nelly Clark was gone to her heavenly rest." The news of the death led the family to task their recollection as to the night on which the dreams occurred, and though they were unable to fix the precise night, they concluded with confidence that it was not more than a day or two from the 14th February, and they gave that as the approximate date to Mrs. Showers, while as yet they were all of them ignorant of the day on which the death actually took place. It was afterwards ascertained that Miss Clark died of acute bronchitis on the 27th February. Though an habitual sufferer from the disorder, the illness that carried her off was very unexpected. As the attention of the Dawsons was directed to the date of the dreams as early as the 10th or 11th March, when they fixed it about 14th February, it is impossible that they could have been so far out in their recollection as not to leave a considerable interval between the night on which the dreams must really have occurred and February 27th, the date of the death. So that the dreams were undoubtedly prophetic, independent of the forecast of the part performed by Miss Wilbraham in the announcement of the death, about which there could be no question.

An incomplete account of the foregoing occurrence was published by Mrs. Showers in the Medium of 23rd March, and she kindly furnished me with further particulars. I also submitted my narrative to Mrs. Dawson, who vouches for the authenticity of the dreams, correcting a small inaccuracy into which I had fallen in my account of them.

THE FORTHCOMING LECTURES ON PSYCHOLOGICAL SCIENCE.

By the announcement in our advertisement columns it will be seen that the arrangements for the first three lectures of the series are now complete, and we understand that the details of the last three will shortly be published. A fresh circular has been issued by the C.A.S., of which we append a copy, and in doing so wish the Committee every success in their effort to present reliable information on Spiritualism to the public. If supported by the general body of Spiritualists in London we have no fear of the result.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS,

38, GREAT RUSSELL STREET,
BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.

I am desired on behalf of the Council of this Association to draw your attention to the annexed announcement, and to express a hope that you will feel disposed to shew your sympathy with the effort now being made to reach the general public, either by contributing to the Special Lecture Fund, or by subscribing for tickets, for which an early application is requested. These lectures having been designed specially for the benefit of the general public, the Council ventures to hope that all Spiritualists who intend being present will shew their appreciation by contributing in some way to the expenses, which are necessarily very heavy.

Yours truly,

T. BLYTON,

Resident Secretary.

MARRIAGE.

THEOBALD—HARRIS.—On the 17th inst., at Lewisham, by the Rev. J. Morlais Jones, ROBERT ERNEST THEOBALD, of Fernside, Hither Green-lane, second son of MORELL THEOBALD, F.C.A., to LOUISE, eldest daughter of the late GEORGE HARRIS, of Wilson-street, Finsbury.

TRANSCORPOREAL ACTION OF THE SPIRIT.

"If Physiology is ever to become a science—if we are ever to understand that mysterious Psyche which has hitherto baffled and eluded us, these mysteries of nature and of spirit must be better and more reverently studied than they have yet been. Let us hope that the simple and earnest faith of the past united to the scientific spirit of the present, will in the future find truer, higher expression in the fuller knowledge now dawning on the world through the light of modern Spiritualism."—THOMAS SHORTER.

The articles which have just appeared in the Fortnightly Review, from the pens of Messrs. Myers and Gurney—gleanings from the abundant harvest of facts gathered and gathering in by the Society of Psychical Research—regarding a well-known class of phenomena which these gentlemen have seen fit to designate "Transferred Impression" and "Telepathy" (March 1st, 1883), and "Phantasms of the Living" (April 1st, 1883), will have probably been read with much interest by the majority of readers of "LIGHT."

To some of these readers it may be interesting to have their attention drawn to an essay by "M.A. (Oxon.)," which appeared originally some years ago in the pages of "Human Nature,"—afterwards printed for private circulation in pamphlet form—relating to this particular phenomenon designated by him, as well as by certain previous writers on psychological subjects, "Transcorporeal Action of the Spirit."

This essay is illustrated with many very curious and striking facts in relation to this subject, collected from a great variety of sources, arranged and classified with great clearness and precision under certain heads.

These are three in number, namely, 1st, Phenomena, which he believes, throw light on the transcorporeal action of spirit.

2nd. He believes that the most usual form of manifestation is not accompanied with volition.

3rd. He believes, that more rarely transcorporeal action of the spirit is accompanied by volition. This when influenced by strong mental emotion.

Himself a "sensitive," and at the same time an earnest student and careful observer of psychical phenomena—possessed therefore of that esoteric knowledge regarding facts which can alone be gained by personal experience—the words of "M.A. (Oxon.);" cannot fail to carry a peculiar weight with them. The following extract from his essay will be of value to the reader, and a fit prelude to the following groups of facts gathered from a variety of sources:—

"The testimony of all sensitives, psychics, or mediums, i.e., persons in whom spirit is not so closely bound to the body as in the majority of individuals, agree in the consciousness they all have of standing in places, and observing people and scenes from a spot removed from that in which they know their bodies to be. Whilst employed in some occupation compatible with quietness and passivity, e.g., reading, meditating, or quiet conversation, they feel frequently a strange second consciousness, as though the eye had moved away through space and were busied with other scenes. This agrees with the only external indication of the mediumistic temperament with which we are acquainted; a dreamy, far-off, absent look in the eyes, as though the spirit were used to roam. (Did the use of that word 'absent' in this sense come about from this, we wonder?) No sensitive is without these interior feelings; and none would mistake the state for one of dream or reverie; and in many cases the subjective consciousness of wandering in spirit is confirmed by objective evidence."

The lives of the saints of the Roman Catholic Church abound with examples of "transcorporeal action of the spirit." Here is one from the life of Ignatius Loyola.*

"At that time, Ignatius was living at Rome, he appeared to Leonardo Clessellio at Cologne. Leonardo was a Fleming, and an aged and holy man, who was the first rector of the college in that city, and who governed it a long time with great reputation of sanctity. He had a most fervent desire again to see the holy father, and to have the happiness of speaking with him; he informed him of this desire in a letter, and begged as a great favour that he might journey over the three hundred leagues, which lay between them, on foot. Ignatius answered that the welfare of others required his stay at Cologne, so that he must not move, but that perhaps it might please God to content him in some easier way. Whilst he still remained at Cologne, one day, when he was not asleep, the holy father shewed himself to him alive, and held a long conversation with him. He then disappeared, and left the old man full of the greatest joy at the accomplishment of his desires in so marvellous a way. This account is taken from Ribadeneira."

In more recent times, in the experiences of the celebrated estatica, Catherine Emmerich, we meet with the following, quoted from Spiritual Magazine, Vol. VI., new series:—

"Catherine Emmerich, the estatica, who was for three years in a convent at Dalmien, we are informed by Clemens Brentano, for twelve years not able to turn herself in bed, and who took no nourishment, had the full persuasion that she went in spirit all over the world to help and heal the sick and the suffering. Went into prisons, hospitals, lazarettos, houses of correction, galleys, and the ships of pirates on her curative missions. She was confident that she went to Russia, China, and the Islands of the Pacific; to the mountains of Central Asia, as well as into the most remote valleys of Switzerland, Tyrol, Savoy. So sure was she of her real visits to these places and of effective service in them,—her body still in her bed, having a mysterious connection with her travelling and active spirit—that one night when she was sent to frighten some robbers out of a church which they were plundering, and by visible appearance as afterwards ascertained, chased them out of the bone-house in which they were carousing, she felt almost suffocated by the fumes of the bad tobacco which they were smoking. During this time she was seen in her bed to breathe with difficulty and to cough violently."

Such also had been the experience of Another Famous Estatica, Lidovina Schiedam*.

"On one occasion she said she had made a spiritual visit to Mount Calvary, in Jerusalem, and had ardently and repeatedly kissed the earth; on awakening she found her lips much swollen. On another occasion, in her spiritual travel she fell on a slippery pavement, and extremely hurt her leg, finding, on awaking, her leg most painful, and remaining swelled for many days. On a visit, in vision, to St. Peter's and other churches in Rome, passing through a thorny path, a thorn pierced her finger, and she found this thorn really in her finger on awaking. Her confessions disbelieved her visions, and refused her the Sacrament, which she said in consequence was brought to her by the Lord Himself."

(The writer is acquainted with a young woman of the humbler class, a Protestant, in London, who nightly—according to her own account—experiences "wanderings" of a very similar character. Her "phantasm" has been seen by other sensitive persons repeatedly, in confirmation of her descriptions of these nocturnal journeyings.)

Amongst the Methodists we encounter instances of the phenomenon. In the "Life" of that saintly woman, Mrs. Fletcher of Madelys, is the following account of the "Phantom" of a Young Collier.

"October, 1784.—As I was retired this morning at my ten o'clock hour, I was called down to Mary G. She gave me a strange account which I shall insert as she related it:—A short time ago, she said, she was one day going out to work in the fields, but thought she would first go upstairs to prayer. While on her knees praising God for the care He had taken of her children, she was amazed to see her eldest son, about twenty-one years of age, standing before her! She started up—but thought, 'Maybe it is the enemy to afflict me from prayer.' Casting her eyes again to the same spot, she still saw him there; on which she ran down into the kitchen, calling on the name of the Lord. Still, wherever she looked, she saw him standing before her, pale, and as if covered with dirt. Concluding from this that he was killed, she ran to her mother, who, on hearing the account, went directly to the pit determined to have him home if alive. On her drawing near the pit she heard a great tumult; for the earth had fallen in on him and two other men, and the people were striving to dig them out. At length he was got up alive and well, and came home to his mother pale and dirty, just as she had seen him! She then fell on her knees, and began praising God who hears and answers prayer."

The chapter in Mrs. Crowe's "Night Side of Nature," upon Doppelgänger or Doubles, chapter VIII., Vol. I.,† should be read by all persons interested in this subject, since it contains some of the most remarkable instances on record of transcorporeal action of spirit. Especially noteworthy is the last narrative, given by this lady, of a most tragic nature, "the facts of which," she assures us, "are perfectly authentic." The missing body of a murdered girl was discovered through the phantasm of her murderer—a surgeon's assistant, of Glasgow—having been clearly seen and spoken with—he declaring himself “a miserable man,” and gazing into the water in which the body of his victim really lay. The man himself meanwhile, by other persons, was seen seated throughout the morning's service in his pew at church. The thoughts of the wretched murderer doubtless had wandered persistently to the scene of his crime.

In the “Footfalls” of the Hon. Dale Owen also are given several perfectly authentic narratives relating to this phenomenon, which should be read by the curious. The history of “Why a Livonian School-teacher lost her Situation,” communicated by Mademoiselle de Guldenstubbé, who was in the school with this unfortunate teacher, is extremely remarkable. This young lady, a French teacher, a Mademoiselle Emélie Sagée, was beheld by the teachers, scholars and servants of the institution again and again in two separate forms to parade the place, until finally “it was completely proved by the double appearance of Mademoiselle Sagée before the class, and afterwards before the whole school, that there was no imagination in the case.” The effect of which was that the parents began to hear of this extraordinary phenomenon: timid girls no longer remained in the school; and the school thus losing its pupils, the unhappy governess had to be dismissed. Here is one of the numerous instances recorded.

“One day, all the young ladies of the institution, to the number of forty-two, were assembled in the same room, engaged in embroidery. It was a spacious hall on the front floor of the principal building, and had four large windows, or rather, glass doors (for they opened to the floor) giving entrance to a garden. There was a long table in the centre of the room; and here it was that the various classes were wont to unite for needlework. On this occasion the young ladies were all seated at the table in question, whence they could readily see what passed in the garden; and while engaged at their work they had noticed Mademoiselle Sagée there, not far from the house, gathering flowers, of which she was very fond. At the head of the table, seated in an arm chair, sat another teacher in charge of the pupils. After a time this lady had occasion to leave the room, and the arm-chair was left vacant. It remained so, however, for a short time only; for on a sudden there appeared seated in it the figure of Mademoiselle Sagée. The young ladies immediately looked into the garden, and there she still was engaged as before; only they remarked that she moved very slowly and languidly, as a drowsy or exhausted person might. Again they looked at the arm-chair, and there she sat silent and without motion, but to the sight so palpably real that, had they not seen her outside in the garden, and had they not known that she appeared in the chair without having walked into the room, they would all have supposed that it was the lady herself. As it was, being quite sure that it was not a real person, and having become to a certain extent, familiar with this strange phenomenon, two of the boldest approached and tried to touch the figure. They averred that they did feel a slight resistance, which they likened to that which a fabric of fine muslin or crape would offer to the touch. One of the two then passed close in front of the arm-chair, and actually through a portion of the figure. The appearance, however, remained after she had done so, for some time longer, still seated as before. At last it gradually disappeared, and then it was observed that Mademoiselle Sagée resumed, with all her usual activity, her task of flower-gathering. Every one of the forty-two pupils saw the same figure in the same way.”*

The Phrenological Journal for April, published by Messrs. Fowler and Wells, New York, contains an article entitled “The Trance State as Related to Sea Sickness and Surgery,” in which the importance of the mesmeric treatment of disease generally is strongly advocated.

THE “BOY'S OWN PAPER” ON SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA.—This magazine published by the Religious Tract Society, has an article entitled “Spiritualism at Home,” in which the “dirty white kid glove” and “fishing rod” arrangements are supposed to explain the modus operandi of spiritual phenomena. The statements made are so thoroughly absurd that they would not pass current with the veriest tyro in the subject, and we do not know that we are called upon to waste ink and paper on people who do not wish to know the truth about Spiritualism.

M. E. DE CYON AND THE LATE PROFESSOR ZÖLLNER.

By C. C. MASSEY.

In an article on “The Anti-Vivisection Agitation,” in the April number of the Contemporary Review, M. E. de Cyon makes the statement that the late Professor Zöllner was afflicted with insanity “towards the end of his life,” and “died mad last year.” As I have translated into English and published certain writings of Zöllner subsequent to the date (1877) at which, according to M. de Cyon, “the terrible malady had seized him,” I hope you will allow me to question an assertion for which no evidence whatever is offered to any unprejudiced mind. “M. Zöllner,” says M. de Cyon, “a very distinguished astronomer and physicist, belonged to a family every member of which is more or less touched with insanity. He himself, afflicted in addition with a physical deformity which condemned him to the life of an ascetic, was attacked, towards the end of his life, by the hereditary malady. He died mad last year. . . . The mental malady, the germs of which he carried within him, but which, till 1877, had shewn itself by symptoms intelligible only to the specialist, at last took possession of that fine brain, and—with the help of Spiritism—established its dominion there. Rambling discussions on Spiritism, on the fourth dimension, and on the supernatural powers of the medium Slade, published in the collected works of M. Zöllner, gave the first intimation to his friends of the terrible malady which had seized him.”

The words I have italicised sufficiently confess that at the date of the publications referred to those who had the best opportunities of observing had no other evidence of the supposed malady. Zöllner's polemical treatises are certainly discursive, and it may be permissible in an opponent to call them “rambling.” But in recording the facts he witnessed with Slade (for the most part in company with Wilhelm Weber, and Fechner, who fully confirmed him), he does so with all the clearness and precision of statement to be expected from a scientific observer. And the speculations on the fourth dimension of space (with which he believed those facts could be connected) are as remarkable for their coherence as for the learning and research with which he traces that hypothesis in the writings of some of the most eminent philosophers and mathematicians who ever lived.

The assertion that Zöllner “died mad” would convey to everyone the impression that at his death he was notoriously and admittedly insane. But his book against Vivisection (which I have not seen) was published last year, and as he died on the 28th April last year, it is evident that the statement cannot be allowed its full and natural significance. On the contrary, one must suspect that the whole imputation of madness rests on no better foundation than the fact that down to the last he held and expressed opinions highly unacceptable to M. de Cyon, and to the scientific world in general. Swift's demonstration of the death of Partridge, the almanac maker, that “no man alive could have written such nonsense,” appears to be the model on which M. de Cyon founds his judgment of Zöllner's insanity. Although not in direct correspondence with the late Professor, I had a message from him only a few weeks, I think, before his death. That “every member” of his family “is more or less touched with insanity” is a statement probably not more capable of proof than justifiable in regard to propriety and good taste. It is, however, unfortunately true that one, at least, of the family is, or was, thus afflicted, Zöllner himself referring to the fact in one of his treatises, in feeling terms and on a relevant occasion. Such a handle to prejudiced and ungenerous opponents was not likely to be neglected; and, accordingly, the injurious suggestion was made against Zöllner as long ago as 1872 (within the period described by M. de Cyon as “the most brilliant of his scientific activity”), on the publication of the second edition of his book “On the Nature of Comets.” The scientific merits of that work having been soon widely recognised, the imputation was held over till the next pro-vocation to prevalent opinions.

Professor Zöllner gives the history of his personal controversies with colleagues and former friends at some length in his “Treatises,” a fair perusal of which leaves a very different impression from that which an uninformed reader of M. de Cyon's statements will receive. As regards his later relation to the vivisection question, he explains that it was occasioned by reading Ernst von Weber's “Torture Chambers of Science,” and by the moral repulsion caused in him by the language and pretensions of physiologists. He also describes the impression made upon him one day when visiting Herr Ludwig, the Leipzig vivisectionist, who conducted him to “a remote apartment,” where, however, their conversation was disturbed by the cries of a dog undergoing vivisection, and he was struck by their similarity “to the expression of extreme human agony” (“die Aehnlichkeit, welche zwischen dem Ausdruck des höchsten Schmerzes eines zu Tode gemarterten Hunde und dem Ausdruck des menschlichen Schmerzes in höchster Angst und Todespein stattfindet”). But even in writing of this incident, he was so little carried away by his feelings that he expressly declined to make anyone morally responsible for defect of sensibility, making some just and calm observations on differences between individuals, and on the effect of custom, in this respect.

The proximate occasion of his rupture with Professor Ludwig was when the latter came forward as one of the governing body of the Leipzig Society for the Protection of Animals, and in a gushing speech, “which moved the public almost to tears,” extolled the virtues of sympathy and sensibility as not less essential to human progress than understanding itself. This was too much for Zöllner, with his knowledge of his colleague's proceedings, and he let his sentiments become known. M. de Cyon states that Zöllner had at one time himself witnessed and been interested in certain experiments, seemingly of a very painful nature, performed by the former upon pigeons. But in view of the following declaration in the third volume of Zöllner's Treatises (Introd. p. 65) it is allowable and necessary to ask if M. de Cyon ever published this statement while Zöllner was living to answer it? Speaking of Professor Ludwig, Zöllner says, “He knew how little possible it was for me, by reason of the ‘warmth of feeling’ and ‘strength of sensibility,’ which are characteristic in me, and which are esteemed so highly by him in his speech, to be present at even the most insignificant vivisection.” (“Er wusste, wie wenig ich im Stande war, vermöge der mir eigenthümlichen und von ihm in seiner Rede so hoch gepriesenen ‘Wärme des Gemüthes’ und ‘Stärke des Empfindens,’ auch nur der unbedeutendsten Vivisection beizuwohnen.”)

I have been disappointed in my wish to challenge these imputations on Zöllner before a more general public than the columns of “Light” will reach; and now, no doubt, every appeal to Zöllner's testimony will be met by the assertion of his insanity, as though that were a proved and admitted fact. The anti-vivisectionists (with whom I am in the warmest sympathy) are afraid, I presume, of any apparent association with Spiritualism. I cannot address this letter to the Contemporary Review, for I have no right to be considered as a representative of Zöllner in this country, and, therefore, cannot claim the exceptional privilege of a hearing for so special a purpose in a periodical which does not admit correspondence.

I can only hope, and that not with much confidence, that the generally acknowledged folly, inaccuracy, and intemperance of M. de Cyon's article will discredit even statements in it which will be thoroughly acceptable to common prejudices.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.

SECOND SERIES.

This series of Spirit-Teachings, like the former, is made up of selections from a great mass which have been automatically written during a series of years. They are selected on no other principle than that of printing what has been valuable to the person for whom they were originally given, in so far as this can be done without trenching on what is merely of personal and private application. The latter consideration excludes a great mass of what would otherwise be interesting and valuable matter. The phraseology has been preserved, as far as possible, intact, names only being omitted. The series follows directly on the first, from which, indeed, it is separated only by the accident of its publication in another journal, and after some considerable interval of time. The publication is resumed in deference to many repeated requests.

M.A. (Oxon.)

No. XXXVIII.

You evidently put aside the pretensions to knowledge of me and my mind which M. put forward. As to messages lately given, can you tell me of the source?

Rest assured that in all cases those who have communicated with you have acted under our direction, and with permission from us. It is, moreover, by virtue of the very mediumship they affect to despise that such intercourse has been possible. Nay, the rare cases in which spirits still in the flesh have reached you have been possible, because they have possessed in a higher degree of development the faculties which exist in you. Our friends misconceive when they confine what is called mediumship to that passive receptivity which is amenable to the influence of unembodied intelligence. As you will hereafter prove by your own experience, through the lower form power passes in those who are found worthy to the higher and normal state of development in which the embodied human spirit associates consciously with us, asserts its own inherent powers, and acts, not as before under direct control, but by inspiration and of its own will. You have the analogy in your own life. The child is governed by the matured will and experience of his parent, guardian, tutor, governor. When he has gained experience and has grown to discretion he is suffered to act alone, or with such guidance and advice as is found possible. Correction should be past: discretion may not have come, but such measure of it as is possessed is acted upon. There are in men various degrees of it. Some never attain to it. Some are weak and foolish and pass through their earth lives under the dominant influence of the nearest will. Some act impulsively and by passion rather than reason. But in all, after the youth of probation there comes the period when they must, as you say, act for themselves. It is so with mediumship. In the vast majority of cases the medium, given up to the control of the unprogressed spirits who surround him, and made the prey of the curiosity of those who come in contact with him, never escapes from his childhood, never learns to walk alone. He is, as it were, kept in swaddling clothes, an exhibition to those who marvel at his infantine endeavours to walk. But the days come when men will be educated beyond this; and they will learn then that the efforts of the spirit to vindicate for itself its normal powers, though aided at first by controlling and directing intelligences other than itself, are in the end permitted to develop into the action of a soul self-responsible and self-directed, amenable only to the same sort of indirect guidance and advice as falls to the lot of even the wisest and best of men. Our friends in America have dimly seen this when they told you of the natural-born magician. They vaguely said that the medium should develop into the magician; or rather, that the spirit, which in its inceptive efforts was governed and controlled by disembodied intelligence and so enabled to act, should, in its full growth, arrive at a time when its action should spring from its own volition, and receive only inspiration and advice. But they have applied the knowledge badly. They have failed to see that mediumship runs through the embodied life: that passivity in the child is not incompatible with activity in the man; and so that the medium, controlled and governed from without, may so learn to use his own inherent powers as to become the adept. They have missed this.

That is a striking view. Then there is no necessary antagonism between mediumship and magic? The man who does not possess the faculty which we call mediumistic, i.e., whose spirit is prisoned—what of him?

Do not rest either in mediumship or magic. Magic is only or principally phenomenal. Aim at the cultivation of the inherent powers of your spirit. The man who has never recognised the faculty, or been conscious of its exercise, must endeavour to develop it. To some the power is denied. Their progress must come in an after state. All are not on the same plane of progress. We long since told you that mediumship is a quality appertaining to the spirit body, and not to the body of flesh.

Yes. I am a little perplexed as to the identity of Magus. The name has been used by more than one communicating intelligence.

But that is very bewildering.

No; you are too much concerned about curious questions of identity. These names are but convenient symbols for influences brought to bear on you. In some cases the influence is not centralised; it is impersonal, as you would say. The result is what you have to look to. You concern yourself too much with these things.

No; but I want to understand.

Learn, then, that in very many cases the messages given to you are not the product of any one mind, but are the collective influence of a number. You should know that we so act. Many who have been concerned with you are but the vehicles to you of a yet higher influence which is obliged to reach you in that way; and in many cases, also, the messages are the reflex of the assembled minds.

You speak of disembodied mind?

Assuredly. We have our minds even as you. We deliberate, we consult, and, in many instances, you receive the impression of the result of our united thought. Our object is to teach, and we use the best means. As time passes, you will be able to join in our consultations, and to listen to our arguments. For the present they would not be intelligible. You must learn to cultivate the powers of your spirit, to subdue the flesh, to rise above your earthly surroundings, to view your external life only as the preparation for the inner and true life. When you can lead a sentient life in spirit, you will see what now you only dimly fancy, that ours is the reality, yours the shadow-world. You will see causes operating, and recognise results when they come. This is the prophetic state; the only possible condition of foreknowledge. You will be enabled also to learn consciously as you now do unconsciously during the absence of spirit from the body. This is the true means of spiritual progress. It is incompatible with absorption in the affairs of earth, but by no means so with daily and successful labour. It is incompatible with the lower forms of mediumship. Hence we have withdrawn you from them. We do not desire to cultivate in you the abnormal. Hence we communicate sparingly in this way when you are surrounded with worldly influences. We wish to bring out the normal powers of your spirit. Your periods of rest suffice for direct instruction. Seek, as far as may be, to keep your eye fixed on this as an end.

Yes; one learns so little, one's life is so frittered away; so full of follies and trivialities, of fighting the air, or contending for minutiae.

It is needful to be done, and part of your duty to do it. Be content; you learn what is possible for you. You are not able to do more. Occupy yourself less and less with externals; cease to fight for non-essentials; be content to wait. Watch and pray. The life you should lead would be one of isolation. Your time is not yet come for that. You have other work at present.

When will it be over?

Again you are impatient. Be content to wait.

I want to be sure that I understand what you mean. You seem to imply that your influence was exerted over me unconsciously all my life: that there came a period when it was made manifest in objective mediumship: that the period of physical mediumship gradually gave way to mental, i.e., automatic writing and trance: that these are now ceasing and are giving place to the more interior mediumship, which consists more expressly in the exercise of the powers inherent in one's own spirit, but dormant in most persons. In short, complete control is giving place to advice and personal guidance: and abnormal to normal mediumship. If I am right in this, I want to ask how far the cultivation of such an interior state is compatible with my work.

You have rightly understood. We have already told you that the cultivation of this state in such measure as is at present possible is not incompatible with the discharge of your duties. Be content without further questioning.

Very well. I have a letter here to which I am going to reply. It is no use asking you general questions; but there are some points that concern you, and I want to quote your comments on them. In speaking of me, the writer says: "If I do not understand you (which I deny), others with whom I have relations do. . . . If you are profoundly certain that I have not understood you, both your intuition and mediumship have failed you. . . . I never said that you had mistaken 'Imperator' for another spirit. . . . If I had, it would be falsehood. 'Imperator' is not to be mistaken once that he is known. . . . Then comes the story of Jacob wrestling with the angel. . . . and she asks, Is it not so with you and him? Ask 'Imperator' if it is not so. He knows, and his name be blessed for ever. . . . You want objective proof of the Lodge. Have you not, 'Imperator'? And cannot you ask him whether I speak the truth, or, rather, whether Lodge, &c., is not all hallucination?"

We can but give general answers to vague questions. We have already told you that our American friends neither understand your character, nor your training, nor your spiritual experiences. You may, however, derive from them some knowledge on the general bearing of principles and practice. The less you bring in personal matters with them, the less likely you are to be misled. So far from your intuition having failed you it has protected you. We are not able to say how far any with whom your correspondent is in communication, can give a correct account of you. It is doubtful, so far as we know, though some have the power, as Magus. But even he does not understand. His work is other than ours, and he is not concerned with your inner life. If any have the power they have not been willing to exercise it. We do not understand whether it is pretended that we ourselves have given any information. It seems that the hint is conveyed, without direct statement. We may say clearly that we have at no time held any intercourse with your friend on the subject of which she speaks. She does not know or speak with us; though she has the power of ascertaining facts concerning us. We told you at first the object with which you were placed in communication with her. We say again, let that intercourse be as impersonal as possible. Assuredly you would not mistake any other for us. It would be impossible. We are what we have revealed ourselves to you: no other; and our name and presence could not be taken by any other. The reason why this has been so in the case of Magus is that the influence was transitory, and was designed to be as impersonal as possible, for reasons which you will understand when you know them. We ourselves are permanently your guardian, and none other takes our place. We are not aware what is meant by the allusion to Jacob. It is not important. Nor can we give you any information about the Lodge. We have already said so. Wait. Do not ask more.

+ IMPERATOR.

[The above follows consecutively on No. 37, and was written towards the end of the year 1875. The allusions to communications from living persons refer to some few messages received from MAGUS, a name I never could identify. It was said to be used by various spirits, one being still in the body. But I never found out who that person was, and "Imperator" evidently did not encourage the experiment, or fully approve of it. He permitted it for purposes that he described, but he spoke with relief when it was over.]

AN UNSOUGHT SEANCE WITH MISS WOOD.

By Morell Theobald.

I am one of the committee now sitting for test sances with Miss Wood, and with them fully recognise the difficulty of getting exactly what we want under such rigid conditions as are there imposed. Miss Wood has been my visitor for the last week, and on Saturday evening my wife and I, with my son, daughter, and Miss Wood were sitting in the dining-room, severally reading and talking, when raps came upon the table, no one being actually sitting at it. The playful little spirit, "Pocha," was there, and would not be neglected. After answering questions, she wanted the alphabet, and spelt out the following sentence:—"Would you like me to intrance the medium?" I at first objected, not wishing to filch power which, as a host, I was conserving; and especially as Miss Wood had kindly promised to sit at our family seance the next evening. But, in a few minutes, Miss Wood was in a trance and speaking vivaciously (not her normal manner) on all sorts of family gossip. This child-spirit was amusing herself with photographs, and, after a while, said she could play cards, so we got a pack, and, at her request, we banded the medium's eyes with a silk handkerchief. This was very satisfactory to us and to "Pocha," who said "she could now see better." And, doubtless, she did; she knew every card that was thrown down, and ended by playing a game at whist, in which "Pocha" was my partner, against my wife and son, the result being that we won, "Pocha" never playing a false card.

Our servant, coming in, could distinctly see "Pocha" playing cards—she being a good clairvoyant; and she was amused at the gusto and mischievous look of "Pocha," the little black child-spirit, as she scored her tricks. So far as we saw there was Miss Wood completely blindfolded; who could deal out, and sort her cards into suits, and then play absolutely correctly so as in fact to win the game against good players. "Pocha" on leaving assured us she had not exhausted the medium and begged us to sit on Sunday evening, at which she promised to "do her very best."

On Sunday evening we all sat in our usual manner, round the dining-table, having extemporised a cabinet in one corner of the room by means of a large clothes horse covered with railway rugs and a pair of curtains opening in front. Outside, and by one side, we placed a chair upon which was a black cardboard box with marked paper and pencil inside, and lying on it a speaking tube which has seen good service; inside the cabinet I placed a musical box only.

We commenced with a short reading and prayer, and then sang. "Pocha" soon came and talked away for half-an-hour, then "Benny," the Scotch control, whose influence was very different. They said it was a bonny circle, and we should have a materialisation.

We now, at "Pocha's" directions, slightly altered places and positions so as to form a horse-shoe round the cabinet, with Miss Wood in the centre, in sight of all.

The light, which had been full, was turned down so that we could just see one another and the objects in the room, notably, Miss Wood, whose head and shoulders were covered with a white antinacassar.

After about a quarter of an hour sounds were heard in the cabinet; then the box was taken in, and we heard it moved about and the pencil writing; the tube was thrown about, and then the chair, with a great noise, was taken in and knocked upon the floor, which, being the edge of the room and covered with floor-cloth, must have caused the noise to be heard next door! Then the musical box was started on its round of tunes, all this time Miss Wood sitting still, and "Pocha" continually returning to talk through her.

Two of our circle who are clairvoyant could see the invisibles busy at work in one corner of the cabinet, which soon opened, and we could then see a white hazy form for a considerable time. The white haze was distinctly visible to me and others ascending from Miss Wood's head, and going into the form at the corner of the cabinet; in fact, Miss Wood seemed to grow into the form as though she were its root! Some were getting tired, and one had to leave very soon, so as we were told it might be half-an-hour before the power was sufficient for the form to come out, we broke up and hope to complete another time. The form was not one ordinarily coming through Miss Wood, but one of "our group" who has promised me ere long to but as a test of Miss Wood's mediumship and power under harmonious conditions I ask you to record these few notes, trusting to add to them another time. On going into the cabinet afterwards I found the paper with "my very best" badly written upon it; this was a small result from such audible pencil scratching as we had heard:—the box also had some scribbling inside it.

"Take the vacant chair beside us;"

I have not troubled you with the more interesting phenomena to us, occurring through our own clairvoyance, because they might be construed into fancy! The facts of physical movement occurring in undoubted disconnection with the medium, and the building up of a form distinctly seen by us apart from her (although not complete) are enough for my purpose now.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM, CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51, MORTIMER STREET, LONDON.

"MAN'S GOD."—As the title of a lecture to be delivered under inspirational influence, what does this mean? An accurate and precise description of the Deity by one who knows? and of the Deity in particular relation to man's needs? Possibly. But this was not the view of their duty taken by the conscientious controls of Mr. Morse, who, on Sunday last, at the Cavendish Rooms, undertook to grapple with the question. As approached by them, it rather meant a portrayal of the God of man's invention, the offspring of the creative fancy, of the wayward blundering theories, or of the fears of man's own troubled intellect and palpitating conscience, fleeting and changeable as the epoch and place of the unfoldment, so that man's God meant, for the purposes of this lecture, the God of man's making simply, and not the one ineffable Supreme, with whom is no variableness nor shadow of turning. There was, indeed, a delicate approach to the further idea involved in that extended appreciation of the words which would embrace the higher demands of the actual facts, and associate God with the very essence of humanity, and with natural law; and the passages of this tendency were absorbingly interesting in proportion to the reserve of strength and characteristic beauty of conception thus disclosed; but in the main the subject was treated under the limitations indicated, and the thesis was advanced that man's God is always the outcome of man's variable spiritual condition and culture.

If, then, the ideas formed of the being and attributes of God are, so to speak, rude, crude, and barbarous, or merely fanciful, involved and contradictory, they equally represent the faith or the wishes, or the apprehensions, of those who propound them. Belief in a God, or Gods, seems, speaking generally, to have been a central necessity of the thought of the world from the very birth of humanity; and that, not because man either is, or has been usually, very much concerned about problems which he is apt to regard as insoluble, but because the human instinct, or innate consciousness, suggests the reality of the existence of a certain supersensuous something to which it owes its being; and there can be little doubt that every form of idea or sentiment concerning God, in the past and in the present, represents simply so much effort on the part of the soul of man, to determine the character of its connection with that supersensuous something. Has the world succeeded in finding the Supreme Being, or—to put it in another way—has the world yet arrived at an adequately worthy conception of that embodiment of Love, Justice and Wisdom, required by the conditions of the problem? As we are talking of the man-made God, we can but affirm that your intellectual journeymen have made Him ill indeed.

The first idea introduces this power in the polytheistic form, finding God in natural objects of all kinds, in the seasons, in the thunder and behind the storm; now beneficent, now malefic, as love or fear predominated; and the idea is associated with rites and ceremonies of childish innocence or sanguinary cruelty. Following upon this, and the advance of thought and growth of mind, the scattered God-powers of Polytheism are concentrated into a few of commanding resources. Then comes the stricter dualistic notion, the personification of good and evil; and eventually, perhaps, the preponderating, or solely-existing All-wise and good One. But this is not final, for as the problems of life are solved, God is put aside altogether, and Nature brought to the front. Why do we speak of these all as man-made Gods? Because they are not, in truth, the outcome of revelation, or of ascertained fact, but have been formulated simply to extricate man himself from difficulties, largely of his own creation, and certainly suggestive of the character of his God. It is not possible either to dissociate them from their various sources, whether individual or national, or to connect them with the broad general interests and good of humanity at large: they are born of systems of prevailing thought, and pass away with their decay.

If, then, you pursue the conception of one God, are you to endow Him with personality? to regard Him as a magnified and superior representation, in form, of the best among yourselves, and then to attach Him specifically to particular races or churches, because these are the inheritors of a certain order of ideas? In that case, whatever else He may be, He is not the God of humanity at large, and we must advise you to broaden your views. What do you esteem as your own persons? Not your several limbs, nor your body, nor this or that special feature of either, but your thought, your consciousness, the something behind the outward form that survives the wreck of worlds, so that your personality, while an adjunct of your existence, is also its abiding element. Why not apply the principle of this operating agency to the Supreme? You are the microcosm, representing therefore the greater God. If you believe in the continuity of existence, a God is needed equal to universal supervision; a Divinity of diffusive powers or elements, vitalising any department of being: an omnipresent God. You further require an omnipotent Being, and if you also demand omniscience we reply there can be no valid objection to such a conclusion. It is a subject of profound lamentation with many of you, we know, that a disbelief in the more-or-less conventional God of your day and generation is spreading. We counsel you to look for a further development of this feeling; but then you will do wisely to regard it simply as an inevitable reaction from old and untenable ideas, to be certainly followed by a truer appreciation of the one universal and gracious Power, of whom or of which we speak as our Father and our God. But will that be only another one of man's Gods? No, it will not, said the lecturer, with special emphasis and solemnity. You will advance under the influence of inspiration, of experience, and of thought. We of the spirit world can assist only partially, for our powers are limited by your faculty of appreciation of spiritual conditions. Amend and raise your desires, and that process will carry you forward, while stagnation among current fallacies will check in you that deeper understanding of the works of God which alone leads to worthy conceptions of His nature. In conclusion, we submit one consideration. The time shall come when the Ineffable, who is the All-wise and the Omnipotent, shall establish the supremacy of the Divine mind, and man shall learn that obedience to the laws of nature and regard for the general harmony of the spiritual conditions of being, are demanded alike by the needs of his own existence, and the then indisputable attributes of his God.

The lecturer, under influence, rose again, and the controls said that thirteen years ago it was in that very room that they first used Mr. Morse as the instrument of their public utterances at meetings of this kind in London. They added that the audience was then much smaller than the present; but the work prospered; the hall soon filled, and they expressed their belief that similar or greater success awaited us now. . . . Finally, the president announced that Sunday, the 6th May, would be appropriated as a "ballot night" for question and answer, upon the plan so successfully introduced on the 8th inst.

On Sunday next, the 22nd inst., the topic will be "God's Man."—B.S.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

(With which is incorporated the British National Association of Spiritualists. Established 1873.)

33, GREAT RUSSELL ST., BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.
(Entrance in WOBURN STREET.)

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed for the purpose of uniting Spiritualists of every variety of opinion in an organized body, with a view of promoting the investigation of the facts of Spiritualism, and of aiding students and inquirers in their researches by providing them with the best means of investigation.

The Association is governed by a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Council of thirty Members elected annually.

The Reference and Lending Libraries contain a large collection of the best works on Spiritualism and occult subjects. Spiritualist and other newspapers and periodicals from all parts of the world are regularly supplied for the Reading Room, to which Members have access daily.

The Secretary, or his representative, is in attendance to receive visitors, and answer enquiries; on Saturdays, from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.; on other days from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. On Sundays the Rooms are closed.

Spiritualists and others visiting the Metropolis are cordially invited to visit the Association and inspect the various objects of interest on view in the Reading Room and Library. Information is cheerfully afforded to enquirers on all questions affecting Spiritualism.

Members' Free Rooms are held on Wednesday evenings, at 8 o'clock prompt subject to certain regulations, which can be ascertained on application.

Discussion Meetings are held fortnightly during the winter months. Admission free to Members and Subscribers, who can introduce one or more friends to each meeting. Programmes can be obtained on application during the winter season.

Societies, at which all friends are welcome, are held at intervals during the season. An admission fee is charged, including refreshments.

Per annum.

TERMS OF MEMBERSHIP.

Country members, with privilege of voting at all General Meetings, and the right of using the Libraries when visiting London ... 0 10 6

Town members, with privilege of voting at all General Meetings, the use of Reading Room and Reference Library, and the right of taking out one volume from the Lending Library ... 1 1 0

Town members to be understood as those residing within the Metropolitan postal district.

Light refreshments are provided at moderate charges.

Prospectuses of the Association and forms of application for Membership can also be procured from the several allied Societies at home and abroad.

All communications and enquiries should be addressed to the Resident Secretary, Mrs. THOS. BLYTON, 33, Great Russell-street, W.C., and Post Office Orders made payable to him at the Great Russell-street Post Office. Cheques to be crossed "London and General Bank, Limited."

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon)."

One of the most curious specimens of ancient spiritualistic literature that I have seen is the Supernatural Magazine, for 1809, "containing ancient and modern supernatural experience, in testimony to the truth of revelation respecting the immortality of the soul, a future state of rewards and punishments, together with various wonders of the invisible worlds." This magazine was published in Dublin by Wilkinson and Courtney, 6, Wood-street, and survived just four months, from June to September. Among the contents of the 128 pages, which was the limit that an unkind public allowed it to reach, we have a curious narrative of apparitions and visions seen by Dr. Pordage in 1649. He was an eminent member of the Philadelphian Society, and Rector of Bradfield in Berkshire, and was in the highest repute for his piety by many spiritually-minded persons. He seems to have retired from his ministry and to have devoted himself entirely to the cultivation of the inner life. He was accused before the "Commission for ejecting scandalous ministers" of "entertaining at his house one Everard a reputed conjurer," i. e., I presume, medium, and generally of seeing visions of a dragon, apparitions, and the like.

The poor man confesses himself a dreamer of dreams, and a seer of visions, and pathetically asks "Pray was not Job a pious, sincere, and eminently righteous man? yet how was he seared with dreams and terrified with visions." "Did not John in a vision behold a great red dragon that made war with Michael and the holy angels? I beseech you to consider whether this earth be not the place where the devil walks up and down, seeking whom he may devour! How then can Bradfield or any other place be exempt from his appearing when God permits!" All which is very conclusive, yet the doctor seems to have been driven to apologise for his doings and dealings with the devil in this earth on which he walks up and down. His own narrative is curious and interesting. He recounts how the double of his medium Everard, "with his wearing apparel, band, cuffs, hat, &c., appeared in his bedchamber in the middle of the night," and how divers horrible apparitions, "very terrible to the sensitive nature, and such as might have caused a great distemper in it," beset him on the same night. In the course of his experiences, profoundly instructive to all students, and specially so to any who have shared them in even a small degree, he was intromitted into two spiritual worlds, one of darkness in which dwelt the creatures whom he so graphically describes:—"Very monstrous, terrible, and affrighting to the outward man. . . . Appearing in the shapes of lions, dragons, elephants, bears, and such like terrible beasts. . . . Men monstrously mis-shapen, with ears like those of cats, cloven feet, ugly legs and bodies, eyes fiery, sharp, and piercing." These annoyed him in various ways, drawing "figures of men and beasts upon the glass windows and the ceilings, some of which yet remain." They also impressed on the bricks of a chimney "the whole visible world, in the form of two half globes, as in the maps," and numerous other drawings.

The worthy doctor, mistrusting these signs of diabolic presence, endeavoured to wash them out with wet cloths, but could not. They were burnt into the brick. His annoyances, however, were more personal than this. His senses were assailed one by one; his nose with "noisome, poisonous smells, so that both the inward and outward part of those that were exercised with them became much disturbed and offended"; and his mouth with "the loathsome, hellish taste of sulphur, brimstone, soot, and salt, mingled together." Moreover, on his body he found "material impressions from the powers of darkness, very noxious in themselves to our natural spirits and life." And having thus wrestled with the Dweller on the Threshold, and having conquered by prayer, and faith, and an unflinching courage, his eyes were opened to see the hosts of those with whom he was beset. What a sight! "I must add," he devoutly says, "that, were but the eyes of men opened to see the kingdom of the dragon in this world, with the multitudes of evil angels, which are everywhere tempting and ensnaring men, they would be terrified, and would not dare to be by themselves without good consciences, and a great assurance of the love and favour of God in protecting them by the ministration of holy angels." It was thus, as many have been before and not a few since, that the perseverance, faithfulness, and courage of "this great saint" (so he is called) were proved as by fire.

Having come through the ordeal, he was intromitted into a world of light in which, as his dark experiences had been of horror and disgust, of sensible assault and trial, so here he beheld nothing but what was lovely and pure. He saw the Manahaim or Host of the Lord, "multitudes almost innumerable of pure, angelical spirits." His ears were ravished by the most perfect melodies, and his senses permeated by the perfection of those things that could minister gratification to them, savours the most enticing, odours of Paradise, exalting the spirit, and soothing it after conflict. "Thus, for the space of three weeks or a month, were we exercised inwardly and outwardly through that great conflict which was betwixt those two worlds, and their inhabitants." It was with him as so many have found it parable of instruction to all who take on themselves to lift the veil that hides from our eyes what many of us could not bear to look on.

When the month of trial was past till he wrote his defence, "for four years, ever since the time of these great manifestations, we have enjoyed the exercise of our spiritual senses which never since have been shut." A more instructive and typical record of the regeneration of a soul and its initiation into a higher sphere of spiritual life I never read. The book contains much else that is of great interest; some very good ghost stories, such as that of the apparition of the Laird of Cool; some striking narratives of prophetic warnings; and some curious accounts of the practice of animal magnetism in those remote times, not to mention a case of prolonged fasting and levitation. It seems that Mrs. W., a widow, of Dublin, was confined to bed by a general debility of her frame. She fasted and professed to receive visits from angels, and to receive revelations from Heaven. "She appeared so spiritualised that the specific gravity of her body was balanced by the internal buoyancy, and before several witnesses she rose up in a horizontal position." The story breaks off abruptly with a hint that the poor woman, "having passed a night of great horror of mind, with wild and despairing looks instead of the sweet, placid beauty of countenance which had hitherto been remarkable for serenity," confessed "I am a deceiver." Whether the confession was imagination, or the phenomena were indeed spurious, does not appear very clearly; "but the following fact was left without doubt, that there was generally in her room a star like a spark of bright fire, sometimes stationary, sometimes moving. Two or three persons saw it as a clear, shining globe of light." So that it would seem the race of whom it is hard to say whether a particular specimen is a self-deluder, or a deluder of others, or a genuine medium, dates far back.

The narrative of Dr. Pordage is especially instructive in its bearings on the two Spirit Teachings last published; and is a very remarkable parallel to my own experience at the time when these teachings were written.

THE ATTITUDE OF PROFESSOR DELITZSCH TOWARDS SPIRITUALISM.—The Rev. Joseph Cook, in the course of a Sunday lecture in Boston, states that Professor Delitzsch when asked as to the proper attitude to take concerning Spiritualism, put his hands over both ears, and shut his eyes tightly and closed his mouth. If this is true, and we must confess we accept it with the greatest reserve on account of the notorious untrustworthiness of all Mr. Cook's statements, it certainly is a striking illustration of the general attitude of the scientific world towards Spiritualism. However, "he laughs best who laughs last," and sooner or later Spiritualism has forced investigation on even the most unwilling, and that with one result, viz., the conversion of the bitter opponent into the warm and earnest advocate. It is only a question of time.

CARLYLE ON THE SUPERNATURAL.—"That the supernatural differs not from the natural is a great truth, which the last century (especially in France) has been engaged in demonstrating. The philosophers went far wrong, however, in this, that instead of raising the natural to the supernatural, they strove to suit the supernatural to the natural. The gist of my whole way of thought is to do, not the latter, but the former. I feel it to be the epitome of much good for this and following generations in my hands, and in those of innumerable stronger ones. 'Belief,' said some one the other night, 'has done immense evil; witness Knipperdolling and the Anabaptists, &c.' 'True,' rejoined I with vehemence, almost with fury, (Proh pudor!); 'true, belief has done some evil in the world; but it has done all the good that was ever done in it—from the time when Moses saw the Burning Bush, and believed it to be God appointing him deliverer of His people, down to the last acts of belief that you and I executed. Good never came from aught else.'"

Extract from "Journals," 1833:—

"Neither fear thou that this, thy great message of the natural being the supernatural, will wholly perish unuttered. One way or other it will and shall be uttered—write it down on paper any way; speak it from thee—so shall thy painful, destitute existence not have been in vain."—Carlyle's "Note Book," March 31st.

REICHENBACH'S FLAMES.

Professor Barrett has contributed to the Philosophical Magazine for April, 1883, the following very valuable note on the Alleged Luminosity of the Magnetic Field:—

It is well known that the late Baron von Reichenbach claimed to have discovered a peculiar luminous emanation arising from the poles of a magnet, resembling a faint electric discharge in rarefied air. This peculiar luminosity was only to be seen in a perfectly darkened room, and even then was only visible to certain persons. Since the publication of Reichenbach's elaborate investigations on this subject numerous attempts have been made by competent observers to see this luminous smoke; but these attempts have generally resulted in failure*; and amid the few cases of success that are recorded (such as by the late Professor Gregory and by Dr. Ashburner) I can find no evidence that proper precautions were taken to avoid the effects of imagination, of deception, or of chance. It is not surprising therefore that the discovery claimed by Reichenbach has been very generally discredited among scientific men in all countries. It has, however, always seemed to me very difficult to explain away the abundant, and in some cases weighty, testimony which Reichenbach adduces—such as the evidence of Professor Endlicher, and others in high social position, who in their normal healthy condition describe these appearances in minute detail, the luminosity they assert springing into existence whenever the magnet was excited, as if a phosphorescent cloud had suddenly been created over the magnetic poles.

Affirmative statements of this kind, however foreign to our present knowledge, are surely worthy of respectful inquiry; and though my own attempts to see the glare have been entirely unsuccessful, I prefer to think some of the necessary conditions of the experiment—such as extreme sensitiveness of the retina—have been absent in my case, rather than conclude from my want of success that the phenomenon has no existence.

Considerations such as these led the recently formed Society for Psychical Research to appoint a Committee to repeat Reichenbach's experiments with the object of testing their accuracy, when a wide range of individuals were examined. As a member of that Committee I have lately been present at a course of experiments, where a remarkable verification was afforded of the fact that, to certain eyes, a faint luminosity accompanies the creation of a powerful magnetic field. The evidence, so far as it goes, seems to me so absolutely unexceptionable that I venture to ask you to place on record a brief statement of the facts so far obtained. The positive evidence afforded by the experiments now to be described cannot be annulled by the fact that on subsequent occasions the trials were, as I am informed, less successful. It is, I think, not unreasonable to conclude that conditions, not yet understood, were sometimes favourable, sometimes the reverse.

The experiments were made in the rooms of the Society, No. 14, Deans Yard, Westminster; one of these rooms was so arranged that it could at pleasure be made into a perfectly dark chamber, no glimmer of light being perceived even after an hour's immersion in the darkness. A powerful electro-magnet was mounted on a heavy wooden stand, and stood by itself in the centre of the room; wires led from the magnet to a commutator in another room, and thence to a large Smee's battery outside. Three observers (Mr. Walter H. Coffin, the Honorary Secretary of this Committee, Mr. Edmund Gurney, and Mr. E. R. Pease) were in charge of the commutator, making and breaking the current at their own pleasure and noting down the exclamations made by the observers in the adjoining darkened room, the voice being easily heard through the intervening curtains. In the dark chamber were Mr. F. W. H. Myers, Dr. A. T. Myers, Mr. H. N. Ridley, and myself, and in addition, on a subsequent occasion, Mr. W. R. Browne, together with two persons who, on a preliminary trial a day or two before, had declared they saw a luminous glare over the poles of a permanent steel magnet. These were Mr. G. A. Smith and a boy, Fred. Wells, who is an assistant in a baker's shop; both of them were entire strangers to these experiments up to the time of our preliminary trials, and disclaimed any knowledge of Reichenbach's work. In the first instance they were not told what to look for, but merely to note if they perceived anything amid the darkness, and if so, what and where.

For some time after entering the dark chamber nothing was seen, though during this time the electro-magnet was frequently excited. After about half an hour had elapsed, Wells and subsequently Mr. Smith declared they saw a faintly visible smoke in the room; being asked where, each in turn led me directly up to the magnetic poles as the seat of the luminosity. One pole (the north-seeking pole) they said was brighter than the other. The luminosity was described as like two waving cones of light, with the apex of each cone on the magnetic poles; the breath was able to deflect but not to extinguish the glow.* It was not intercepted, they said, by a black velvet cloth nor by a deal board laid flat over the poles, but they declared it was at once obscured when these bodies were held between the eyes of the observers and the magnet, the absolute darkness being of course preserved continuously. When the current was cut off, both the observers simultaneously exclaimed that the light had disappeared.

The current was now at irregular intervals made and broken, by means of the commutator in the next room, and the exclamations of the observers in the dark chamber noted down by those who had charge of the commutator. The commutator worked noiselessly; and no indication whatever was given of the moment when the current was to be put on or taken off. During the experiments Mr. Smith stood near the magnet, touching one of us, and remote from the curtains which separated the dark from the lighter room beyond.

After a few preliminary trials to test the arrangements, a consecutive series of observations extending over an hour was then made by Mr. Smith. From time to time during this period the observers in the next room silently and unexpectedly closed or interrupted the current, the intervals being purposely varied from a few seconds to several minutes. In this way fourteen consecutive trials were made; and in every case except one the exclamations made by Mr. Smith, such as "Now I see it," "Now it's gone," were absolutely simultaneous with the movement of the commutator—according to the unanimous report of the witnesses in the adjoining room. In the one exception referred to, a delay of five seconds occurred between the breaking of the current and the exclamation: this, however, may easily have been due to a momentary relaxation of attention on the part of Mr. Smith. The strain on the attention was indeed so severe, that after the fourteenth observation Mr. Smith complained of considerable pain in his eyes and head and was obviously much exhausted. During a succeeding half hour two or three farther experiments were made; but the results were uncertain, and may, I think, be fairly excluded. It may be noted that Mr. Smith and Wells did not at any time appear to have unusual powers of vision for the objects in the darkened room.

It is obvious that a series of accidental coincidences between the act of closing or opening of the circuit and the exclamation of the observer cannot explain the facts here noted. As there are 3,600 seconds in an hour, to hit off any one right moment by pure chance would be very improbable; but the chances against success increase in geometric progression when fourteen right moments are successively hit off. The probabilities against mere coincidence as an explanation are therefore many millions to one.

* So far as I could judge, the appearance must have resembled the long ascending stream of faintly lambent aqueous vapour which is to be seen far above the flame of pure hydrogen, when viewed in a well-darkened room. I have referred to this luminosity in my paper on "Some Physical Effects produced by a Hydrogen-flame."—Phil. Mag., November, 1883.

More important was the possibility of indications being afforded by the act of magnetization and demagnetization, which might give notice to the observer and suggest to the imagination the conversion of an illusion into a fancied reality.

Of these indications the so-called "magnetic tick" at once suggested itself. Knowing precisely what to listen for and therefore more keenly alive to the sound than Mr. Smith, who presumably knew nothing of this molecular crepitation, I failed to detect the faintest sound on the "making" of the circuit; and a barely audible tick on "breaking" contact was heard only when my ear was in close contact with the magnet or its support. This was due to the massive character of the magnet and stand, which also prevented any other discernible movement when the magnet was excited. Further, I satisfied myself that, at the distance at which Mr. Smith stood from the magnet, it was impossible to discover when the circuit was completed or interrupted by the attraction of any magnetic substance about one's body; as a precaution, however, Mr. Smith emptied his pockets beforehand. At the same time it is quite possible a skilful operator, bent upon deceiving us, might be able to detect the moment of magnetization and demagnetization by feeling the movement of a concealed compass-needle. Against this hypothesis must be placed the fact that no information was given to Mr. Smith beforehand of the nature of the experiment; and he had no object to serve by professing to see what he really did not see. Ultimately all scientific observation rests upon the good faith of the observers; and there was nothing to arouse the smallest suspicion of the good faith of the observer in the present instance.

Similar experiments were made on another evening with the boy Wells, with fairly satisfactory results. In the case of Wells the luminosity, from his description, must have appeared to be brighter and larger; and on the interruption of the circuit it was not instantly extinguished, but rapidly died away; his frequent exclamation on breaking the current was "Oh, you are spoiling it."

Wells was also tried in the dark chamber with two permanent horseshoe magnets, and saw the luminosity clearly on both. Unknown to Wells, I silently changed the position of the two magnets; he at once detected where they were placed. Holding one of the magnets in my hand, Wells told me correctly whether I moved the magnet up or down or held it stationary; this was repeatedly tried with success. In this case the poles of the horseshoe were very close together, so that there was a small intense magnetic field; from the juxtaposition of the poles no effect could be produced on a small compass-needle at one-tenth of the distance at which I ascertained Wells actually stood—supposing, which is highly improbable, that the lad had the intention to deceive and knew how to attempt it.

Numerous questions of interest suggest themselves, such as the photographic and prismatic examination of the luminosity and whether the light is polarized or capable of being polarized, or whether the rarefaction and removal of the air around the poles affects the luminosity. The answer to these and cognate questions, together with the examination of some remarkable collateral phenomena that presented themselves—such as the variation of the intensity of the light when viewed in different azimuths, or along or across the magnetic axis, and the effect of certain bodies on the light—will become the subject of investigation by the Committee whenever the testimony to the simple fact itself has been sufficiently well established by various observers. The object of the present note is merely to demonstrate that there is a strong prima facie case in favour of the existence of some peculiar and unexplained luminosity, resembling phosphorescence, excited in the region of the atmosphere immediately around the magnetic poles, and which can only be seen by certain individuals.

The Preparation of Inquirers and the Graduation of Phenomena. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In your issue of the 14th you request an expression of opinion on the topic of "The Preparation of Inquirers for Investigation, and the Graduation of Phenomena."

I have only written to-day that which for many years I have thought. Spiritualists generally are much too desirous to place the marvellous phenomena of which they have themselves been witnesses before their friends and the general public, utterly regardless of the fact that the phenomena themselves are so antecedently improbable in the estimation of the great mass of even educated persons, and besides that, the interest in the investigation of the phenomena is very feeble in the minds of the majority of mankind.

At the present stage it is desirable that all who enter upon the inquiry should have some mental, moral, and spiritual adaptation to the subject, and, if possible, should have some practical knowledge of the occult forces that are manifest in cases of mesmerism, biology, clairvoyance, &c.

It is absolutely useless for persons without a moderate share of musical genius to study music, or persons without natural mechanical skill to study practical mechanics; both would prove failures; and so it is in reference to the investigation of spiritual phenomena—they are far beyond the capacity of a large proportion of people either to appreciate or rationally to investigate.

I am further of opinion as the result of much experience that even observers who are most adapted satisfactorily to investigate the subject ought to be gradually led into the arcana, elementary phenomena being presented to them in the first instance, and when they have been satisfactorily examined, the phenomena that are more occult and advanced.

Spiritualists have been much too eager to place before untrained and often prejudiced observers a class of phenomena that can only be accepted as genuine when they have undergone crucial investigation by those who have observed the preliminary aspects of the manifestations.—I am, yours truly,

Newcastle-on-Tyne, T. P. BARKAS.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

DEAR SIR,—The suggestion contained in your columns of 14th inst., is, for various reasons, a welcome outlook for the cause so dear to those who are now reaping its benign influence.

I consider it the duty of those who are leaders of public Spiritualism to make a supreme effort to establish it, not only on a religious basis, which is the first essential, but also to pursue its philosophical and scientific aspects.

I believe the majority of true Spiritualists will admit that "phenomenon craving" has been carried too far, and that the time has now arrived when something more elevating to the soul should be studied.

I have several friends who have never been blessed by attending séances, and yet through their reading of various works on the subject are as staunch Spiritualists as any in our ranks.

There is a time for all things, and with judicious management each phase can be made a blessing to mankind. None can find fault with seekers after truth for wishing to see, hear and feel for themselves, but when once convinced of the fact that Spiritualism is God's truth, then a higher development ought to be desired.

A happy step in the right direction (all thinking and well-meaning Spiritualists will admit) was taken when a few leaders of the cause issued their circular on séance conditions, which was taken up by the C.A.S. This is now lessening, and will continue to lessen, to a large degree, the mania for injudicious dark séances, which have been the principal cause of bringing such disrepute on Spiritualism.

I, therefore, feel very thankful that you, as editor of "LIGHT," should take the initiative in opening your columns for the consideration of the preparation of inquirers for investigation and the graduation of the phenomena, a subject which I hope will prove of service to the cause.

One thing I regret, and that is, the high price of your weekly, though I know full well that were your subscribers sufficiently numerous, the price would be lowered accordingly. Let, then, all well-wishers to a cause given by a bountiful Providence for the elevation and blessing of mankind, put their shoulder to the wheel to push along the heavenly chariot by each doubling his subscription, and distributing the extra copies amongst friends; and, as there is nothing like giving effect to words as deeds, I will thank you to send me an additional copy weekly.—Believe me, yours truly,

A JERSEY CHRISTIAN SPIRITUALIST.

A Séance with Mr. Husk.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Allow me to report a most successful séance held on Tuesday, the 17th inst., at Mr. Younger's, 23, Ledbury-road, the medium being Mr. Husk.

There were, I think, twenty-two or twenty-three persons present,—in my opinion rather too many for ensuring success; many of the sitters were also entirely new to the phenomena; but on the other hand, six were powerful mediums, without counting Mr. Husk, and the séance proved a perfect success.

After the usual singing, &c., and the appearance of lights which some saw and others did not, we heard the winding-up and playing of the musical box, and as this ceased some beautiful chords were struck on the piano by invisible power.

We next heard the Oxford chimes playing, alternately very loud and very soft, over our heads, the piano joining in unison with the chimes, the latter forming also an accompaniment to one of the songs sung by the company. The voice of "Irresistible" was next heard chatting freely with the company, and shortly after he materialised, showing himself to us by the light of a luminous slate, and as he heard me speak French to a lady who I had thus introduced to her first séance in England, he at once began to speak to her in excellent French and then addressed me in the Spanish language. John King now announced his presence with a stentorian voice, and had kindly words for all present. We heard also the voice of one who is known as the "Actor," but who could only articulate sounds without being able to express himself. The gem of the evening, however, was a song in the Lancashire dialect from a spirit who had passed his earth life in that county, a song which for originality of words and tune, and perfect execution, is not easily forgotten. Being quite delighted with it I begged for a second verse, and the spirit at once complied with my request, but broke down in the middle, saying he could sing no more. The séance lasted over two hours, and when light was again introduced we found the invisibles had placed on the table a glass shade with its contents and a china stand with flowers. Moreover, a heavy brass ring, which the medium had brought and laid on the table previous to the séance, was found encircling his wrist, and a chair linked on the arm of his next neighbour, who assured the company that she had never for a moment disengaged her hand from that of the medium. I must not omit to mention the fact of a diamond ring being taken from the finger of one lady and placed on that of another; also of a lady, a total stranger, being lifted with her chair off the ground.

Mr. Husk is certainly one of the most powerful and satisfactory of sensitives.—Very truly yours,

G. DAMIANI.

STRANGE PRESENTIMENT.—Intelligence has just been received in St. Ives of the death of Mr. Israel Quick, who about a month ago left the town to become mate of one of the vessels belonging to Messrs. Fox, of Falmouth. From information just received, it appears that the vessel left Falmouth for Brazil about a month ago. On the voyage the vessel encountered heavy winds and much sea. So fierce and strong was the gale that the mast, being unable to withstand it, suddenly snapped in two, and fell upon Quick, who was on deck at the time of the accident. Death must have been instantaneous, for it does not appear that the poor fellow spoke a word after the accident. The news of the calamity has completely prostrated the wife, who is now left with two little children. One remarkable feature about the fatality is that the deceased's little boy—who is very intelligent-looking—dreamt about a week ago that his poor father was killed. He awoke in the night and said to his mother—"Mother, I've dreamt that father is killed." Widespread sympathy is felt for the wife and the little children.—Western Daily Mercury.

WRAITH OF A BROTHER KILLED IN BATTLE.

Miss Schau, from whom I had the following communication, is a Danish lady, who has long been known to me and my family, and is held in the highest respect by us all.

H. WEDGWOOD.

"It was during the Danish-German war, in 1848-51, that the following event happened to me. I had five brothers serving in the Danish army. After a successful campaign during the summer of 1851, the Prussians had been driven out of Jutland, and, pursued by the Danish army, had retired to the south of Sleswick. We were every day expecting to hear of a last and decisive battle. I was then at Odusa, the capital of the island of Funen. On the 14th of September, in the evening, some travellers from the western part of the island brought the news that a heavy cannonading had been heard the whole afternoon, and that probably fighting was going on between the two armies. As great secrecy was observed about the movements of the armies, I had no idea where my brothers were placed, or whether they would be in the engagement or not. I had no presentiment of any kind, but, of course, went to bed with my mind full of anxiety for what next day might bring. My bedroom was in communication with another very large room, the door between the two wide open, and my bed opposite the door. I think I had slept for some time; I know that I suddenly started up on hearing the door of the other room open, but so gently that I was not sure of the fact. I listened, and then heard a heavy dragging step slowly advancing towards my room. It is now (April, 1883) more than thirty years since, and even now I cannot forget the feeling of unspeakable anguish that crept over me when I saw something formless and shadowy move towards me, and remain standing beside me. I uttered the name of my eldest brother, the dearest of all to me, as I to him, and then probably lost consciousness. When I recovered, I saw nothing more, but my thoughts remained fixed on that brother. The next day brought the news of the battle of Midsunde. My eldest brother had had the command of the artillery. He had seen the enemy fly, and was just giving his final orders, when a Prussian bullet hit him on the upper lip, pierced his brain, and killed him on the spot.

"EMMA SCHAU."

ANOTHER SEANCE WITH MISS WOOD.

By John S. Farmer.

Last Sunday I was present at a séance with Miss Wood under what were to my mind very satisfactory conditions, the results also proving equally good. The light was sufficient for observation, each member of the circle being able to see his or her neighbour, the medium, and various articles of furniture, ornaments, &c., placed about the room. The cabinet had been formed by covering a good sized clothes-horse with rugs and curtains. A small cane-bottomed chair was placed by the side, distant, say, three feet from the centre opening of the cabinet curtains. Miss Wood herself sat by my side and in the circle, being quite six feet from the cabinet and at a proportionately longer distance from the aforesaid chair. I saw her every movement most distinctly throughout the séance; her feet were also tucked underneath her on her seat, which was a large library arm chair.

Immediately we sat down, "Pocha," controlling the medium, said we should have a good séance; and then continued to prattle away, in her lively, child-like manner, throughout the evening, with only one or two intervals, during which she said she had been "to see what they were doing"—meaning the invisible workers.

We sat down at 8 p.m. In about a quarter of an hour raps were distinctly heard on the chair outside the cabinet; and after asking for directions, and getting suitable answers, we relapsed into conversation and also engaged in a little singing. Presently the aforesaid chair began to shew signs of movement. "Pocha" said they were trying to take it into the cabinet. In this, however, they were not successful, but accomplished what to me was far more interesting, because I saw what was being done, and also the manner of its accomplishment. Gently and gradually the chair began to sway, and in a few minutes shifted very slowly, and by jerks, a couple of inches at a time towards the cabinet, the scraping of the legs being plainly heard as it was thus moved across the carpet. When it had been drawn close to the aperture, it was then suddenly thrown over, falling half way towards the medium. It was then picked up again, taken to the cabinet, and then thrown once again, this time falling close to my feet. All this was distinctly seen by all. We had sat for form manifestations, but our invisible friends said they had done what they were sure of being able to do, in preference to attempting what they might not have been able to accomplish.

I am very pleased indeed to add my testimony to Mr. Theobald's, the more so as Miss Wood is determined for the future always to sit in view of the circle, and in light sufficient for observation.

THE FORTHCOMING LECTURES ON PSYCHOLOGICAL SCIENCE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

Special Lecture Fund.

SIR,—In connection with above, and in response to some inquiries which have been made of me, it may be desirable to state, for the guidance of intending contributors, that the expenses of the six forthcoming lectures are estimated at £70. Probably, there are some of your readers who may recognise the importance of the work, and desire to aid accordingly.

Yours faithfully,

SPIRIT TEACHINGS BY "M.A. (OXON.)." 1ST SERIES.—We have been asked to announce that this volume is being rapidly pushed through the press, and that subscribers will receive their copies in due course.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—The second part of the Proceedings of this Society has just been issued. It contains much valuable matter to which we shall give attention in an early issue of this journal.

THE LIBRARY OF THE C.A.S.—We understand that Mr. S. C. Hall has kindly presented some volumes to this library, as also has Mr. Tibbitts, of Walsall. Full particulars of the presentations will appear in the usual course.

THE REV. JOSEPH COOK advocates the formation of an American Dialectal Society for the purpose of investigating Spiritualism. "Let them expose these tricks thoroughly," he says, "for the purpose of putting an end to mischief of enormous proportions." Just so. Perhaps Mr. Cook is not aware that a similar society was formed here, that the best men were put into it for the purpose of exposing "these tricks" as they are called, and that coming to scoff they remained to pray, their report establishing the reality of the tricks they wished to expose in almost every particular!

MRS. HARDINGE BRITTEN will lecture at Newcastle-on-Tyne, April 22nd and 29th. Gateshead-on-Tyne, May 5th. Rochdale, May 13th. Halifax, May 20th. Belper, May 27th. Liverpool, June 3rd and 10th.—Address, The Limes, Humphrey street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

SPIRIT IDENTITY AND RECENT SPECULATIONS.

By "M.A. (OXON.)"

The question of spirit identity is one extremely difficult to square with some of the most recent speculations, which claim also to be some of the most ancient, touching the nature of spirit and human individuality. Theosophists denounce the use of the word "spirit" by us as loose, inaccurate, and, in fact, indefensible. They tell us that the so-called spirits of the séance-room are not really spirits, in any proper sense of that misused word, but only shells, reliquies of what were once individual men, with a survival of a memory, refreshed from time to time by recourse to that storehouse of all ages and of every event—the Astral Light. These fragments of what were once men are in no sense spirits, and should rather be called Ghosts (I suppose our friends would say), being, indeed, shadowy and evanescent, and on their way to extinction. They are but the pale reflection of that spirit, the inner principle, the true self, which they no longer contain. It is not there: it is risen; or, perchance, has fallen to its own place.

So that when I say that the spirit of my friend, Epes Sargent, for example, has communicated with me, I am not accurate. I should rather say—assuming the whole story not to be delusion on my part, or personation on the part of some vain-glorious spook with a talent for histrionics—that certain external principles which had once belonged to that entity, and had constituted part of the composite being which made up his complete self, had given me, from the survival of earth-recollections, some facts. These, they would say, would be found to be probably unimportant, and, even as volunteered evidence, only moderately satisfactory. Such communications they would regard as going no way towards proof of the tremendous assumption which they were supposed by Spiritualists to demonstrate; and, in point of fact, they would contend that when sifted, they threw upon the average belief in the return of departed spirits the gravest doubt. They would tell me that in a short time I shall find my friend dropping out of my life, unless unfortunately he be earth-bound, and so an extremely undesirable companion. He will get vaguer and vaguer, paler and more shadowy, with less interest in me and my life, and less memory of earth and all its concerns, until he will die out—that external part of him that has communicated with me here—and I shall seek in vain for further messages.

This, on the best view of the case. But, far more probably, they would tell me that my friend never came near me: that his care for earth and its memories was extinct, and that he was, being what he was, reposing now prior to his next incarnation. This is the assumption, and no amount of evidence shakes it, for just as the average man of science says, "I do not know where the flaw is, but I am sure there is a flaw in your evidence," so the Theosophist says, "You are talking nonsense. It is extremely unlikely that you are right in your suppositions. It is not impossible, indeed, but very unlikely, that a pure spirit should communicate with earth in this way; it does not descend here, but the medium rises to its pure abode." It would be rude to say that the facts are against such theories, and that when theories are opposed by facts, they must give way sooner or later. This would be so, no doubt, within the domain of exact human knowledge, or of speculation that is not entirely airy. But we are dealing here with something beyond the range of human science, and we have, as yet, no exact standard of judgment. When anyone tells us that such and such things cannot be, we have a right to ask—why? and even to suggest that, in these matters, we are all comprehended in one common ignorance. And we have a right, further, to apply to our investigations the ordinary scientific method, which is not to theorise and then gather facts to support the bubble we have blown, but to amass facts with laborious persistence until it is possible to generalise from them with some show of fairness. It is early days yet to limit us with theories, or at least with a theory, to prescribe for our acceptance a rigid dogma which is to be binding on us as a matter of faith; and I, at least, have found no theory that was not at open variance with some ascertained facts; none that did not break down when tested; none that was, in simple directness and applicability, any approach to the theory of the Spiritualist, and, for the matter of that, of the spirits too. But this is, probably, because my facts square with that theory, and are not explained by any other that I have met with as yet. I am, however, both ready and willing to keep a listening ear and an open mind.

I have very recently had means of studying this question of identity afresh, and of adding one more to the pile of facts that I have accumulated. The story that I am about to tell is by no means without its difficulties, and I do not record it as one that offers any definite solution of an abstruse problem. But it has its interest, is instructive in its way, and has the merit of being recorded with literal accuracy. I have changed all names, because I should, probably, cause annoyance to friends whom I have no right to annoy. With that exception the story is absolutely exact.

It is necessary for me to be retrospective, in order to make myself intelligible. About ten years ago I received, in unbroken sequence, extending over several years, a great number of messages purporting to come from departed human spirits. These spirits—I must use the word, for life is too short for reiterated periphrases—found me at first very sceptical about them and their concern with me. I cross-questioned them at great length, and did my best to pick a flaw in their statements. These were of an ordinary autobiographical nature, involving minute facts and dates—a sort of skeleton map of their life on earth—and were given in various ways, by raps, by tilts, by automatic writing, by trance-speaking, and so forth. The various means adopted were always adhered to, and I did not succeed in detecting, as other less fortunate investigators unquestionably have, organised fraud or even sporadic attempts at deception. Applying the methods which I should apply to a case of mere human identity, I could detect no flaw. And I may say, in a parenthesis, that I have a right to claim from this a positive result. When a story is told by a large mass of witnesses, where each is tested by such methods as man has found most suitable in his daily life, and where none breaks down, where no flaw is found, no lack of moral consciousness discovered, these witnesses have established a title to our belief in their veracity. They may be under a delusion: or like the Scotchman's grandmother who had seen a ghost, they may be dismissed as her grandson dismissed her, "My grandmother does na ken it, pair auld body, but she's an awfu' leer." I, however, found no sign of the lie.

Among these invisible interlocutors of mine was one whom I will call John Lilly. He had communicated chiefly through the table, and had selected for himself an extremely distinctive sound. It was quite unmistakable, and for many years it was a thoroughly familiar sound. Then it gradually died out, and remained only as a memory: and even that became faint, and I seldom recalled it. From this spirit, as from many others, I received various items of autobiographical information, facts, dates, and particulars which, since he was a man of mark, I was able to verify. They were exact in every particular, so far as they were susceptible of verification. Some were personal, and I did not find any record of them, but when I did find any record, it corroborated the information given me by Lilly.

Some years had passed since Lilly had apparently dropped out of my life. He had done what he had to do, and had departed. This year a friend whom I had not seen for some ten years invited me to stay with him for a few days. He had settled in a new home, and was within my reach. I, therefore, went to dine with him and spend the night. It was a dinner-party, and I had little conversation with my friend before retiring for the night. I soon fell asleep, and was repeatedly disturbed by raps and noises which though I had not heard them for years, were very familiar to my ears. I was soon wide awake, and satisfied myself that I was not dreaming. The raps were all over the room, but I did not receive any message by means of them. I was sleepy, and disinclined to give myself trouble, though quite wide awake enough to be certain as to what was going on. Raps there were, no doubt, and prominent among them that peculiar sound which Lilly had made his own. It was unmistakable, and I sat up listening to it until I grew tired, and fell asleep again wondering what could possibly have brought that sound, so long absent, there and then, in a house I had never before entered, and at the dead of night. It mingled with my dreams all night through, but in the morning it was gone, and I thought no more of it.

After breakfast my friend shewed me round his garden, and pointed out to me what a curious old house it was that he occupied. "It has its history, too," he said, "it was once occupied for some years by a man whose name you may know—John Lilly!"

There was the secret, then. I had by going to the old house in some way touched a chord of memory that brought that spirit again into rapport with me, and had caused him to break the silence of years. I pondered deeply over the occurrence, and was disposed to think that I might have heard of him in connection with the place, either from his own communications or from some book in which I had sought for their verification. I took pains to turn out the records in which I have preserved a detailed account of his words and my verification of them. But I found no mention whatever of his connection with the place then inhabited by my friend. Other things were stated, but not that he had ever lived there. Nor was there in the book which I had consulted any mention of that special fact. I am quite clear that I went to his house totally ignorant of any connection of his with it, and that that connection had never been brought to my notice at any antecedent period.

Now, there is here interesting material for speculation. 1. Was that spirit, the individual John Lilly (as I have chosen to call him) who had lived in that house? What maintained the connection between him and it? And why did the fact of my sleeping in a bedroom which had been his incite him to disturb my repose by a noise which I should naturally associate with his name? Assuming that there was a good reason for his first coming to me (as I believe there was) why, having lapsed into silence, did my going to his house cause him to break that silence? Had he been present all through those years, and made no sign of late, because of the reasons that have kept others silent—reasons good and sufficient—and was he now at last moved to call my notice once again? Then why not speak or make some communication? Was he unable to do more? or was it not permitted to him?

2. If this was but the external shell of the real John Lilly, am I to conclude that his memory—or the memory of his external principles—was stirred to activity by my visit? How then? for that was not the link that bound him to me, nor was it in any way connected with his coming to me at all. Was it a mere accident? and would the same manifestations of his presence have taken place anywhere else where I might chance to be? I cannot say this is impossible, nor even very improbable: but it is rendered unlikely by the repeated cases of connection between special places and special spirits that I and others have frequently observed. This connection has, indeed, been extremely noteworthy in my experience. And since many and many a decade has now elapsed since John Lilly left this earth and hundreds and hundreds of decades since some others who have visited me, what am I to conclude as to the gradual—the very gradual—extinction to which these shells are being subjected?

3. If a personating spirit has been posturing as John Lilly all through these years, what a very remarkable power of acting, and what a very complete knowledge of his part that spirit must have! The actor blacked from head to foot, the better to personate Othello, is not to be compared to this thorough-going relic of what was once a man! What must he have been when complete!

These and various other questions that arise will receive different answers from minds of different complexions. Probably no answer that can be given in our present state of ignorance will be so satisfactory as to command general acceptance. But to one who has had such experience as I have had of similar occurrences the explanation of the Spiritualist will seem, I have no doubt, the most satisfactory, and the least open to objection. The more subtle Eastern philosopher will apply that explanation which he derives, not from his experience (for he shrinks from actual meddling with those whom he regards as wandering shades to be sedulously avoided), but from his philosophical speculations, or from what he has taught himself to accept as the knowledge of those who can give him authoritative information. I do not presume, here and now, to say anything on the grounds of that belief which I find myself—possibly from insufficient means of information—unable to share. But I ask permission to point out that cases of the kind I have narrated, though they do not occur in the East, do occur here in the West. The Eastern Philosophy, when it does not pooh-pooh them, makes what is to me and to most of those who have actual experience, a quite insufficient explanation of them. Any true philosophy must take account of them; and I am not rash enough to assert that that Theosophy which is expounded by minds so able has not its explanation at hand. But no merely academic disquisition on what philosophy propounds as theoretically probable, or even as demonstrable on high metaphysical principles, can get rid of even one assured fact, however inexplicable may be its raison d'être.

In so writing I am desirous only of making one more contribution to the study of a perplexing subject. While I have my own opinion, I am far from desiring to obtrude it, and I trust that I can give impartial heed to the opinions of others.

A HAUNTED HOUSE.

The house was situated in the outskirts of London, on a hill commanding a fine view of the surrounding country. My husband took the lease for a few years. It was four storeys high, and the outside presented a gaunt appearance. The inside was roomy, and included a dark cellar, trap doors, and ghostly passages. The kitchen and breakfast-room were underground. A cold feeling pervaded the whole place, accompanied by a musty smell, which, we thought, would disappear when the fires were lighted, but it never did.

We left a servant who had been with us three or four years in our last house. She slept in the house the first night, we ourselves going to our relations. When we came the next morning we noticed that the servant looked pale, and asked her if she felt well. She said she "could not sleep there another night." Of course we asked her why. She said that after we left she heard footsteps up the stairs, but could see no one; it so frightened her that she dare not go to bed, but bolted herself in the dining-room. Then she heard a noise like heavy furniture being moved about, and after that knockings, foot-treads, and muffled voices; and saw once a gleam of light. She was awake all night, and no persuasion on our part could make her stay another. So she left that day.

I returned to our old home in the New Forest to fetch my two children, the nurse, and two dogs. On my arrival at the house again, I found that my husband had procured another servant; so with our four little ones, fresh furniture, cheerful fires, and happy voices, we scarcely gave a thought to our dim, sorrowful forebodings—till the quiet of the night.

At about half-past two we were awakened by a crash. It seemed overhead in the study—a room my husband had appropriated for his own use, fastened with a spring-lock from within and by a latch-key outside. When in the room the sound seemed a long way off! it was heard most distinctly from our bedroom. Once my husband followed footsteps downstairs at midnight. They stopped by the kitchen door. It was not often that we felt really troubled about the noises, though a feeling of great awe would occasionally seize us both. Then my husband would exclaim, "It means something for me, not for you." He told me that he saw at times the figure of a man, but very shadowy.

The night before the birth of my youngest boy, all the servants heard the footsteps on the stairs! I heard myself called by name early in the morning, and a sweet voice said, "To-day will be a very happy day for you." It was my child's birthday. He is now six years old; and has seen spirits bright and lovely as himself.

My husband was a musician. One evening he was playing one of Chopin's Nocturnes, and I was reclining on the sofa, listening. I seemed to fall asleep, and saw a painted church window with an angel flying over it, holding in one hand an inverted torch. The next day I made a sketch of the vision. My husband died a few months afterwards. The last Christmas Day he said to my children and myself that it was the last we should spend together. He died the following September.

A few days before his release from earth-life I was sitting with my children at needlework in the dining-room. Suddenly we were all startled by a great crash. It was like a cannon being fired close by. It shook the house. It seemed like the combination of the nocturnal noises we used to hear at half-past two in one fearful sound. I and my eldest daughter rushed upstairs to the room where my husband was lying down, as he was so weak, and slept so badly at night, that he often slept during the day. I found him just awake. The noise had startled him, and he looked exceedingly pale. I asked him if he heard it. He said: "I should think I did." A relative who sat in the room with him heard it also, but could not account for it. I then went down and questioned the servant; she only shook her head and said: "Lor, mum, I 'eard nothing."

Within a fortnight my husband died. His death took place about ten minutes to ten on a quiet autumn evening. His parents and a relative were with him, and someone asked me not to say good night, as it might disturb him, and if he wanted me they would call me. They all agreed not to tell me what had taken place till the morning. In the night I heard, in my sleep, my husband singing, accompanied by angel voices. I told my dream as soon as I came downstairs, and one of my children, who came into the room soon after, said, "Oh, mamma, I heard such lovely singing in the night." Then my eldest daughter said, "Papa is dead."

That night I slept with all my children save one, who was at school, in the room next the one I feared, yet longed to enter; where the outward form reposed in marble coldness of what once was he. At midnight, after a fitful slumber, I was awakened by what sounded like the piano softly playing. I recognised the music—it was the last piece my husband had composed impromptu.

The little girl who had heard the singing the night before awoke, and said, "Hark, mamma, it sounds like a harp playing in papa's bedroom." The music ended abruptly. I called to the other children, but they did not wake. My husband had always been a lover of music, and had achieved some wonderful compositions, which he never had the physical power to write. He said that if he should die first he would, if possible, let me, by the language of music, know if he still lived.

His relations, I know, were surprised at my cheerfulness, and attributed it to want of natural feeling, little thinking how full of gladness I was to know that there was a grand hereafter for his new-born radiant spirit!

After the funeral, his mother said to me, "Did you hear that knock?" I did; we were both in the hall.

One day I was playing Weber's Last Waltz, and one of my little girls was dancing to it; suddenly she stopped and seemed listening; I asked her what was the matter. "I heard papa speak to me," she said, "he said, 'well done!'" My children have often told me they have heard his voice.

I have heard him and even seen him myself. Once I heard his voice mingling with the children's laughter, but when I ran down to them it had ceased. In my children's holidays I invited a friend to stay with me. My eldest boy, who was at school during the time of his parent's decease, came home. As he did not know which room his parent's death took place in, I put him to sleep in it, charging the others not to tell him. In the night the boy frightened us all by a terrible scream. They all found him sitting up in bed pale with fright. When he had recovered he said some one had touched him on his shoulder and awoke him. The next morning our domestic, an elderly woman, said to my friend, "They do say that is the room the master died in." The next night, not wishing the children to trouble themselves about it, I placed him in the same room, when he again aroused us by the same cry that "some one touched him." I then placed him in a little room next to mine, when he cried out again the same as before. After that he was disturbed no more during the vacation. I have since heard that he has two or three times aroused the whole school, and when he was on a visit during the holidays he also cried out in the night.

I told his schoolmaster it was only since his papa's decease that he had that sensation of being touched on the shoulder, and he being a believer in Spiritualism understood me. The first night he called out, my friend, and my elder children, and myself, heard footsteps on the stairs, with muffled voices, among which I recognised my late husband's, but not to distinguish what he said. My eldest, and her younger sister, saw a globe of light glide through

SPIRITUALISM IN BOHEMIA.

The editor of Licht mehr Licht. ("Light more Light,") a German Spiritualist weekly paper published at Paris, writes as follows to a colleague there:—

"Some of our brethren at Trautenau, in Bohemia, have been the objects of judicial proceedings. Trautenau is a manufacturing town with a population of 10,000 in the North of Bohemia, close to its Prussian frontier. The editor of the Trautenau Gazette has been the main instigator. The information laid by him and his party was that the Spiritualists by their teachings caused mental disorders, suicides, and murders. The charges and denunciations printed in the Trautenau Gazette were copied into many Austrian journals. The strongest echoes of these denunciations appeared in the Free Press, a great Liberal journal of Vienna, and were extended to Licht mehr Licht; it declared that that paper tended to derange the public mind, and called upon the Government to withdraw its rights of sale and transmission through the post-offices of Austria and Hungary.

"The district tribunal of Gilschen, before which the information was laid, appointed a commission to inquire into the allegations. Before this commission eighty Spiritualists appeared. The means made use of by our antagonists to gain their end can hardly be imagined; but they were not the Catholic clergy; they kept quite aloof; they were preachers of materialism, freedom of conscience and civil liberty.

"But their action failed. The tribunal, after considering the report of the commission, found no proof of any illegality in the premises; that there was nothing in the facts alleged warranting the charges in the information; that the cases of mental disorder and crimes charged had no relation to Spiritualism: finally the information was dismissed.

"Our Bohemian correspondent, M. Gynaie Etrich, a manufacturer at Trautenau, informs us that he has received into his house two persons afflicted with so-called mental alienation; that they are being treated under the direction of his spirit guides; that they are mending, and that he hopes to be able to present, in them, the proof that certain kinds of insanity are curable by Spiritualism.

"Bohemia was, in the past, and may be again in the near future, the scene of a spiritual reformatory movement.

SPIRITUAL CONSOLIDARITY IN THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

"One of the most divine and striking characteristics of the Catholic religion is the Communion of Saints, the way in which everything belongs to everybody, and nobody has any spiritual property of his own. The merits and satisfactions of our dear Lord, the joy, and woes of Mary, the patience of the martyrs, the perseverance of the confessors, and the purity of virgins—they all belong to all of us. Just as the blood circulates to and from the heart, all over the body, so in the Church there is no division or separation. Heaven, Purgatory, and Earth—it is all one body. We interchange our merits, we circulate our prayers, we pass on our joys, we infect with our troubles, and we use each other's satisfactions as they come to hand. We have all sorts of relations with Heaven, and we know how to manage them. As to purgatory, we have a regular science, and endless practical methods for it, and we are quite at home in them: while on earth kith and kin, blood and country, Jew, Greek, Scythian, bond and free, it is all one. This is what strikes heretics as so very portentous about us—there is no other word than portentous for it. We talk of the other world as though it were a city we were familiar with—from long residence, just as we might speak of Paris, Brussels, or Berlin. We are not stopped by death—sight is nothing to us; we go beyond it as calmly as possible. We are not separated from our dead. We know the saints a great deal better than if we had lived with them upon earth. We talk to the angels in their different choirs as if they were our brethren in Christ. We use beads, medals, crucifixes, holy water, indulgences, sacrifices, for all this, as naturally as pen, ink, and paper, axe or saw, spade or rake, for our earthly work. We have no sort of distrust about the matter. We are all one household, and there is the end of it. The blessed Lord God is our Father, His dear Majesty is our affair; our Elder Brother created us, and has our nature; Mary is our mother; the angels and the saints are all our kindred and most familiar of brothers; so we go up and down stairs, in and out, and to each other's rooms, just as it may be; there is no constraint about it at all; the air of the place is simply an entire filial love of the Father, whom we all adore, so that our reverence is a children's reverence, and our fear a children's fear."—From Faber's All for Jesus. Chapter on Intercessory Prayer.

their room, and then, reflected on the wall, a landscape of trees. My friend felt her bed clothes pulled. The noises at last affected her nervous system, and she left me without any stated reason. Soon after my servant was taken ill, and I had to send her away.

My three eldest children were at school, the eldest as a boarder, the two girls as weekly boarders; and my nurse was being changed; so it happened I was alone for two nights, with only the three little ones, all under six years of age. The next door neighbours had also left, so that I felt very lonely. After the little ones were all asleep, in the happy rest of infancy, I wandered over the house, peering cautiously into every nook, half expecting to see a robber concealed ready to pounce out on me. I was about to retire for the night, when I remembered that I had not looked in my deceased husband's study. I lighted a candle, and taking the latch-key I went in. All was quiet; but suddenly a breeze seemed to sweep round the chamber, blew out my light, and shut the door! I stood for a moment numbed with terror; I felt my hair stand on end; the dampness of fear bathed my forehead. I could not cry out, all power seemed gone, and a throng of ghastly fancies filled my brain; reason itself seemed to desert me. I fell on my knees and asked the "Father of Spirits" to set me free. I then made for the door, felt the lock, and in a moment was outside. It shut with a bang!

I ran down to where my children were, and locking myself in, lay down in my clothes. All was quiet for a time, when I heard a noise like the sound of a gong strike against the window bars; then a rumbling, accompanied by knocks and voices. My little boy awoke and said "What is that noise?" I told him not to mind but go to sleep, which he soon did. I then heard my husband's voice call my eldest child by name and tell her to go to the railway station. Then he said to me, "Come up here." I answered him, and said "I cannot, I wish to live for my children's sake." The doors all over the house slammed, and footsteps passed up and down stairs, continuing till daybreak.

The last day I remained in the haunted house, I left my children playing in the dining room, while I went to open a window upstairs. I leaned out for a moment to admire the fleecy clouds floating in the azure overhead, when I heard far away in the blue above, the sweetest melody I ever heard—like angelic voices singing on their upward flight. I listened and felt it was my Henry's happy spirit on its upward flight to fairer regions.

The house has now been untenanted for nearly three years. J. C.

THE METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM, Cavendish Rooms.—The evening of Sunday, the 6th of May, is to be appropriated as a ballot night, when, for the second time, the Controls of Mr. Morse will be prepared to answer all comers who submit, under cover and signed, inquiries of general interest. A verbatim report of the proceedings, under similar conditions, on the 8th April, is being printed, and the pamphlet will be on sale on and after Sunday, the 29th inst., at 4d. for one copy, 10d. for three, and 1s. 6d. for six; and each buyer will be offered one or more copies of J. S. Farmer's valuable brochure, entitled "How to Investigate Spiritualism."—Com.

C. A. S. DISCUSSION MEETING.—On Monday last, 23rd inst., Mr. Iver Macdonnell read a paper before the members and friends of the C. A. S., at the rooms, 38, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, W.C. The subject of the paper was "This World 200 Years Hence." The essayist dealt with the various conditions of society, industry, art, science, politics, and religion, and drew a glowing picture of the state of things he argued would ultimately exist. The paper was listened to with evident interest, and an interesting exchange of opinion took place, among the speakers being Mrs. Dr. Hallock, Mr. J. Veitch, Miss Houghton, and others. Mr. J. J. Morse occupied the chair, and the meeting unanimously thanked Mr. Iver Macdonnell for his very entertaining paper.

SPIRITUALISM IN SPAIN.—There are many periodicals in Spain defending our philosophical principles. In some parts there is great desire to know them. In the province of Lerida, public discussions are being held with clericals, and the Spiritualists are loudly applauded. In Spain beginning to shake off her long endured ecclesiastical bondage, the burthen of her old superstitions, and step into the road of intellectual and moral progress?—Le Spiritisme.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON &amp; THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM,

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

"GOD'S MAN."—In perfect consistency with the treatment of the associated subject of "Man's God," reported in this column on the 21st inst., the expression, "God's Man," employed by the controls of Mr. Morse as the title of the lecture delivered at this place on Sunday last, was held to mean the man of God's making, and not that mythical and mystical counterfeits who is supposed, by those who snort at science and disdain search after the esoteric meaning of sacred records, to have been introduced into this world perfectly good and—singular combination of terms!—blissfully ignorant.

Moreover, the real man, of whom we are to speak, formed and developed in harmony with the principles, and by the regular and normal operation of natural law, this God-made man is in essential harmony also with the purposes of God; can never wander beyond the influence of His power, nor exist where He is not, for the Divine life is individualised in the human conscience, and that life is omnipresent. Nor can this man, by any possible deterioration, ignominious or otherwise, belie his origin, and it is at once idle and blasphemous to affirm that God ever permitted a disastrous fall simply that He might shew His power of redemption. We spoke last week of the special attributes of Deity—of love, justice and wisdom; if we now repeat that man, by his very nature, is the representative of the Divine, then he, too, is characteristically possessed of these qualities. We thoroughly believe that all that is, is because God has created it, as the outcome of His Divine activity, incessant and eternal; and, therefore, that all that is, is Divine, governed and guided by the laws of God to the fulfilment of the purposes of God. There are, indeed, too many representatives of humanity in the flesh who are conspicuously unworthy, in that relation, alike of their high origin and of their immortal destiny, but they are not the less essentially Divine in their nature. The central fact, whether of the vilest sinner or of the greatest philosopher, is the Soul, and there is no essential difference in the elementary character of the soul, whatever the quality of the allied body, although a hundred reasons might be given why the one in its present outward manifestation is noble and competent, and in the other poor and apparently useless.

Shall we pause here and palter with the truth, or in cowardly deference to popular or, might we say, orthodox prejudices, only whisper the truth? Rather would we bid you get away to your homes until you learn that we and you alike should always speak, if we speak at all, our highest and truest and best, and so speak boldly. Keep then well in view always the basic fact that God's man is a Divine man, that he never loses his divinity, and that his growth or progress must be worked for, struggled for, here in this world. Be especially and always true to your own thought; they honour God the best who best understand and honour themselves, and use wisely and industriously the agency that He, by natural law, supplies to each of you, as a prerogative of being, neglecting no quality when you remember the fact that all are supplied for exercise, and by exercise for happiness. Nor is the Divine life present alone in the soul of man, for the body is equally a triumph, shall we say, of God's skill, and should never be lightly esteemed or regarded as subject, by His action, to possible—still less to capricious and unjust—degradation. God's man therefore must be careful to neglect none of the elements of his present form of life, for his physical structure or physical integrity—the nature and capacity and uses of his body—is not only of material consequence in itself, but intimately and seriously affects the mental, moral, and spiritual departments of his being, each of which, it is universally admitted, must be diligently cultivated also. He will thus, true to his own thought, with a rightly developed self-hood, become a lover of God's truth, pure and simple, and, consistently with his appreciation of the source of his powers and faculties, will discover within himself the potency of abiding happiness, for he will assuredly then perceive the reality of his inheritance of the Divine qualities of love, justice, and wisdom. Love, personal, fraternal, and national, prevailing so universally that bickerings, and jealousies, and war shall cease; justice so unconquerable that every privilege claimed for himself shall be righteously conceded to all, when disputes, wrangling, and hatred shall be impossible; wisdom so well and universally grounded in men and peoples that health, a common happiness, and unflinching personal integrity, shall characterise human condition and action everywhere. Thus self-centred and sustained, God's man will exhibit at once a distinct individuality and a pervading influence of fraternal unity, when a common desire for light and truth will come to be recognised as the unfailing source of happiness for all. With thought disencumbered of figments, the mind will expand; with increasing knowledge the sympathies will grow; and a combination of force shall result, which, while enlarging the action of the Divine elements of life, and by reaction again augmenting his capabilities, shall furnish the best guarantee for the ultimate perfection of the God-made man. —The reader of the above brief summary is referred to "LIGHT," of February 10th, 17th, and 24th, and March 3rd for similar reports of a series of discourses upon "Humanity," when the symmetry of idea, and general harmony of purpose, of the controls of Mr. Morse will be as perceptible as to their hearers are their clearness and force and eloquence of expression. —S.B.

BIRMINGHAM.

On Sunday last, at Oozell's-street Board Schools, an address was delivered by Miss Allen, on "The Life of Christ." She dealt with His times and surroundings at great length, and then showed the great necessity for the truths He and His disciples set forth, and contrasted them with professed Christianity to-day, shewing that His was a life of purity and self-sacrifice, and that He taught a religion of love and truth without creeds or dogmas. Mrs. R. Groom will occupy the platform on Sunday next at 6.30 p.m.—COR.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—Sunday last was a red-letter day with our Newcastle friends. Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten lectured on that day before two of the largest audiences ever assembled in their meeting-house. In the morning every seat was occupied, and in the evening the hall was crowded to excess, so much so, in fact, that the doors had to be closed, and numbers had to go away disappointed. The morning lecture was entitled "Man, Spirit and Angel," and the evening address on "The Gods of Men, and the God of the Spirits," was able and exhaustive, striking home to the conviction of those present with a clearness and completeness that was incontrovertible. In the morning Mr. Kersey occupied the chair, and in the evening Mrs. Hammerbom officiated in that capacity. We were highly pleased to see her so well supported by several old and well tried friends of the cause, Mr. Kersey, their president, and Mr. Burton, president of the Gateshead Society, on the right, and Mr. Thompson, V.P., and Mr. Bristol, treasurer, on her left, together with Mr. W. C. Robson, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Cameron, Mr. Bell, Mr. Thompson, jun., and several ladies. At the commencement of the lecture Mrs. Britten in a pleasing manner named the infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Cairns, two old and worthy workers in the North.

QUARTERLY MEETING.—On Tuesday evening, April 17th, the first quarterly meeting of the new committee was held at Weir's Court. Mr. H. A. Kersey occupied the chair. The quarterly report shewed that the new executive had worthily sustained the trust reposed in them by the members three months ago. Beginning the year with a debt of about thirty pounds, and an attendance at Sunday evening meetings which had dwindled down to a mere handful, together with a fast-dissolving membership, they set themselves resolutely to work to resuscitate and give fresh vigour to the perishing life of the N.E.S., and, in spite of all opposition and doubtful prophecy, they have achieved wonders, and given stability once more to this whilom strong, but for some time tottering centre of northern Spiritualism. The new committee have, during the quarter, been able to considerably improve the platform and to gather larger audiences than Weir's Court has seen for some time, and to reduce the balance due to treasurer from £28 to 15s., every penny of the contributions towards that reduction having been subscribed by the members.

MR. MAHONY.—On Monday evening, Shakespeare's birthday, the above gentleman entertained the friends at Weir's Court with several selections from "Hamlet" and "Othello." As a reader, Mr. Mahony possesses a wonderful and correct memory. His elocution is careful and well considered, his interpretation, at times, remarkably intelligent and instructive. He deserves the highest appreciation and patronage.—NORTHUMBRIA.

WALSALL.

On Sunday last Mr. J. Bent, of Leicester, occupied our platform morning and evening. Both addresses were listened to with marked attention by the audiences, who must have carried away spiritual food that will invigorate them, waken up the spiritual capabilities of the inner man, and enable them to realise more and more the grand truths of spiritual intercourse, and the reality of a future existence which the lecturer endeavoured so forcibly to impress upon the minds of his hearers, the fruits of which we hope to see upon the waters after many days.—J.T.

GLASGOW.

The opening of the new hall for the spiritualist meetings in this city was celebrated on Sunday, the 8th inst., when Mr. E. W. Wallis delivered two excellent trance addresses to large audiences, morning and evening. Mr. Wallis remained in Glasgow until the 15th.

THE FORTHCOMING LECTURES AT LANGHAM HALL.—There now remain only about fifteen course tickets for the sofa stalls. Those who desire to obtain these special tickets should, therefore, not delay in making application for them.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

The cases of transcorporeal action of spirit which I published in Human Nature seven years ago have received large additions since. I myself added a number to those kindly noticed by "A.M.H.W.," and printed them in the same magazine in the following year. These cases were chiefly such as had already found their way into print, and I used them without any attempt at verification. In this respect my aim was different from that of the Society for Psychical Research. The Literary Committee of that Society has collected a great number of original cases (a mere sample of which found place in the Fortnightly), verified with infinite and minute pains at first hand, and these they are preparing to publish in a volume, or volumes, for one will by no means suffice. The narratives will go forth as accurate records of fact so far as the Society has been able to ascertain. I pretend to no such merit for my stories. They were selected for the purpose of arriving at some system of classification; and my aim was to establish a principle, if I could find one, and to arrange my records according to it. I see no reason to doubt that what I then wrote as to the governing causes was, so far as it went, true, and no subsequent familiarity with stories of a similar kind disturbs the belief I then entertained. If it were not that the welding of the two essays into one would make too large demands on my over-taxed time I should hope to reprint what is not now within public reach, and I am not without some faint belief that I may one day be enabled to do so. In that case I shall find such instances as "A. M. H. W." adds, and others that have appeared in "LIGHT," welcome additions.

It was, I suppose, a mere matter of time for the attempt to be made to fix on Zöllner the taint of insanity. His facts were not to be controverted. His scientific position was beyond cavil, and gave to the record of his reiterated experience a weight that was disastrous, and must be got rid of at any cost. But how? "Great wit to madness near allied." Happy thought! Call him mad! There was some slight justification on his own showing, for he had mentioned his brother's sad affliction. The opportunity was too good to be lost, and it was eagerly snatched at. So now, when Zöllner's work is quoted, we shall be told, with a shrug, that we are quoting a madman. Mr. C. C. Massey has done what he can to confute the calumny, but it speaks very poorly for English fair-play that he is obliged to say that he has been "disappointed in his wish to challenge these imputations on Zöllner before a more general public than the readers of 'LIGHT.'"

The general meeting of the Society for Psychical Research was held at Willis' Rooms on the 25th, and was well attended. Reports were presented from the Reichenbach Committee, the Mesmeric Committee, and the Committee on Thought-transference. The experiments detailed were eminently satisfactory, and so numerous that a hyper-critical person might complain that the reports were, in some cases, overlaid with minute facts. This was especially the case with the Mesmeric Committee's report. The precautions taken against collusion were so elaborate, complicated, and complete; the various experiments were so often repeated, and with such unqualified success, that the protest of one very scientific sceptic that he, at any rate, was not satisfied that the results might not be explained by the use of a code of signals came upon the meeting with all the freshness of a new and unexpected joke. It is, perhaps, necessary to repeat experiments over and over again until even the most desperate sceptic has nothing left to say that is intelligent; until, in fact, he is driven to his last shift, "I can't find a flaw, though I am sure there is one;" but surely this is a dreary waste of time and effort when carried beyond a reasonable point. Only opinions will differ as to what is reasonable; and the Psychical Society exists for the very purpose of proving that what has been done in the past was well done and truly recorded, or the reverse. When they have done this they will, no doubt, go on to original work, as they have done, indeed, in the matter of Thought-transference.

Opinions, too, will differ as to the reasonableness of some of the experiments made by the Mesmeric Committee. It is true that the meeting was repeatedly assured that the boys on whom the experiments were made rather liked having their fingers turned till they were blistered, having them pinned to the table by a sharp carving fork, having a spoonful of pepper blown up the nostril, and so on. But really, except for the gratification of curiosity, or to emphasize the determination to ignore the great body of evidence that already exists, it is hard to see the practical use of repeating these rather cruel and quite repulsive experiments. Insensibility of the mesmerised patient to pain is as thoroughly established a fact as can well be desired. And when cancers have been extirpated, and limbs removed from patients in the mesmeric sleep, it is hardly necessary to gravely burn a finger-nail in order to see if the subject is sensitive to pain. Still it has been done, with the inevitable result, and, I suppose, need not be repeated. The Zoist is packed with such facts, and with others of a deeper significance which, one hopes, will soon engage attention.

For the rest, the reproduction of Reichenbach's experiments with odylic flames is valuable, and should set at rest the long discussion as to the facts. The continued success of the Thought-transference experiments is complete. And the activity of the various committees, except, perhaps, that which deals with the special facts of Spiritualism, is phenomenal. Even the most hostile critic must admit that the Society is very much alive. Even the most enthusiastic Spiritualist, if he regrets that his own pet truths are too much neglected, must see that the foundations of his faith are being very much strengthened, and that an attention is being paid to Spiritualism and its claims which his most strenuous efforts have hitherto failed to secure. He must, indeed, be churlish if he does not take what he gets with thankfulness.

The second part of the Proceedings of the Society were in the hands of members before the meeting. They contain Reports of Thought-transference, Reichenbach, and Haunted House Committees, and especially the long Report of the Literary Committee which appeared in extenso in the Fortnightly Review. Since Mr. A. R. Wallace published in the same magazine his "Defence of Spiritualism" no paper more striking, none more calculated to arrest and influence opinion has been before the public. The cases quoted, all accurately verified, are remarkable for their force, and are selected with admirable judgment. The reply to certain recurrent objections, with which the article closes, are conceived in the happiest manner, and are full of logical power and directness. If logic and literary merit are to influence public opinion, here they are. And if stolid prejudice will yield neither to fact, nor to argument, if it refuses to be enticed by a beauty of style that may well charm, it will, perhaps, wonder why our most ably conducted Reviews, the Nineteenth Century and the Fortnightly, eagerly catch at the chance of securing such articles; and so wondering, the sceptic may find that his prejudice is weakened.

It is impossible to deal with the wealth of matter in these Proceedings in the space at my command. They will repay minute perusal. The Society I may add, now numbers over 200 members, and is rapidly increasing.

A SECOND SEANCE AT HOME WITH MISS WOOD.

Miss Wood has again been my visitor during the time she is sitting for the Committee of the C.A.S., and I think it only fair to Miss Wood, as it will be encouraging to the Committee, to give a very brief record of our seance at home last evening.

Besides our own family I had invited three of the said Committee to come and sit with us, which they did. We sat in our dining-room, having previously fitted up a cabinet formed by a three-sided strong clothes horse to which solid sides were fixed, and all held well together by a cap of deal about four feet square, covered with red glazed lining, which overlapped the cabinet to the depth of six or eight inches,—the only easily movable part when fixed being two curtains in front.

The following phenomena occurred, in light sufficient to see the time by, and with Miss Wood in an easy chair quite away from the cabinet, in full view of us all.

The curtains were first pushed out for about two feet. A chair, upon which was a small box and a cardboard tube, was then slowly dragged to the corner of the cabinet, outside, and some five or six feet from the medium. Now the tube was taken up, and moved upwards and downwards, then horizontally, clear of everything, by a spirit hand seen by the clairvoyants in our circle. The chair was then pushed over, and the things on it scattered about the floor.

Considerable commotion then occurred inside the cabinet, and the curtains again opened for about two feet from the ground upwards. In this aperture we all saw a glistening white drapery covering the lower part of the form, the whole of which, as well as three other complete forms, were seen by our clairvoyant member and recognised, two of them being familiar.

The curtains again shut, when the heavy cap on the top was lifted up and down, and at length the whole cabinet was bodily brought out of the recess, and turned completely round so as to be at a right angle to its former position. It was thus moved away five feet or more, and left standing clear of the walls of the room. It was getting late, and we broke up. There was no mistaking by any one the vast amount of abnormal power, and to Spiritualists considerably more.

I will not trouble you with much more that occurred, as it would need a longer description than I can now claim from your space.—Yours truly, Blackheath, April 30th, 1883.

PSYCHOLOGY AND BIOGRAPHY.

That the world has become more observant of the operations of mind, and careful in recording facts of interest to the student of Psychology, almost every biography published within the last twenty years bears ample testimony.

Of this the following extracts from two lives of two very different persons are examples.

In the "Autobiography and Other Memorials of Mrs. Gilbert" (formerly Ann Taylor), one of the authoresses of "Nursery Rhymes and Original Poems for Infant Minds," so deservedly popular amongst children in the early portion of the century, edited by Josiah Gilbert (author of "Cadore, or Titian's Country;" Henry S. King and Co., 63, Cornhill,) we meet with the following curious things.

Singular Dream of a Child.

Mrs. Gilbert relates the following dream dreamed by her mother when a child of six. "On the night of her father's death (he died at the early age of nine-and-twenty) she dreamed that she was in a desolate and shattered dwelling, through the rents of which she could see the stars. Suddenly among them her father's form appeared, departing upward in a chariot, by gestures taking leave of her and encouraging her to follow. On waking she was told that he was dead; and to the excess of her grief her life was nearly sacrificed. Nor did she fail through her more than three-score years and ten to commemorate the 13th of February, the anniversary of her loss."

Wise Answer of a Nurse to a Child.

Writing of the deathbed of a very dear son, Mrs. Gilbert says:—"It has always seemed to me a mistake to deprive children of a sight and share in the last scenes. Dear, tender Herbert especially, I feel as if he had been deprived of his birth-right, not to have had his hand in J.'s at the sad time. He should have attended as chief mourner—as, in fact, he must ultimately be. He understands fully that 'dear papa is gone to Heaven,' but before long it will render the churchyard a strange enigma, which will probably be explained to him by some one not wise in such explanations. He asked nurse if she had seen Jesus when He took dear papa away? and under the circumstances she gave, I think, a very nice answer. 'No,' she said, 'He was in the room, but I did not see Him.'"

Involuntary Spirit Writing.

Writing to her brother, Isaac Taylor, the author of the "History of Enthusiasm," "Physical Theory of Another Life," &c., &c., at that time on the eve, as he anticipated, of the successful conclusion of a combined literary and artistic undertaking (the publication of a new translation of Josephus), the following curious circumstance is recorded by Mrs. Gilbert.

Dec., 1846. "Nothing, I hope, will prevent your enjoying up to the safe side, a merry Christmas, and a happy New Year—happier than usual, I should suppose, if Josephus really looks at day-light on New Year's morning. May that be the prelude to much honourable—word misspelt and lined out. Only see!—the word prosperity would not allow itself to be spelt! So suppose we say success, which will do as well."

"The omen," writes the editor of Mrs. Gilbert's Memorials, was only too soon justified. Isaac Taylor, possessed of great mechanical as well as literary and artistic genius, had for some years been engaged in the perfection of complicated machinery with reference to line-engraving. Eventual success, we are told, seemed to have been secured by the workmanship by this means of plates executed for Dr. Traill's translation of Josephus, edited by Isaac Taylor, when the sudden death of Dr. Traill, who had embarked large sums in the venture, brought everything to a standstill, and some of those concerned, to the verge of ruin. But for this failure a branch of art of which England has supplied some of the finest specimens might have been preserved from extinction. The time and labour required, when executed by hand alone, are too great in this age of quick production, and line-engraving is almost a lost art."

Magnetic Action of Life upon Death.

In describing the deathbed of Jefferys Taylor, at which Mrs. Gilbert was a devoted nurse, we read that the dying man's "deft hands were thrown out towards her whenever she entered the room, pressing hers, or drawing her down for prayer; while the nurse, with weird, old-wife notions, teased her with, 'When you take hold of his hand so, it just prevents his going when he would.'" This "weird old-world notion," however, probably was not so far wrong, in so far as the magnetic touch of the loving sister's hand would tend to hold back to earth, yet longer, the spirit wavering upon the threshold of the new life.

It is well to remember that experience has shewn to the student of Psychology that dying persons are become 'sensitives,' and have entered into that peculiar state which we for want of more accurate nomenclature designate "magnetic" or "mediumistic."

An Invisible Auditor.

Jane Taylor, sister to Mrs. Gilbert, and one of the authors of the "Nursery Rhymes," &c., is said to have conjured up in imagination the presence of some little child when composing her popular nursery poems, and repeated the verses to her whilst composing them, when she had finished, saying to her imaginary auditor, "Now, Love, you may go."

Query.—What invisible auditor had thus impressed the sensitive poetess with a conviction of the reality of a presence?

From the "Life of George Moore, Merchant and Philanthropist," written by Samuel Smiles, the popular author of "Self-Help," &c., &c., we glean the following facts:—

Ghostly Knockings.

"When George Moore (in his boyhood) slept at his aunt Dinah's at Bolton, he usually occupied the parlour. There were strange rumours about that room. It was thought to be haunted. Ghostly tappings were heard inside the wall. The little dog of the house would tremble all over on hearing the strange noises. George was in great dread of the bogle, though he himself never heard the tappings. The supposed cause of the tappings was ascertained long after George left Bolton. His uncle, when 'fair fresh' one night (that is, full of drink), heard the noises, and getting up, vowed that he would stand it no longer. He got a pick and broke into the wall. A hollow space was found, and a skeleton hand fell out. This terrified the discoverer so much that he immediately had the wall built up. How the skeleton had got in was never discovered. But a legend had been preserved which stated that a man was once seen to go into Bolton Hall, and that he never came out again."

A Premonitory Dream.

He was a man of great promptitude (was George Moore) and coolness in emergencies. One night he heard a hansom cab driving up to his door in Kensington Palace Gardens. He had been dreaming that Bow Churchyard was on fire; as it really was. Before the hansom stopped he had got on his boots, and in two minutes he was in the cab. Before starting, he asked the butler for a cigar and drove off as cool as if he had been going to breakfast—though such tremendous risks were at stake, as the premises could not at that time have been adequately insured."

Omens of his Death.

"The Grey Goat Inn (in Carlisle) was to have the sanctity, as it were, of comprising two of the greatest events of his life. He had slept there in 1824 on his way up to London, where he made his princely fortune. And now, in 1876, he was brought to die there. Neither of his homes was to have the memory of his death. From the little dark room, looking into the court of the small commercial inn, George Moore's spirit passed away into the hands of God who gave it." He died from the effects of an accident, having been knocked down in the street by one of two runaway horses. When the telegram arrived in London saying, "George Moore is dead," strong men broke down and wept. George Moore had gone to Carlisle to attend a meeting of the Nurses' Institution there. When the carriage came to the door to take him to Carlisle, from his country home, of Whitehall, before entering it, he said to his wife, who was descending the stairs, "What is that passage in St. Matthew?" "Do you mean," she asked, "I was sick and ye visited me?" "No," he said, "I remember—'Well done thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'" These were the last words that passed between husband and wife in that happy home.

It seemed that whilst in Carlisle waiting for the hour appointed for the public meeting, whilst Mrs. Moore went shopping George Moore with a friend went to a music-shop, and asked for a particular song for his wife. He could not remember the name, but he whistled and hummed the tune till they recognised it. The song was "The harp is now silent," by Kücken. Messrs. Scott, of Carlisle, afterwards sent the song thus ordered to Mrs. Moore. Various other singular presentiments are stated by Mr. Smiles to have preceded George Moore's death. A. M. H. W.

HINTS TO INEXPERIENCED MEDIUMS.

By F. J. THEOBALD.

A short time ago, I met with a young friend, whom I will call H. He was developing as a medium; and, as is usual in the majority of such cases, was greatly perplexed by receiving most extraordinary messages upon all kinds of subjects, and especially upon that of the development of his own medial powers. The wildest promises were made, that he should be the recipient of the most wonderful gifts. Large and vague prophecies of strange and extraordinary medial development, kept his mind in a state of bewildered and excited expectation. He would be a seer; a clairvoyant; a healer; a being transformed and exalted by mystic changes of flesh and spirit, till matter should be plastic to his touch, and obedient to his will. Once or twice he was sent upon errands which proved fruitless. At last, a definite time was fixed when he was to "die." Various details were given. After his death he was to "rise again" and to work miracles as a healer.

Strange to say, this prophecy of death seemed in no wise to depress or trouble H. The looked-for day arrived, and passed over, without anything unusual occurring. None of the prophecies were fulfilled, at least, not in the looked-for manner.

Naturally, my young friend was disgusted at the apparent deception or hoax which had been played upon him; and, as he told me, he was determined "to throw the whole matter up." This was a wise determination, unless he could learn to accept the spirit teachings, or declarations, with calmness and self-poised discernment of their important tendency. This is not always easy to do, especially when mediumship is developed amongst those who know but little of its intricate and mystic significance, and have no canon of interpretation to apply to its words and phenomena, except those of ordinary mundane experiences.

When H. left me that morning he asked if I thought it likely that I might be able to receive a spirit message of direction for him.

The message did come; and is, I think, so very suitable for the many who are now in this same position, that I feel impelled to publish it, and sincerely hope it may prove useful and helpful.

This is what was given (by the spirit writing power):—

"My dear H.,—I, your spirit cousin, am much interested in every fresh development of Spiritualism in your home-circle. Let me only beg you, more and more, to devote yourself prayerfully to God's service. Lay yourself out to do the work He sets you to do, whether it be by direct, conscious mediumship, or only what you may perhaps look upon, as the uninteresting details of your daily business life, which are oftentimes so very prosaic. But every step in life must go on through much that is prosaic.

"Still, by your own seeking after all good, will this prosaic part of your daily life, be curved off into beautifully rounded circles, of God, and angel life.

"No business is to be despised, provided it comes to you, or every, or any one, as a duty. Small duties, well and consistently carried out, lead on to noble spiritual aspirations. And the one who walks closely to the Father, God, will receive the fullest help in the development of mediumship, or such like latent spiritual gifts.

"My dear cousin, learn to discriminate. This is a very common word, and piece of advice; but none the less true. Accept all that is given you by the spirit guides, but, before acting upon it, pray,—to be enabled to distinguish between the good, and the not good. I'll not say 'evil,' because that gives a wrong idea of much that is often given to young, and firstly developing mediums. A vast deal of chaff, is mixed up with a very little grain. The chaff is not evil,—for it is the dress, as it were, of the good. But the little grain is well worth the sifting.

"As day by day you have these spiritual revelations, just hold them in your mind; watch and wait to carry out the good. Be ready to act up to all that is good. Receive it carefully and prayerfully; but on account of the wrappings of chaff, do not blow away too vehemently, and overlook the gem which it enshrines. Remember, spirits teach by symbolism, and it is true, as F. has discerned, that the prophecy of death is fulfilled in the very last way in which you looked for fulfilment.

"You have 'died' to the dangerously full belief you were gradually yielding to. You find that spirits do not (and, as I can assure you, it is because they cannot) always carry out, to the letter, all they fain would do. They make great promises; the fulfilment is often so deferred that hope dies, and—as I know it frequently happens—when given, it is not recognised as the fulfilment of the promise, until a fuller knowledge of the intricate laws of correspondence, and of spiritual power, brings a subtle power of interpreting, that which the untaught materialist is absolutely incapable of solving. . . ."

Mr. James Gillingham, surgical mechanist of Chard, Somerset, and author of "The Seat of the Soul," is about to contribute a series of papers entitled "The Lost Senses" to the Chard and Ilminster News.

USE OF THE DIVINING ROD.—A valuable spring of water has been discovered at Avonmouth Docks by means, it is said, of the divining rod. A Mr. Lawrence made the search, the Dock Company having been given to understand that if a good supply of water could be found an American company for the manufacture of sugar from maize would establish a factory in the vicinity of the docks. The searcher held the ends of a piece of spring steel, which was bent to the shape of a horseshoe, and, placing his elbows close to his side, began to walk slowly about the field. After walking some distance the steel became violently agitated, and twisted itself into rings with such violence that one of the holder's fingers was cut. He then said that if those who were searching for water bored at that spot they would find a good spring. A hole has since been bored to the depth of 107ft., with the result that a spring has been discovered which flows at the rate of 1,000 gallons an hour.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

The third general meeting of the members of this Society was held in Willis's Rooms, on Tuesday, the 24th April, at 4 p.m., Mr. Henry Sidgwick, president, in the chair. The President made a brief address, in which he apologised for the absence of a report from the committee appointed to deal with spiritualistic phenomena. The reason for this omission was that the Committee were desirous to conduct their investigations altogether apart from professional mediums; and under these conditions they had not yet been able to obtain an opportunity for such a systematic, prolonged, and searching investigation as the importance of the subject rendered necessary. He also apologised for the late appearance of Part II. of the Society's Proceedings, which had been delayed in order that the report of the Literary Committee might first appear in the shape of two articles in the Fortnightly Review.

The second report of the Committee on Reichenbach's Experiments was then read by Mr. W. H. Coffin. It stated that out of forty-five "subjects" tested three described luminous appearances in an absolutely darkened room, where the circuit of a large electro-magnet was made and unmade at irregular intervals unknown to them. Several series of numerous observations, conducted under conditions expressly devised to exclude chance, imagination, or deception, lead the Committee to conclude that "there is a strong primæ facie case in favour of the existence of some peculiar and unexplained luminosity resembling phosphorescence, excited in the region of the atmosphere immediately around the magnetic poles, and which can only be seen by certain individuals." It was mentioned at the close of the report that the Committee proposed to hold meetings on Monday evenings, at 8.30 p.m., at the Society's Rooms, 14, Dean's-yard, which would be open to any members of the Society who would wish to attend.

In the discussion which followed, a gentleman mentioned that during a meeting of the British Association at Sheffield he had been sitting immediately under the great magnetic coil exhibited at that meeting, and on two occasions found himself suffering from peculiar shooting pains in the limbs, which otherwise were unknown to him, and which he attributed to the discharge of electricity from the coil.

Professor Barrett observed that some doubt had been thrown upon the reality of the luminous appearances described by the Committee, from the idea that the energy required to produce the light could not be accounted for. He said that the quantity of energy needed was almost inconceivably minute, and that it was impossible to say whether an electro-magnet permanently kept magnetised would not gradually lose its magnetism by some process of waste. It was not, however, necessary even to assume this; and he cited an important letter from Professor Fitzgerald, F.R.S., in which, referring to a paper of his read before the Royal Dublin Society, he suggested two physical causes which might account for such luminous appearances as these—both of them depending on the presence of air. It was naturally suggested that the same experiment ought to be tried with the magnet in a vacuum; but, as explained by Mr. Coffin, such isolation of a magnet of so large a size is a very difficult thing to accomplish.

"Professor Barrett then read a report on "Thought-transference." He referred to the experiments described in Part II. of the Proceedings as having been conducted with Mr. Blackburn and Mr. Smith, of Brighton. These experiments had since been renewed at the Society's own rooms under more stringent conditions. The modus operandi was described as follows: Mr. Smith sits blindfolded at a table with a paper before him and a pencil in his hand. A member of the committee draws some figure at random on a sheet of paper in another room. Then Mr. Blackburn is taken into the other room and shewn this figure. He returns to the first room, and standing about two feet behind Mr. Smith, but without touching him, concentrates his thoughts upon the figure he has seen. After a short time Mr. Smith puts pencil to paper, and produces something like a copy of the figure which Mr. Blackburn is thinking of. A number of enlarged copies of the reproduction, together with the originals, were exhibited to the meeting. Some of them had been done whilst Mr. Blackburn was touching Mr. Smith, others when there was no contact whatever. The former were somewhat the clearest of the two; but in all there was more or less resemblance, though of a very rough and uncertain character. It was found that better results were obtained when Mr. Blackburn had the figure shewn him during the time that he was communicating his thoughts to Mr. Smith. Acting on this suggestion, Mr. Blackburn was asked to draw, from memory, some of the figures he had seen in the next room; and it was found that his drawings differed very considerably from the originals. The divergence in Mr. Smith's re-productions may, therefore, in part, at least, be ascribed to the imperfection of Mr. Blackburn's memory. Some special experiments were made to determine whether the figures as they appeared to Mr. Smith were in the same position as when seen by Mr. Blackburn, or whether they were reversed, like images in a looking-glass. Some of the preliminary experiments had indicated that the latter was the real state of the case. For this purpose, a sheet of paper, marked with a large arrow, was held before Mr. Blackburn, the arrow sometimes pointing upwards, sometimes downwards, sometimes horizontally, and after a short time, Mr. Smith, who was in the next room, called out his impression of the direction in which the arrow was held: 43 such experiments were made; in 24 of these the arrow was held vertically, and of these Mr. Smith gave 19 right and five wrong; 19 times the arrow was held horizontally, and of these Mr. Smith gave 7 right and 12 wrong. But of these 12 eight were inversions of right for left, such as would have occurred if the arrow had been seen by reflection in a mirror. There seems, therefore, some reason for concluding that these inversions do occur; but the point cannot be regarded as settled. It appeared that Mr. Smith saw the arrow as white on a black ground; and on one occasion a white arrow on a crimson ground was seen as a green arrow.

Mr. H. S. Smith mentioned in the discussion on this subject, that he had tried similar experiments with a friend. In this case the ideas sought to be transferred were simple numbers; his friend having visualised these as black figures on a white ground, he himself saw them in white on a black ground, so that there seems some ground at least for supposing that these complementary sensations are part of the phenomenon. He also mentioned that he had tried Planchette as a method of recording the transferred impressions; having selected it as the most delicate means known for reproducing very slight movements or excitations of the muscles. On one occasion he willed that a particular surname should be written by his friend who was sitting with the Planchette at some distance; the name written, however, was a different one, and it was found that this name had been at the moment very strongly before the mind of a lady present. It would, therefore, seem as if her very vivid impression of the name had exercised a more powerful effect than Mr. Smith's volition.

Mr. Edmund Gurney made some remarks on the possibility that Mr. Blackburn and Mr. Smith had held communication with each other by some code of signals. As there was no contact, as all conversation was prohibited, and as Mr. Smith was blindfolded, the only materials left for a code were such indications as might be given by very slight movements of the limbs, changes in the drawing of the breath, and so forth. To obviate any such possibility, an experiment had lately been tried in which Mr. Smith had had his ears stopped up with putty, a pillow-case drawn over his head, and a blanket swathed round his body, and it was still found that the transference of thought took place.

Mr. G. J. Romanes, F.R.S., observed that he had been present at this experiment, but was not completely satisfied with it, as he thought it not quite impossible that the putty might have been withdrawn from the ears after the experiment had commenced. Whilst therefore he was fully convinced that the experiments left only two alternatives, namely, either that thought-transference was a fact or that the two operators were in collusion, he did not feel perfectly satisfied that the latter solution had been disproved. At the same time he observed that he might fairly be taken to represent the extreme limit which reasonable scepticism could attain in such matters, and that he was hopeful that a further course of experiments would settle the question.

The President observed, in closing the discussion, that he thought much gratitude was due to Mr. Blackburn, who had no pecuniary interest whatever in the matter, for the time and trouble he had incurred in these experiments, and for the good humoured way in which he submitted to all the tests which the Committee had imposed upon him.

Mr. Podmore then read a report of the Committee on "Mesmerism." He observed that the Committee had made some experiments on the method of mesmerising without passes, by simply putting the subject into a chair and causing him to fix his eyes on some object, such as a coin, about fifteen inches from his face. These experiments, however, led to no results. On the other hand, a number of experiments, in which Mr. Smith, of Brighton, was the operator, and a lad named Fred Wells the subject, proved eminently successful. The mode of mesmerising, by a system of passes lasting twenty minutes, was described. When this had succeeded, it was found that the limbs were made rigid and insensible by passes in one direction; and that sensibility could only be restored when they had been stroked in the reverse direction. When the leg, for example, had thus been numbed, it was found that there was an abrupt line of demarcation between the sensitive and non-sensitive parts, extending just across the knee-cap. Under the same conditions, the patient could be made subject to any hallucination which the operator suggested, and he then mimicked, in the most extraordinary manner, the motions and behaviour of any person or animal which he supposed himself to be for the moment. It was also found that if he was commanded to do some particular thing, and was then awakened from the mesmeric state, he obeyed the command almost directly afterwards, but at times with great apparent unwillingness. A number of experiments were made on the possibility of thought-transference during mesmerism, between the mesmeriser and the subject. The mesmeriser was pinched, or made to feel pain in some way, in some particular part of his body; and the subject, who could neither touch nor see him, then, in almost all cases, gave an indication of suffering the same pain in the same part. These experiments still continued to be satisfactory even when a screen was interposed or when the mesmeriser was in the next room. The only part of the body where failure occurred was the hair; and some experiments as to the transference of tastes were also unsatisfactory. In other cases experiments were tried which showed that the subject was deaf to all noises except to the operator's voice; but to this he was singularly sensitive.

In the discussion a lady remarked that she had been for a long time in the habit of mesmerising fowls, which she had left for half-an-hour in a state of coma without their making any movement.

Mr. Romanes observed that such experiments had taken place as long as 200 years ago; and that Professor Fryer, of Jena, had extended those to other birds, especially to owls, to some animals, especially rabbits, and to some other creatures, as cray-fish. He observed that the experiments with Wells were fully confirmed by the experiments of Professor Heidelberg, who had had the advantage of having his own brother for a subject.

Mr. Myers remarked, in answer to a question, that the Committee were anxious to test the medical powers of mesmerism, and would be very glad to hear of any cases of disease, which seemed susceptible to such treatment. He also dwelt strongly on the fact that the Committee, which included three medical men, were conducting their experiments with all care for the health and welfare of the subjects; and that such experiments should not be undertaken by amateurs except under advice and with the assistance of experienced persons.

The hour was now late, and the proceedings were brought to a close—the two remaining papers on the list being taken as read. These were—one by Professor Barrett, "On Some Phenomena associated with Abnormal Conditions of Mind;" and another by Dr. Purdon "On Perturbed Vision in Sensitives."

"DICTIONARY OF COMMON WANTS."—The second number of this very novel and exceedingly useful dictionary has just been issued. It is a comprehensive alphabetical guide to purchasers—showing at a glance where any one may most readily buy just what he wants. It is issued by the Ross Publishing Company, 4, Wine Office-court, E.C.

THE C. A. S. LIBRARY.—Other additions have been made to this library during the past week. Amongst these may be mentioned a gift from Mr. Thomas Shorter of a set of Human Nature and a few scarce books and pamphlets. As most of these books will find their way into the circulating section, we trust friends will not omit forwarding books through a fear that they may only send works already on the shelves of the library. Duplicates are very useful.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Friends are reminded that under existing regulations tickets for the forthcoming lectures cannot be obtained at the doors of the hall. They must be applied for previously. For particulars, see advertisement on front page of cover.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

Reports of the proceedings of Spiritualist Societies in as succinct a form as possible, and authenticated by the signature of a responsible officer, are solicited for insertion in "LIGHT." Members of private circles will also oblige by contributing brief records of noteworthy occurrences at their sittings.

The Editor cannot undertake the return of manuscripts unless the writers expressly request it at the time of forwarding and enclose stamps for the return postage.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

The Annual Subscription for "LIGHT," post free to any address within the United Kingdom, or to places comprised within the Postal Union, including all parts of Europe, the United States, and British North America, is 10s. 10d. per annum, forwarded to our office in advance.

ADVERTISEMENT CHARGES.

Five lines and under, 3s. One inch, 4s. 6d. Half-column, £1. Whole Column, £2 2s. Page, £4. A reduction made for a series of insertions.

Orders for Papers and Advertisements may be addressed to Mr. J. J. MONSE, the business agent. All other communications should be sent to "The Editor." Cheques and Post Office Orders may be made payable to EDWARD T. BARNETT, at the Chief Office, London. Halfpenny Postage Stamps received for amounts under 10s.

Orders for Advertisements may also be sent to "The Ross Publishing Company," 4, Wine Office Court, Fleet Street, E.C., on or before Wednesday in each week.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

THOUGHT-TRANSFERENCE.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, Part II.
London: Trübner and Co., Ludgate Hill. Price 2s. 6d.

The second part of the Proceedings of this Society has just been issued, and forms a very valuable contribution to the literature of the subjects with which it deals. Considerations of time and space will only allow us before going to press briefly to draw attention to the various papers and make one or two quotations. Indeed, were it otherwise, we do not think a summary would give any fair idea of the pamphlet under consideration: each paper requires to be read in detail to be properly appreciated. The contents of this part comprise amongst other items the (1) Second Report of Committee on Thought-Transference—with illustrations; (2) Preliminary Report of the "Reichenbach" Committee; (3) First Report of the Committee on "Haunted Houses"; (4) Report of the Literary Committee; (5) on "Clairvoyance," by G. Wyld, M.D. (Abstract.)

We shall at present confine ourselves to the first-named report, reserving the others for future attention. The Thought-transference Committee have pursued their inquiry with much zeal and discretion. Their report is not only valuable and interesting, but to our mind very clearly indicates the direction in which their researches are tending, viz., the establishment, in another and may be more desirable manner, of the general conclusions at which educated Spiritualists have arrived long since. We simply place that fact on record.

Experiments have been made in various places and with various individuals, but by far the most remarkable results have been obtained through Mr. G. A. Smith, a mesmerist, living at Brighton. The experiments are described in the following extract, and through the courtesy of the Council of the Society for Psychical Research, we are able to reproduce some of the illustrations referred to in the note of the experiments which took place on December 4th. (See opposite page.) They are sufficiently clear to speak for themselves, and we would simply add that a note is appended to the report, stating that the experiments have been continued and improved, no contact whatever being found necessary between Mr. Blackburn and his sensitive Mr. Smith.

"In the last Report (p. 63) a letter is quoted from Mr. Blackburn, of Brighton, who is now an associate of our Society, and who is a very painstaking and accurate observer, to the effect that he had obtained remarkable results in thought-reading, or will-impression, with a Mr. G. A. Smith, a young mesmerist living at Brighton.

"We entered into correspondence with Mr. Blackburn, who thereupon took the trouble to send us a paper recording in detail his experiments with Mr. Smith. These statements appeared to be so carefully made that two of our number, Mr. Myers and Mr. Gurney (Mr. Barrett being unable to go at the time), arranged to pay a visit to Brighton personally to investigate the joint experiments of Mr. Blackburn and Mr. Smith. These gentlemen most obligingly placed themselves at our service, and a series of trials were made in our own lodgings at Brighton. The results of these trials give us the most important and valuable insight into the manner of the mental transfer of a picture which we have yet obtained.

"Mr. Blackburn has frequently practised thought-reading with Mr. Smith; but at the time when our first experiments were made, he had been accustomed to hold Mr. Smith's hand, or touch his forehead, with a view to communicating the impression. No unconscious pressure, however, could have communicated to the subject the definite words and picture enumerated below. Though some of the early experiments are not striking, we prefer to give the whole series, that a due estimate may be formed of the chances against mere coincidence as an explanation.

"We next drew a series of diagrams of a simple geometrical kind, which were placed behind S., so that B. could see them. S. described them in each case correctly, except that he generally reversed them, seeing the upper side of the diagram downward, the right hand side to the left, &c.

"Next day (December 4) we varied this experiment, thus:—

"One of us, completely out of sight of S., drew some figure at random, the figure being of such a character that its shape could not be easily conveyed in words; this was done in order to meet the assumption that some code—such as the Morse alphabet—was used by S. and B. The figure drawn by us was then shewn to B. for a few moments,—S. being seated all the time with his back to us and blindfolded, in a distant part of the same room, and subsequently in an adjoining room.

"B. looked at the figure drawn; then held S.'s hand for a while; then released it. After being released, S. (who remained blindfolded) drew the impression of a figure which he had received. It was generally about as like the original as a child's blindfold drawing of a pig is like a pig; that is to say, it was a scrawl, but recognisable as intended to represent the original figure. In no case was there the smallest possibility that S. could have seen the original figure; and in no case did B. touch S. even in the slightest manner, while the figure was being drawn.

"In one case, No. 6 in the series, the copy may be said to be as exact as S. could have drawn it blindfolded if he had previously seen the original. The figures were not reversed on this day, as they had been on the previous one."

The Preparation of Inquirers and the Graduation of the Phenomena.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The new generations ever mount upon the experiences of the old, and thus the world advances,—provided the old have really gained wisdom, and the coming "golden youth" are diligent to profit by it. In view of what you call an infusion of "new blood" in Spiritualism, permit me, as representative of the "old," to offer some remarks which I trust may prove useful in that "preparation" you would inaugurate for the "coming race" of inquirers and students of psychological science.

You speak of a "change" having passed over the spiritual movement; a change, indeed, for it is that of death and decay. Not of the Truth, but of the old body, or "shell"—the external presentment, or form which Spiritualism—call it a science, a fanaticism, a delusion, a "movement," or magic, what you will—was made to assume by the motley multitude who seized upon it in the beginning as a novelty, whether in knowledge, or religion, or mere sensationalism. A better shape and form, or "method," could probably not be expected from the nature of the world's population at this stage of its evolution in the nineteenth century,—the cultivated, intellectual animal merely presenting the spiritual type as the rarest "efflorescence of the age."

What would be expected of such a multitude but that, in many instances, it would degrade to a base and evil use the pearl of great price cast at its feet? Had it not been for the few really spiritually minded who were ready to receive it in its inner and higher import, this knowledge of the mystic powers inherent in man, would have been lost in the mire of utter depravity and animalism. We have only to review the history of Spiritualism for the last thirty years, and recall some of the excesses of certain individuals in America, and perhaps also in England, who ranked themselves under our banners, to verify the truth of my words.

This noblest of sciences, so pregnant of good to man, but so easily perverted to his injury, has been rescued by the few good and true, who have worn it upon their breasts as a light, shining out for the benefit of their fellow-men; and because of these, men and women who have, so far, evolved an innate divinity, Spiritualism alone deserves to still bear a name on the earth, to the sound of which the pure, the good, and the wise, may assemble together with the praiseworthy intention of doing their little towards the advancement of mankind. For is not Spiritualism very much what each man makes it for himself? It is a very Proteus, and assumes the shape of the mind which receives it. With the fanatical religionist it will become a fanaticism; with the man of science merely a field for experimental research, speaking nought to his inner, higher nature, when peradventure that is still dormant,—a germ hidden beneath the adamant mental soil of mere materiality belonging to the intellectual animal. With the vulgar seeker after novel sensations or amusement to fill up an idle hour, it will produce indeed some extremely novel sensations, and be as amusing as any other show got up for money. With those whose mediocre intellects are ever seeking the pleasing titillation of the marvellous, it will be prolific of all that is wonderful and seemingly miraculous, until they stand trembling in their shoes: and if they be egotistically self-righteous, they will end by imagining Heaven itself to have opened to their especially favoured gaze, and the "highest aristocracy" of the supernal realms to have descended for their sole and isolated benefit—perchance materialising, and taking away bouquets, and otherwise disporting themselves in these lower regions, regardless of all spiritual laws to the contrary. My words may seem severe and caustic, but I am only depicting, with the calm irony the subject deserves, a few of the follies into which some very good, well-meaning people have drifted in their pursuit of Spiritualism—follies which never would have had birth had they possessed that real modesty and humility which characterises the unegotistic mind. We have all had abundant experiences of the painfully distorted shapes Spiritualism has been made to assume by those fanatics whose egotism has led them to expect their special selection for the signal favour of Heaven, a delusion which leads sooner or later to self-absorption, a species of "morbidness," isolation from their families, and insanity more or less declared, which always ensues where the mind becomes unhealthily fixed upon one subject, of whatsoever nature it may be. It is owing to such, and other distortions, that Spiritualism has been made for some of the best and highest intellects the world possesses, a folly and a shame. These, looking only at the surface, do not feel themselves attracted, but repelled by the miserable harlequinade of human eccentricity presented to their gaze; in some of its aspects broadly vulgar, toying with sacred things to the extent of what is blasphemy to minds of religious refinement; and again, wearing the appearance of a species of transcendental fanaticism which savours strongly of insanity. Of course I depict extremes: the sober-minded juste milieu of the only real upholders of Spiritualism needs no setting forth, and although it may be unpleasant to have the mirror so held up to our errors and follies, I trust it may be excused for the wholesome lesson to be gained by seeing ourselves "as others see us."

It behoves us, who would set ourselves up as world-teachers and the exponents of psychological science, not to blind our eyes to the follies and abuses which sprang up in our ranks, and may shew themselves again, if we, from the lessons gained through painful experience, do not administer to those who seek for information, the antidote to that bane which has ever dwelt in the very heart and core of mysticism. Spiritualism, as we may call it, may be a blessing or a curse. It may be sorcery, magic, or witchcraft, or it may be the legitimate exercise of a knowledge truly divine—the knowledge of the mystic powers of the spirit the only thing which lifts man above the brute. But who is prepared to enter that holy and divine temple of knowledge—by no means newly opened to man? Not the oi polloi whose desecrating feet only soil the outer precincts; but those rare products of the age, who, even if they number some few hundreds, are still the select few, whose minds have gone in advance of the world's thousands. And of these many will die, to return again and pick up the thread broken off, ere they penetrate to the sacred inmost, and thus complete the lesson of their lives.

A work so grand, so prolific of stupendous results to our race, which would make or mar its destinies, which would bring pandemonium or Heaven upon the earth, should not by any means be lightly taken up; but with a due sense of its importance, and the responsibility attaching to those who would be introducers of neophytes to a field of research which, without due precautions, may become the scene of a moral and physical wreck. Has it not been so, Mr. Editor? Have we not seen many instances of such dire mishaps, not only in America but in England, and other countries, making us draw back aghast and trembling, with conscience severely scrutinising the right or the wrong of Spiritualism? It needs not that we point to folly and weakness of mind on the part of those who blindly rush into the abuse of a thing they have never rightly learned to use; but it is essential that we recognise the cause of these misfortunes, and that cause lies in those "methods" of which you speak in your editorial of April 14th. In the same paper the remarks of "Imperator" to his medium, give a very precise answer to your request for a "free and representative" expression of opinion upon the "Preparation of Inquirers for Investigation," &c. In that communication, given in 1875, the dangers of some of our long upheld "methods" are plainly set forth. Many of us, who were in the thick of the battle at that time, were painfully and slowly learning these facts; for not at once and by a flash may the lessons of experience come, but by the oft-repeated sufferings of days, weeks, months, and years. How many have retired sorely wounded from the conflict, through which "M.A." was safely piloted (not the only one), will never be known. In the secrecy of their own chambers, in the awful, cold, unsympathetic, and relentless silence of the night, their agonising struggles with the "adversaries" have taken place, with no eye to see, no ear to hear, but the Spirit of Justice above. These have remained unwritten and unexpressed to mortal ears, but are indelibly recorded in the Astral Light—for good, let us hope, to our fellow men.

I will quote a few of "Imperator's" most eloquent and forcible remarks, italicising what I wish to make more impressive still: "In proportion as mediumship is diverted into strange and abnormal channels, it becomes dangerous. Any repeated and constant exercise of the power for physical purposes other than mere equilibration, is fraught with risk, inasmuch as it develops that which is unnatural and abnormal, and in the end must deprave the medium. Deprave, we say, and the word is not too strong!! (Deprave! Yes, we have, through all these years, publicly proved the truth of these words, and suffered in sympathy with the unhappy victims who have too plainly shewn it.) "Either the vital forces will be sapped, and physical health destroyed, or, more frequently, the mental balance will be destroyed, or, most frequently of all, the medium will become the instrument of intelligences devoid of high moral consciousness, and so his morals will be deteriorated. (!!) In one or more of these ways harm will sooner or later ensue. This is the perversion of mediumship, and should only be tolerated (!) in the case of those who are sacrificed for the public good in spreading conviction to those who can be reached in no other way." Are such sacrifices any longer essential? Are we to consent to provide victims to be offered up on the altar of vulgar curiosity veiled under the pretence of investigation? Is it not our duty to take care of, protect, and do all we can to educate and elevate those who consent to use their abnormal powers in our service? If we do not, we shall soon have no such helpful instruments for research, for the mediums will learn to take care of themselves, and refuse to be sacrificed morally as well as physically, for the benefit of the ruthless public who would trample even upon their simple rights as human beings.

"Imperator" also alludes to the "dangerous conditions of trance:" (unconscious)—there is another of our mistaken "methods." Every man and woman should be in the full uncontrolled exercise of his or her own intellect and will, and the chooser of what may be done to them.

Again "Imperator:"—"It is necessary that you learn the nature of the spirits who surround your earth, in order that you may dominate, and keep them at bay,"—not that they may dominate you, which certainly takes place with those mediums who ignorantly yield themselves to unconscious "control," as it is called.

"The work best worth doing," says "Imperator," "is the cultivation of your highest powers, the development of your own spirit"—noble words of advice, given through other mediums as well, and which should be printed in letters of gold; but advice it is simply impossible to follow when wasted and exhausted, brain and body, by the constant, uninterrupted exercise of mediumship, whether of trance, clairvoyance, healing, or physical manifestations, and especially those most injurious materialisations. Nature has to be wholly engaged, during the periods of rest, in the work of recuperation. It is our mistake not only to permit, but to encourage this sort of thing. I have known persons, in their greed for manifestations, to permit mediums, whom they knew to be suffering from chronic disease, to give them long and fatiguing materialisation sances; thus exposing the medium and themselves to untold dangers of body and spirit. Diseases are communicable; but if you do not take them on, you take on the conditions, and attract the presence of low, unwholesome entities. Those mediums who are ignorant of what is due to themselves, should be kindly taught their highest necessities, if they would escape the painful catastrophes which the neglect of those duties brings upon them.

Change implies progression: "The new life reaps what the old life did sow." Old states and conditions cramp the soul, which is ever struggling to liberate itself from the narrow and straitened habits of the past, which, if it be really living and healthy, it continually outgrows. So with Spiritualism, and the minds which have, up to the present day, expanded by its aid, and enlarged the boundaries of their thoughts to the realm of the spiritual. The field is infinite in extent, and inexhaustible of treasures, but it is essential to cast aside the old implements of cultivation, and invent safer and more certain methods. Heretofore our progress has been marked by more or less grovelling in materiality. Unable to reach higher, the majority have degraded Spiritualism in cultivating exclusively those manifestations which appeal to the senses; hence the grosser form of physical sance, with its loud buffoonery, its bare escape of blasphemy in dealing with sacred things; and the too frequently very evident manifested presence of an order of disembodied entities one might safely style "roughs from Hades." Surely all the better class of minds amongst Spiritualists, will admit that the day for this sort of things past. It was the outgrowth entirely of the ignorance that attended the pursuit of this science in the beginning, and, in some respects, was an importation from America. Let us hope that it will now become a relic of the "dark ages" of Spiritualism. To suggest any particular methods or forms is not necessary; these will grow out of the minds of those desirous of making improvements; of getting rid of ignorance, stupidity, and vulgarity; and of having something more acceptable to the mental cultivation and refinement of the period.

It is surprising that the higher and more intellectual psychic powers are not more cultivated in this country. I do not mean the form of trance address, which is too often "more honoured in the breach than the observance"; nor the incessant drivel of inane doggerel, called "Inspirational Poems," and supposed to come from very exalted beings, both of which only succeed, at times, in amusingly displaying the ignorance of the medium; I mean rather those rarer forms which include clairvoyance, the penetration of the spirit behind the veil into things occult, or hidden from ordinary sight. I do not believe there is a single good Psychometrist in all England. I mean of the type so admirably exemplified in the person of Mrs. Buchanan, of New York, and a few others. For even this most subtle and delicate science is invaded by ignorance, pretension, and deceit.

If we seek to teach we must be prepared and ready to point out that which is error, and attended with danger. We must be willing to revise our "methods," and desirous to take such a stand before the world as shall command the respect of the wise and good. We must prove that we have something worthy of their attention, and that "the science of the powers of the soul," is not the plaything of fools, the infatuation of imbecile dupes, nor the vulgar claptrap of impostors, but a knowledge of the divinest powers of human kind, which rightly pursued, must lead to the elevation of humanity.

If we wish for the conjurer, the low-class magician, or sorcerer, it is very possible we may have them in scores, but it is for us to discourage the cultivation of such base and destructive powers of perverted human nature. Let us, for instance, be quite sure that what we have termed "physical sances," do not resemble the incantations employed by ignorant and barbarous tribes, who indulge in "Spirit-Worship," like the lower class Shamans of Siberia. With these, noises and frenzy attract a low type of those entities who more immediately "surround our earth," as "Imperator" says.

There is a right and a wrong; we must pursue the right, and relentlessly crush out the wrong, or again will the strong hand of the priesthood or the law arrest and forbid the legitimate inquiry of man in a field bristling with the most diabolical dangers to the human race, but which, on the other hand, undoubtedly opens to the pure-minded, humble, self-conquering student, an apotheosis like that of the only divine men the world has ever known—the "great souls" who have entered upon their glory, whose light, like that of Jesus, shines undimmed along the ages.

There is something higher than mediumship. Let us encourage our mediums to seek that, and we shall have a body of men and women all may not only trust but revere.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

"Death: its Beauty and Utility." Is not this a little exacting, or is it poetical license merely? As things go, a plébisite upon the question, unless manipulated from his present standpoint by the skilful and experienced shade of the last of the Emperors of the French, would probably negative absolutely the whole of the proposition involved in this location; and if, by judicious skirmishing, a fairly respectable minority could be brought to admit the utility of the process which conducts its victims to an advanced form of life, it might yet be prudent to avoid the risk of a distressing revulsion of feeling by not insisting too emphatically upon its beauty. But this is to omit from the reckoning the uncompromising Spiritualist who will not even accept the aid of the refining logic of the schools, and say that beauty and utility are interchangeable terms; he knows of the utility of Death, and is fully persuaded of its abstract beauty. To him the grim monster, the paralysing incubus of the world, is a bright-robed messenger, an ambassador from God, bringing gladness and hope and sunshine. He accepts the terse definition of the controls of Mr. Morse—death is change, simply that; and following up their introductory argument of the essential identity of the form of transition, in every department of being, can say—

"The presence of perpetual change
Is ever on the earth,
To-day is only as the soil
That gives to-morrow birth.

While in all changes brighter things,
And better, have their birth."

The grand secret is that Spiritualism, apart from its universally "bright belongings," proves the fact of the continuity of life, and the orderly sequence of its conditions.

The fear of death being thus removed, the spirit is liberated for the cheerful discharge of current duties, absolutely assured that a present righteousness is the only real foundation for future happiness, and that alike in purpose and plan his God rules all things wisely and well. With special reference to the utility of death, the lecturer referred in some detail to the analogous operation, of the principle of change, everywhere in organic and inorganic nature. We are ourselves evolved from precedent conditions, every one of which must have died, and the ruins of one age are the bases of the reforms, or growth of the next, alike in the mineral, the vegetable, and the animal departments.

If the change is approached by man in disregard or disbelief of the fact that, as in Nature generally, so with him, death is but a brighter birth, and not "the end of all things," the outlook is unquestionably melancholy, and most conspicuously so in the case of the trained intellect and otherwise well-ordered life, because suggestive of the lapse of personal powers at the period of their apparently highest capacity. If such men would but recognise that earth-life is the very workshop of God, where immortal beings are simply set upon their career, for all eternity, as so many models for His manipulative skill through the agencies of nature, how much would be gained! For all alike, for the Spiritualist and the sceptic, the first duties are, truly enough, here and now always; but in their very nature they produce or affect and characterise the future. One of the most important of these earlier duties is a careful cultivation of the physical life to prevent undue or premature death. To die naturally is to "shuffle off this mortal coil," losing each sense gradually, as each is worn out, and that with no more sorrow or distress than is experienced in sleep. The exciting suggestion was made that when once we learn fully the nature of our being, and of our surroundings, and thus command a position of absolute mastery of our own innate powers and resources, we may voluntarily transfer our existence from one to another stage of life. The idea may seem extravagant, said the controls, but the time for its realisation shall come. Consciousness is always dependent upon some form of machinery for its expression. Hence death, as an incident of life, must involve the supply of appropriate powers for new conditions. And in truth, the development of the spiritual is concurrent with the use of the natural body; and such an envelope is fully and regularly formed when, one by one, the limbs which have bound your conscious life to the physical frame are separately severed. Thereupon the enfranchised soul shall wing its way to the immortal realms beyond, to an eternity of interior grace and goodness. But, if the dead do thus survive, surely, it may be said, they can disclose the fact? The suggestion is perfectly rational; for although the philosophy and the religion of the world at large are inadequate to the solution of the mystery, Spiritualists assert positively, and with abundant reason, that these so-called dead return to them. Not that they have reached this assurance of conviction with ready acquiescence. It is indeed usually only after much turmoil of mind, and struggling with facts, that the position is so far clear, that if the results of accumulated experiment are to be ignored, then the ordinary application of the senses to the concerns of our daily physical lives must be abandoned also. Presently the assurance is too definite to be further questioned, and then the old terror of death is promptly dissipated, its beauty and utility are fully grasped, there is no further limit to the horizon of being; with each ascending change we amend our thoughts, abandon our speculations, reconstruct our lives. We perceive that Nature is always glad,—glad at birth, glad at so-called death,—and that the grave is only a laboratory where the body is draped with spiritual garments, and clothed with light. There may remain, if you like, a sadness of sweetness, a sadness of parting, but even that shall be gradually overcome; for when the world has advanced to that common apprehension of all the conditions of life, to which reference has been already made, the "open vision" shall return, and men shall see the blessedness of the souls around them.

"Scatter the germs of the beautiful
In the depths of every soul,
They shall bud and blossom and bear the fruit
While the endless ages roll."

Hail then to Death, to death which is ever the precursor of Birth!

The evening of Sunday next, May 6th, at these rooms, will be devoted to "Questions and Answers." See the advertisement on front advertisement page.

QUEBEC HALL.

On Monday evening last, the 30th ult., the first of a series of three public entertainments in aid of the Mansion House Fund for the bereaved families of the 400 fishermen who were drowned during the great storm of March last in the present year, was held in this hall. The object in view is to raise an amount of money to be sent to the fund in the name of the Spiritualists of the Metropolis—thereby illustrating the fact that they are fully alive to the duty of practising that charity and sympathy which their philosophy inculcates. The performance consisted of songs and recitations, and the burden of the evening fell mainly upon the Misses Dale and Freeman, and Messrs. Iver MacDonnell, Handwork, Wilson, Greenwell, and Brown. Mr. J. J. Morse presided, and the amount obtained will constitute an acceptable nucleus to the fund proposed to be raised.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—On Wednesday evening, April 25th, the members and friends of Spiritualism on Tyneside gave a reception to Mrs. E. H. Britten, under the auspices of the N. S. E. S., and we are glad to say the large and enthusiastic gathering on that occasion was equal to the worthiness of the object. About one hundred sat down to tea, which had been most generously provided by the ladies of the Society, after which followed some vocal and instrumental music. About nine o'clock, Mr. H. A. Kersey, chairman of the meeting, called upon Mr. Thomas Thompson to move the following resolution: "That this meeting of Tyneside Spiritualists embraces this opportunity to express to Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten their deep sense of the valuable aid which she has conferred on the movement of Spiritualism by her untiring devotion to the practical work connected therewith; and their profound gratitude for the same. She has, both by tongue and pen, rendered such eloquent and powerful support, and has also striven ever zealously to maintain the higher aspects of the movement, thereby commanding the love and esteem of all true-hearted Spiritualists, whether in England, America, or other English-speaking countries. This meeting also desires to express their heartfelt acknowledgment to her spirit guides for the highly-important part which they have played in the development of so valuable a medium for the education and enlightenment of humanity on the facts and philosophy of our movement, and for their subsequent faithful charge over her. Whilst wishing our dear friend God-speed in her great work, we sincerely hope that so valuable a life may long be spared to bless the world, and that the ministrations of angel friends may ever guard, cheer, and strengthen her till she, herself, passes the bright and shining portals of the Summer Land." In moving this resolution, Mr. Thompson supported it with a few warm and eulogistic remarks upon the value of woman's work, and its far-reaching tendencies, especially as demonstrated in the valuable life of the lady they had met to honour. Mr. Henry Burton seconded the resolution in a few earnest words. He indicated how, in these days, the tendency of human thought was shewn in its craving for facts; and, how many, finding the creeds were unable to satisfy them as to the vital point of immortality, were drifting towards a scientific materialism that, to all intents, was a practical atheism. Spiritualism, however, with its God-given light has brought unto the world a glorious truth which is destined to revolutionise the ages and brighten the souls of men with the surety of immortality, and that in the promulgation of this great truth this good and eloquent lady stood forth as one of its earliest, its foremost, its ablest, and its most courageous propounders and defenders. She was worthy of all our commendation, and he trusted she would long be spared to labour for the cause. Mr. Henry Appleby, of North Shields, also spoke in support of the resolution, after which Mr. Kersey put the resolution to the meeting, which was carried with enthusiastic applause. Mrs. Britten, in her reply, tendered her inexpressible gratitude to the friends of Tyneside for the deep and grateful appreciation they had expressed that evening towards her and the good masters (her guides) for her labours of love in the ranks of our great and good cause. She followed with an able and instructive address, in which the expression of her gratitude and her solicitude for the greatness and goodness of our cause sank deep into the hearts of all present. The second part of the programme having been carried out the gathering broke up. On Sunday last, morning and evening, Mrs. Britten lectured to overflowing audiences at the N.S.E.S. Hall, Weirs-court; in the morning on "Who are the Infidels?" and in the evening, "Who are the World's Saviours?" Mr. T. P. Barkas, F.G.S., occupied the chair, and was supported on the platform by Messrs. Kersey, Burton, Thompson, and other well-known Spiritualists of the North country.

NORTHUMBRIA.

Word and Work continues its articles on "Probation in Death," in which the editor, and the Revs. Messrs. Aitken and Joseph Cook have figured prominently. They are in the main another example of the power of mere textual criticism adding another shock to unreasoning faith.

SEANCES WITH MR. J. CECIL HUSK.—On Thursday evening next, the 10th inst., at 7.30 o'clock, the first of a series of weekly subscription sances with Mr. Husk, will be held on the premises of the Central Association of Spiritualists, 38, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, to which members of the Association only are entitled to admittance. Tickets, price 2s. 6d. each, can be obtained on application to the resident secretary, prior to the date of each sance.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are compelled to defer publication of several communications owing to the pressure on our space this week.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

(With which is incorporated the British National Association of Spiritualists. Established 1873.)

38, GREAT RUSSELL ST., BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.
(Entrance in WOBURN STREET.)

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed for the purpose of uniting Spiritualists of every variety of opinion in an organised body, with a view of promoting the investigation of the facts of Spiritualism, and of aiding students and inquirers in their researches by providing them with the best means of investigation.

The Association is governed by a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Council of thirty Members elected annually. The Reference and Lending Libraries contain a large collection of the best works on Spiritualism and occult subjects. Spiritualist and other newspapers and periodicals from all parts of the world are regularly supplied for the Reading Room, to which Members have access daily.

The Secretary, or his representative, is in attendance to receive visitors, and answer enquiries; on Saturdays, from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.; on other days from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. On Sundays the Rooms are closed.

Spiritualists and others visiting the Metropolis are cordially invited to visit the Association and inspect the various objects of interest on view in the Reading Room and Library. Information is cheerfully afforded to enquirers on all questions affecting Spiritualism.

Members' Free, Séances are held on Wednesday evenings at 8 o'clock prompt, subject to certain regulations, which can be ascertained on application.

Discussion Meetings are held fortnightly during the winter months. Admission free to Members and Subscribers, who can introduce one or more friends to each meeting. Programmes can be obtained on application during the winter season.

Soirées, at which all friends are welcome, are held at intervals during the season. An admission fee is charged, including refreshments.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

PRELIMINARY ORGANISATION.

Report and Statements of Account upon the work of the trial period, from January 7th, to April 1st, 1883, inclusive.

1. The promoters of this Association, in pursuance of the plan described in their prospectus, convened a meeting of the members on the 14th November, 1882, for the purpose of electing a provisional Council, when the names appended to this report were submitted and approved.

2. As the action of this Council has been mainly governed by the terms of the same document, which imposes upon them the duty, at this date, of reviewing alike the course of the experiment and the present situation, it is now necessary—

1st. To compare the promise and suggestion of work with the performance.

2nd. To quote the cash cost.

3rd. To submit some reflections upon the facts, and to indicate their bearing upon the immediate future of the Lyceum.

3. In conformity with clauses 3 and 10 of the prospectus, the Council promptly secured the use, for Sunday services, of St. Andrew's Hall, Newman-street, Oxford-street, and engaged Mr. J. J. Morse as permanent lecturer. The opening services of January 7th and 14th were attended by Mrs. Hardinge Britten, who addressed large audiences upon "Spiritualism in the Nineteenth Century," and "What do we know concerning the origin and destiny of Man?" while, between those dates, she kindly and generously assisted at one public meeting, at one gathering of the members and friends of the Central Association of Spiritualists, and held one private reception: in all, doing excellent work for the cause. The subjects selected by the Controls of Mr. Morse, were:—

"The Spiritual Platform: its Place and Work to-day."

"Immortal Life: Miraculous or Sequential."

"Humanity: its Birth; its Life; its Death; its Resurrection." (Four lectures.)

"Spiritualism: its Dangers."

"The Coming Priest."

"Spiritualism as a Personal Need."

"The Divine Revelation."

"Day Cometh."

We have not yet had opportunity "to encourage the occasional ministrations of other lecturers," because the series named has proved of such commanding interest, and been sustained with such consummate ability and exhaustive resource that any interruption would have been indefensible. Upon the action and work of these powerful Controls we have the pleasure to annex copy of a memorandum prepared by their accomplished medium: it merits attentive perusal, and most assuredly conveys an expression of the common thought of the small body of workers associated with him. The readings have been selected from the Jewish, Christian, Persian and Parsi Scriptures; from the following prose authors: R. D. Owen, C. Darwin, Judge Edmonds, A. R. Wallace, Dr. Bridges, and Frederic Harrison; and from the following poets, Lizzie Doten, Pope, Wordsworth, Milton, Longfellow, Tennyson, Hemans, and Shelley. During the thirteen weeks, as many as eleven anthems were introduced, shewing repetition of two only. A small special collection of hymns of high literary merit, free from dogma, while sufficiently positive morally, and of varied and instructive character, was prepared and printed, and has so far sufficed for a perfectly appropriate choice each Sunday, in illustration, like the readings, of the topics of the several lectures. Upon the work of these two departments we are concerned to mention that we have been largely and effectively assisted by the cordial and self-denying exertions of a few friends outside of the Council, because it will be a relief to us, on our own account, to anticipate the thanks which we are quite sure will be heartily accorded to them; but we must add that the work is sufficiently heavy to justify an appeal for further volunteer help, if only to release some of us who have other and still more needful duties to discharge.

4. We have broken ground also with the "contingent range of work" referred to in clause 4 of prospectus. Three experimental circles, nominal and select, with a view to individual conviction, have been organised, and are making fair progress, preserving careful minutes of their proceedings. Systematic efforts, based upon the allocation of a minimum of 10 per cent. of our gross collections—all too little, unhappily—are being gradually elaborated for the aid of the sick and poor, utterly regardless of religious belief. A number of ladies are associated with this branch, and personally work with a zealous persistence and fulness of sympathy quite delightful to witness and to record. They are teaching us practically that Spiritualism means universal brotherhood. The special form of relief to this date—not, however, designed to be exclusive—has been the preparation of clothing for sick women and children in the East of London, care being taken not to weaken independence of character by giving absolutely when a small payment on account can be exacted. Other details will be cheerfully furnished to all inquirers, and every kind of help welcomed. Time will be saved by addressing Mrs. Williams direct at 87, Highbury New Park, N.

The further work contemplated by clause 4, namely, week-day lectures and discussions, with associated library and reading-rooms, is never absent from our thoughts, but awaits pecuniary and other support.

5. The order of the Sunday services, as prescribed by clause 7, and the precautionary arrangements of clauses 6 and 8, as these affect some details of our plans, have been scrupulously followed, and with fair success.

6. The promised accounts, to shew the disposal of the funds entrusted to us, are introduced at foot. It will be seen that after applying the whole of the small membership subscription and the guarantee fund, there is a deficiency upon the working of £48 4s. 5d. This has been met by cash advances from members of Council, so that all claims by third parties have been promptly discharged. In any ordinary commercial enterprise, the deficiency quoted would be regarded as preliminary establishment expenses, to be liquidated gradually from the later resources of the going concern, and for the present we look at the situation in the same light. It will be understood, too, that an experiment of this nature, however economically conducted, presently discloses forms of disbursement which appear to have been unproductive, and must therefore be revised, and, perhaps, abandoned. The Council has kept constant and anxious watch upon all outgoings, and now beg leave, for the legitimate satisfaction of the members and other friends, to submit a brief analysis of the principal items. The cost of Mrs. Britten's visit, after crediting the collections of two Sundays, was about £20, and one effect of that visit certainly was to make our proposed work known to a large number of Spiritualists whom we should not otherwise have so readily reached. With some very kind and highly appreciated exceptions, however, including more particularly a few of the leading members of the Central Association, with whom we are in friendly alliance, and to whom we are indebted for much considerate attention and opportune assistance, they have not since supported us in any way; but the expenditure may yet be productive, although it must be remembered that we are seeking more particularly to influence outsiders.

The hall rent was £2 10s. weekly, subject to reduction to £2 2s. if continued. When taken we could learn of no other available place in a convenient situation upon equally favourable terms, but we have recently secured the Cavendish Rooms at a rate which promises a weekly saving of about £1. While these rooms would not have sufficed for the audiences of January 7th and 14th they would have answered very well for our general requirements so far; but apart from the fact that a higher price was then asked, we had to gauge our need by experience. The experiment may, at the worst, be said to have cost us £13 in excess of the now current rate, actual or contingent. In the next place we have spent in printing and advertising, through the Press and by circular and otherwise, and in distributive literature, from £7 to £10 (according to the classification adopted) in a purely tentative way. All will feel the absolute necessity of such outlay when the purpose is to introduce to general notice an untried organisation. We doubt, indeed, if we have spent enough in this department. Well, these amounts, giving a total of over £40, go a long way towards explaining our deficiency, and we hope will be held to justify the outlay under review. It will be noticed that the collections after the services have averaged £1 16s. 4d. weekly. Of this amount as much as 6s. was, on average, contributed in coppers, while the receipts for the sick and poor never exceeded a few pence unless private and personal appeal was made, by the energetic ladies in charge of that branch. In that way the result has been encouraging, because while the sum entrusted to us is not large, it exhibits the comparative success of 17 per cent. of the total general income.

Some of these facts, which seem to reflect upon the liberality of our friends, and upon Spiritualists more particularly, do really supply a very forcible argument for the unflinching prosecution of the work in hand, if only to bring our practice into greater conformity with our professions, and to honour our cause by showing how little the cost affects us in the presence of its urgent need. We shall go on steadily in that spirit.

7. The last observation must be taken as subject to the continuance of your confidence in us. In compliance with the provisions of our prospectus we now severally resign our offices.

8. To guide your judgment and to assist the work of our successors, we remind you that the original proposal was that you should now appoint a committee to prepare a "Constitution or rules and regulations for the future management of the Lyceum." Pending the presentation of a scheme by such a committee, which, it is also provided, shall be made to a specially convened general meeting, we advise that the same committee shall, as a council, be entrusted with the duties which we now relinquish; that the current work of the preliminary organisation may be pursued without interruption; and that the more enduring effort contemplated may be assisted by the experience they will thus acquire.

We advise that such committee shall be left to its own discretion as to the date for calling this prescribed general meeting, provided only that it be not unduly delayed.

9. We conclude with a few "reflections upon the facts," and proceed to indicate generally, "their bearing upon the immediate future of the Lyceum." Naturally the first thought with all must be—has the work or effort we have just briefly described been conducted in conformity with the spirit of our organisation and sustained by the best available methods? Is that spirit worthy of support; are these methods susceptible of improvement? We would modestly reply to each of these questions in the affirmative. Upon the well considered purpose of the Lyceum we have no misgiving. We are deliberately and always of opinion that in providing an agency for instruction upon the nature and obligations of life, of a sufficiently comprehensive character to reach alike the believer in, and the scoffer at, our own elevating faith, we cannot fail of good results; practically wholesome here, and abundantly efficacious hereafter. Can not fail. Associated with this main purpose, there is necessarily, from our point of view, an earnest desire to assist all inquirers, and untiringly to urge investigation into the cardinal fact, or principle of Spirit Communism; and we are supremely happy in the knowledge, born of constant intercourse, that the exalted character, profound ability, and unfailing readiness and resource of the always eloquent and earnest and skilful Controls of our worthy permanent lecturer, are ungrudgingly at our service in each department. To guide the life, then, and to supply an adequate motive for self-culture is, in a word, our purpose. But as to the details of our methods! Quite obviously these are largely affected by our means, pecuniary and personal, so that the absolute best, however clearly apparent, is not always available. Take some illustrations of this position. We are sure that we cannot be even suspected of disloyalty to our lecturer, or to his Controls, who have so recently inaugurated that convincing and valuable form of personal instruction which we have agreed to describe as "Questions and Answers"; but we shall presently advise the occasional introduction of other speakers, with the view of attracting another order of mind and feeling to our services, in the hope of beneficially affecting thus the lives of a larger number. In like manner we shall seek opportunities for the public application of test evidences as soon as we can discover the needful combination of clairvoyant and descriptive faculty with unimpeachable personal character. The further development of inquiry circles, their judicious supervision, and systematic operation cannot be described otherwise than as a measure of absolute necessity, if we are to create the motive power which is so essential to our success. And lectures and discussions upon other departments of the daily life of humanity are equally within our conception of the range of action of our organisation; but all alike, you will perceive, demand pecuniary and personal support. We have hitherto refrained from pressing our claim for such support, because it has seemed to us to be more consistent with our own self-respect to wait until we could show that, apart from mere talk, we were doing good work, and were prepared to do more in a clearly defined way. Perhaps the time has now come to say that the great need of the situation is, a Regular Subscription List, which shall guarantee a certain annual income, and bring into active co-operation with us, or if it is preferred without us, we are quite willing to give place to better men,—a large number of sympathetic minds, of varied ability, fully resolved upon steady work. We now invite such support from all; from those of small means, not less than from those more favoured (as the phrase goes) by fortune, for the smallest contributions periodically renewed will be very welcome, especially if the heart comes with them. Finally, at the risk of unduly prolonging this already lengthy report, we must submit one or two specific recommendations. We wish first to repeat the expression of our desire to make the Sunday services absolutely free to the congregation, as such. Our meetings are held in a fairly central position; but it is clear to us that many come from long distances and cannot afford to add much to their travelling expenses; hence both the coppers we receive and the limitation of our numbers. We wish next, without further delay, to arrange for the publication of verbatim reports of the valuable discourses which it is our individual privilege to hear weekly, and to distribute copies broadcast at the nominal rate of one penny each. We think that a vast amount of good would be accomplished in that way. Then a large field for discriminating charity is opening before us, and we should like to cultivate it promptly, while we really must get to work soon with our library and reading-room. We mention these departments separately because it may happen that some would prefer to assist special branches by subscribing, let us say, for a free services or lectures publication fund, for the library and reading-room, or again, in support of unsectarian charity. In either case we would encourage the preference, and accurately account for all disbursements under the heads named, subject to the one condition, that if the totals contributed are insufficient for a specific purpose, they may, at the discretion of the Council, be applied to the most deserving object. We must add that to start these various divisions of the work, with promise of satisfaction to the subscribers, we need a minimum income of £5 or £6 a week. If we cannot at once get that small sum, the best shall be done, on the lines indicated, with so much as may be supplied on account.

There would then, for the moment, only remain the further need (which we would again respectfully urge upon the competent) of personal help, especially in the musical and readings departments, and in active work for the sick and poor, because some of us, under prolonged strain, do too frequently find that while the spirit is willing enough, the flesh is weak indeed.

APPENDIX BY OUR LECTURER.

Have our spirit friends any message for humanity beyond the demonstration of their own existence, and the giving us evidences of life beyond the grave? To my mind, yes, and for nearly sixteen years, it has been my privilege to do my small part in helping our immortal friends carry the message throughout the length of the land. Ask me what the message is, and my reply is: "Peace on earth and goodwill to men," as a result of higher knowledge concerning our nature, relations, duty and destiny here, and hereafter. We are taught by our spirit friends that we are spirits also, encased in matter, that all our acts have an eternal relation, that right and wrong are stern realities, and they also tell us that that alone which ennobleth men's lives, frees their thoughts, and makes peoples truly great is the one great aim we should ever hold in view. What can help us better than a truer knowledge of ourselves, inspiring, as it does, a truer reverence for the All that is around us. For thirty-five years our teachers have been the spirits. In that time their pleading for reform and liberal thought, in matters of religion, and spiritual truth, have resounded throughout the world, and seeing how much our lives have been blessed by the truths Spiritualism has brought to us, we should consider whether we cannot do something in return. What has been attempted lately the accompanying report will show, and in showing will in part answer the foregoing query.

I appeal to the reader to help the earnest and devoted men and women that have held up my hands during the past three months to sustain my work, which has no other basis than a desire to place at the service of the world a gift that may help to further our common work—spiritual reform. Let there be one platform, at common work—spiritual reform. Let there be one platform, at least, in this teeming city where the truth in regard to God, man, and a future life can be heard in free unfettered terms. I plead not for myself; I am not vain enough to think that, unaided, my voice would be of much avail; but I ask in the name of truth and the spirit world—by whom I was called to the work in the opening of that manhood which has since been wholly given up to it—that we have a free and open platform whereon our best workers can bear with me their share in the service of the spirit-world and the worship of truth.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Reverting to Dr. John Pordage and his instructive experiences, I may direct attention to an article upon him by "J. W. F." in the second volume of the Psychological Review, page 107. This details at length what I briefly related in a recent number of "LIGHT." He was the author of various books, the "Innocency Appearing" being that in which he related his spiritual experiences. One of his works has a preface by Jane Lead, whose amanuensis he was for some years, in consequence of her blindness. This remarkable woman testifies strongly to his deeply spiritual life. He wrote and spoke not as one who heard of these dark and light worlds, not as one who heard the din of conflict from afar, but as a dweller in those states, and as one who had borne his own part, and that not a small one, in the terrible conflict that was being waged, "His state of continuance in the dark world was for some years, not continuously but at intervals, during which," he says, "Heaven was closed to him."

The Religio-Philosophical Journal for March 24th ult. contains a striking report of a séance with Mrs. R. C. Simpson, who has so frequently shewn her ability to secure phenomena under depressing and deterrent conditions. The Rev. M. J. Savage, who has recently concerned himself with Spiritualism not altogether fairly and discreetly, was still possessed of candour sufficient to make him wish to see for himself this new thing. He therefore placed himself in communication with Colonel Bundy, and in his company and that of Mr. S. B. Perry visited Mrs. Simpson at her residence, 45, North Sheldon-street, Chicago. Mr. Savage brought his own slates, and took complete precautions against deception. I do not detail these, nor describe the plain table, nor the curtainless window through which the sunlight streamed. The test conditions were perfect. The way in which the experiments were made may be stated once for all:—

"Mr. Savage seated himself at one side of the rickety table, opposite the medium, who seated herself with her right side to the table, her whole person in full view of the three observers. A goblet, two-thirds full of water, was then placed upon Mr. Savage's slates, the medium then placed the slates upon her extended right hand, raised the table cover with the left, and passed her right, on which rested the slates and goblet, under the table, dropped the table cover, and placed her left hand upon her head. Here it may be said that in this and all subsequent experiments the medium's left hand was constantly upon her head or left side, and always in sight while the slates were out of view. Sounds were at once heard, indicating that the top of the goblet was in contact with the under side of the table."

Nine trials were made, five of them with Mr. Savage's own slates. The first, successful in a slight degree; the second similar; the third was made with Mrs. Simpson's slate which all ascertained to be perfectly clean. The result was very striking.

"The medium then took her own slate, which had been lying on the table, and which all present saw was clean and free of writing; she dropped upon it a tiny bit of pencil about the size of the head of a common pin, placed the goblet of water over the pencil and carried the slate under the table in the usual manner. She then asked Mr. Savage to make some remark upon any subject. 'I left Boston,' said Mr. S., 'in the sunshine and,'—before he could utter another word, the medium looking toward the corner where she seems to see Ski, said, as though repeating the words of the spirit: 'Take it out,' and suiting her action accordingly, brought the slate to view. Upon the slate and under the goblet was found plainly written: 'And you found sunshine here.' 'Remarkable,' said Mr. Savage, 'and done as quick as a flash. Absurd to say she could have done it.'"

The fourth, fifth, and sixth experiments were made with Mr. Savage's slates, and, in all, results similar to that quoted above were obtained. The very impressive point in these séances is this: The words written were, in nearly all cases, comments on conversation actually then going on among the observers. I recorded, in describing a séance I had with Monek, a similar case of writing a prescribed word within closed slates.* The experiment was completely satisfactory, so far as it went; but these go further and are cogent to a degree seldom attained. Mr. Savage attests the satisfactory nature of the results in a frank letter to Colonel Bundy, after reading in proof the article describing the séance.

"To the Editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal :—

"The above article, entitled, 'Minister and Medium,' I have just read in proof. It is more than true; for Colonel Bundy has made a careful under-statement of the facts. At the second sitting referred to at the end of the article, I was accompanied by a well-known business man of Chicago. So many and so remarkable things occurred that I cannot undertake to deal with them now. It very much surpassed the first day's sitting. The conditions seemed to be perfect. All was in plain daylight. The medium was frank and open. I got writing, over and over again, on such subjects, with such rapidity, and under such general conditions, that all talk of fraud or trickery appears to be absurd.

"I refrain from all further comment at this time, for the simple reason, that I have no time to write anything satisfactory before this proof must be returned. I may have something further to say hereafter.

"M. J. SAVAGE.

"Boston, March 15th, 1883."

The Brooklyn Eagle, which boasts the largest circulation of any evening paper in the United States, has an article on the thirty-fifth anniversary of modern Spiritualism, which is, in many ways, remarkable. It puts, in a forcible and yet temperate manner, arguments that have always greatly impressed me, and which I have frequently endeavoured to enforce, especially in my "Higher Aspects of Spiritualism." I venture to reproduce for the benefit of * "Psychography" (2nd edition), p. 17.

English readers what they will, I think, be glad to see the cogency of the statements is in no way impaired by the fact that the writer concludes his able argument by an attack on the illiterate tomfooleries of the spurious Shakespeares and Bacons, who, as he well says, "talk intolerable bosh in English simply execrable." They do, indeed; but then who believes that the mighty dead are represented by these great names? It is aggravating, unquestionably, to have one's faith discredited by the ineptitudes and buffooneries of these "lying spirits." But then, does the Brooklyn Eagle reflect what a portentous fact, how far-reaching in its significance, is even the most foolish utterance from the silent land? A reverent mind would gladly think that there all is orderly and wise, that folly is dead and buffoonery finds no place. But when one reflects on the average character of those from whom the dwellers in that land are recruited, it is not surprising that this pious thought is not in accord with fact. Still the significance of any utterance remains, and is of tremendous import.

This is the main portion of the article to which I have referred:—

"If it be granted that there is a spirit in man independent in its origin, action, and destiny, of his physical machinery, then it is only reasonable to expect that it will assert its independence, if not continually at least upon adequate occasions. Intense affection for the dead would seem to be such an occasion, and therefore when one person or another of unimpeachable truthfulness and sanity declares that a loved voice has spoken to him or her from within the veil that screens the spiritual from the material universe, it is an animal sensualism rather than a careful reason which would at once discredit his assertion. Of visible appearances also, it is wiser to hold the judgment in equipoise than to say rashly that it could not be. Indeed, the observer of mental and moral as well as physical phenomena will, as his circle of experience and observation enlarges, be less and less inclined to dogmatise as to what is possible and what impossible. The agnostic will, of course, treat all such stories of dreams, apparitions, voices, whether of information, warning, or consolation, as so many isles and promontories of mist and haze of which his intellectual map of heaven and earth is made up. But if he cannot affirm that such things are, neither can he affirm that they are not. His mind must, if he be a rational agnostic, be as a sheet of white, unwritten paper in regard to them. But the case is otherwise with all those who accept Christianity as a revelation from God. To these it is allowable to doubt the fact but not to deny the possibility. A Christian who should say that there has never been anything in dreams may be confronted with the fact that but for a dream Christianity would never have existed as a religion, that the Son of Man would never have lived long enough to die that He might give life to the world, and that the mighty drama of the Passion would never have been written upon human history."

The argument is continued thus:—

"And, if this be so, a fortiori is the Christian precluded from denying the possibility of visible appearances after death, and of the resurrection of the dead, by the inspired story of the ten or twelve appearances of Christ after He left the sepulchre in the garden, as well as by the miracle of the raising of Lazarus after His three days' burial. He who rejects the miraculous portions of the New Testament is not, of course, bound by the necessities we speak of; but nothing is more certain than that the believer in historical Christianity is irrevocably committed to an assent to the possibility of all such gleamings and interventions of the supernatural as the Spiritualists believe in. Moreover, to a mind capable of philosophic comparison, it is clear that Christianity, and indeed all religions that recognise the soul of man as a separate entity from the body, are spiritualistic in the higher sense. Communion with God and the answer to prayer, whether in spiritual or physical relief, if they have any reality at all, are supernatural, and in the same order as the fundamental principles of the Spiritualists. One might go further and argue from many episodes, both of the Old and New Testament, that such miraculous occurrences as the most extravagant and incredible of those believed in by the modern Spiritualists are set down in the Scriptures as matters of positive fact. Elijah is caught up in the fiery chariot, as Jesus in a cloud. 'The spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, and he was found at Azotus.' And the very evidence given by the Hebrew prophets of an enlightening work of God being diffused is that 'the sons and daughters shall prophesy, the old men shall see visions and the young men shall dream dreams.'"

And the writer concludes that "if Spiritualism is to be condemned upon a priori reasoning then revealed religion must lie in the same grave." When newspapers with "largest circulation" write like this it need not be elaborately argued that Spiritualism, even though its vulgar aspects be condemned, is a power that must be reckoned with.

The Contemporary Review appends to its current number the following note:—"We have received letters from intimate friends of Professor Zöllner indignantly denying Dr. de Cyon's statement that he 'died mad,' and asking us to publish this contradiction. M. von Weber writes, 'I know that he was until his last hours of life in the most healthy state of mind.' M. von Weber speaks with the commanding authority of a close personal friend. The slander has got some start, but I hope the snake may be scotched by this statement."

Mr. John Yarker, a name very familiar in unorthodox Freemasonry, communicates to the Theosophist some mesmerism experiments of his own which are very remarkable. His entranced subject had the faculty of projecting the soul beyond the limits of the body, of travelling to a distance, and of describing what she saw even so far away as in India. Mr. Yarker thus describes some almost incredible results of what was claimed to be a treatment of the spiritual body for the healing of disease in the physical body:—

"On one of these occasions she stated that her spiritual body had been sprinkled with some essence, which it was said would cause an eruption in twenty-four hours, and would bring away the diseased matter of the blood—for (it was said) a surgical operation on the projected soul would react on the material body;—I was astonished to find that the result predicted actually took place at the time, and the body exhaled an unknown aromatic perfume. On another occasion as predicted, after a surgical operation, said to be made upon the projected double raised about six inches, and in which the patient seemed to suffer great agony by cutting, a piece of hard tumour was brought away by the throat, which I saw. Relations were often made regarding a root from 'Black Wilderness,' said to be Indian, which was burned and inhaled, bruised, and the juice drunk or otherwise applied, and my subject got entirely well without the aid of the medical men."

"It is noteworthy that in making the passes the following was the result. I made them slovenly and was informed, 'With one pass you send me forward, with another you drag me back again. I made too many or too few, and was told,—You send me away beyond where my friends are waiting, or you do not give me strength to go far enough.'"

"I am aware that this is quite as extraordinary as your own relation, but I vouch for its entire truth, and made at the time the most accurate records of all my experiments."

A NEW DEFINITION OF A "SHELL."—Mr. Morse is, we believe, responsible for the definition that "a 'shell' is something that walks about with nothing inside it."

Light for All, (St. Francisco), has been considerably improved in size and appearance. Amongst other interesting articles it now contains a series of chapters on the rise and progress of Modern Spiritualism.

MR. J. T. MARKLEY, who used to contribute occasionally to the Spiritualist newspaper, has issued a second volume of poems entitled "Songs of Humanity." They are full of refined feeling and exhibit a cultured literary taste.

"For ever! we are not—we cannot be—lost for ever; death is to us change and not consummation: the commencement of a new existence, corresponding in character to deeds we have done in the body."—Sir Walter Scott, "Heart of Midlothian."

A SEANCE AT LEIPZIG.

A new German journal, the Spiritualistische Blätter, devoted to popularising and elucidating the reality of modern Spiritualism, contains in a recent number the letter of a medium to the editor, relating the way by which he was led to discover his gift. He says:—

"I made the acquaintance of Mr. Fox, the prestidigitator, at Berlin, in 1882. He said he was desirous of extending his professional operations. His representations led me to become his partner, I bringing in 10,000 marks (£500). His intention was to make an extensive anti-spiritualist tour armed with all the latest secrets of the Spiritualists which, he said, we could obtain from dealers in conjurers' tricks, but at high prices. This I found to be the case for the charge for the cord with which to do what is called the rope-trick, with the secret how to use it, was 300 marks, and so in proportion for other more elaborate contrivances."

"At the end of six months all was arranged, manager and assistants were engaged, when I met an old acquaintance, Herr Troll, who had been manager to Herr Hansen, the Danish professor of magnetism: he told me of a genuine spiritualist seance at Leipzig, the medium, whom he knew, being E. Schrapa. I determined to go, for neither I nor my partner had ever been to such a seance. I had assumed with him that what were called spiritual phenomena were conjuring tricks. I went with Herr Troll. Before the seance I was invited to examine the medium. At my request he stripped completely, and I found that beyond ordinary coat, waistcoat, trousers and socks, he had nothing upon him except watch and chain. His boots were put outside the room. I was appointed to tie him which I did effectively while he sat in an ordinary cane chair. He was tied and the cords sealed to the entire satisfaction of all present. His manager was placed in the centre of those present, bound with a cord, the ends of which were held by an inquirer like myself, whose passivity we also made sure of. I surveyed everything and was satisfied. The light was then turned off."

"Presently the medium's watch and chain were flung into the circle without being injured: then followed in succession his coat and his waistcoat; and finally the medium himself was dropped into our laps. After each separate manifestation light was struck that the knots and seals might be examined. They were all intact. The medium was apparently unconscious and perfectly passive. His manager said he was in trance. He was carried and placed in his chair."

"During these manifestations phosphoric lights moved about; there were raps more or less loud in different parts of the room; a musical box was whirled rapidly about overhead with other musical instruments playing."

"A hand touched mine; I took hold of it; it was certainly a living hand, but it melted away in my grasp."

"Then I had the irresistible conviction that there were forces of which I did not understand the cause and effect."

"On reaching my hotel with Herr Troll, raps sounded about the table, the bed, the wall, everywhere. I went out of the room and ascertained that the noises accompanied me to any part of the building. And it was not illusion, for they also who were with me heard them. I became thus aware that I was myself a medium. Subsequently I learnt that I could hold communication with my departed relatives."

"I communicated these experiences to my partner in Berlin, and asked him to come to Leipzig, that he might have the same. He came and saw similar phenomena to those which I have described. He said they were beyond his comprehension, but could not believe them to be spiritual. I asked him to reproduce them. He said he could not. Before the public he goes on acting upon the assumption that Spiritualism is trickery, without which assumption he could not maintain his position. Of course my partnership with Mr. Fox is dissolved at the loss of my money. But I am the gainer in happiness, and in the conviction of the truth of spiritual and immortal existence."

"The magnetic gift with which God has endowed me I purpose to employ in relieving and healing my suffering brethren."

"WILHELM WEDER."

Chemnitz, Saxony.

"MODERN THOUGHT" for May contains a brief article on "Thought-reading," by Sarah Mason, in which she records a series of experiments both with and without contact. She expresses an opinion that to some persons the exercise of this faculty is both mentally and physically injurious, but gives no facts in support of the statement.

SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA IN A PRIVATE FAMILY.

In Spiritisme, a periodical recently established in Paris, the organ of L'Union Spirite Française, Dr. Chazarain has a paper written principally for new inquirers. He relates in it the occurrence of phenomena, the authenticity of which he vouches for. Similar phenomena are still occurring in the family with which he is intimately related not only as physician but as a friend. He himself has been present when phenomena have occurred similar to those here detailed. He says:—

"The family of Madame D. is remarkable for intelligence and sound instruction. She has a favourite housekeeper, Madame V. F., who is a medium of varied characteristics. Two nurses, through constant association with this medium, have mediumship developed in them. Two young ladies, the Demoiselles G., near relatives of Madame D., come and pass a part of every day and every evening with her. All are in harmony together, and thus manifestations come under favourable conditions."

"Last February 24th—writes Madame D.—V. F., my housekeeper, was searching in a drawer for something; while I looked also, immediately over her shoulder, a quantity of violets, perfectly fresh, fell upon my head and then upon her. In the afternoon, violets fell upon her when in another room with the nurses. This manifestation of flowers was supposed to have reference to the day, it being V. F.'s jour de fête. In the evening, at our usual circle, immediately upon the extinction of the gas, came rapping on the table, and then we felt a fine shower of perfume upon us; then a white light floated around; finally flowers were distributed among us. When we lighted up we found flowers strewn over the carpet."

"25th.—We sat in the afternoon. To obscure the daylight the curtains were closed. After our singing, a luminous hand placed upon the table a quantity of flowers, and then presented a spig to each of us; we were five in number."

"26th.—Not being well, I kept my bed to-day. V. F., while she did some needlework at my bedside, laid her baby near her. The baby's christening had been appointed for to-day, but was postponed on account of my indisposition; for I wished to stand as godmother. While working, V. F. passed into trance. She rose, her countenance no longer her own, but radiant and beautiful. The spiritual personage controlling her asked for water. One of the nurses brought some. The spirit, through the medium, sprinkled the child's face, pronouncing the words "In the name of the Father I baptise thee!" then stooped and kissed the child's forehead. Then fell, in full light, a shower of violets upon the child. The medium sat down as the controlling spirit withdrew. The sprinkling and the violets caused the child to cry loudly, so I lifted her into the medium's lap, where she at once became quiet. The medium, recovering from her trance, was astonished and happy at what we had to tell her, and at the sight of the flowers covering her baby."

"At our seance in the evening, visible hands appeared and tapped the table in answer to our questions. Our little table bell was whirled round and round, sounding over our heads, and also my fan, which was used in such a way as to imitate the sound of a bird in flight. A visible hand put sweetmeats between our lips, but with the Demoiselles G. it teasingly put them to their lips, and drew them away again several times. Through the medium it was said that the hand was that of their deceased father, and they said that this used to be a way with him. A vaporous mass was seen at the medium's side. Then through her it was said that their father had endeavoured to materialise himself; that he hoped to be able to do so at a subsequent seance, and even to talk to them."

The notes of Madame D. end here. Dr. Chazaraïn tells the readers of Spiritisme that although such phenomena are inexplicable to all except to patient students of spiritualistic philosophy, yet it will be found on steady investigation that the operating forces in their production are not supernatural in the sense of miracle, but are analogous to those which are recognised in the science of the day.

A CURIOUS VISION.

The following account of a vision which occurred twice within a period of a few weeks was given me by Miss Schau, the lady whose narrative of the appearance of her brother's wraith was published in your number of April 28th. In respect of intelligence as well as of scrupulous truth she is an unexceptionable witness. The visions may of course have been purely subjective, but the fact that, on the last occasion at least, they seem to have lighted up the room, and that they ceased to be visible on shutting the eyes, would look like the intervention of some external agency.

H. WEDGWOOD.

"I am not a very good sleeper. One night, a few months ago, I was lying in my bed as usual waiting for sleep with my eyes shut. I was not ill, nor had I any mental troubles to prevent me. At last, weary, I turned round to alter my position, and to my great surprise I saw the room lighted up and something strange floating about. (I don't remember whether there was any moon or not.) "What can this mean?" I said aloud, and raised myself upright in my bed. I then perceived distinctly the whole space between me and the window filled with an infinite number of little winged heads, slowly moving up and down. At the same moment that I spoke a huge shadow beside my bed made a commanding gesture, and seized with awe I sank back. For a little while I lay quietly with shut eyes, and thought over the strange phantasmagoria I had just witnessed; then curiosity got the upper hand. I tried stealthily to look up, but great was my terror when I discovered the little heads quite close to my face, peeping under my eyelids, as if to ascertain whether my sleep was feigned or not. I was as ashamed as if I had been caught in a deceit; quickly I pressed my eyelids together, and thus probably soon fell asleep.

"Some weeks afterwards the vision was repeated, only with the difference that this time I know for certain that there was no moon. The light seemed to come from the little winged heads grouped together in one corner of the room. The same wavy movements were going on, but I involuntarily shut my eyes for a moment, and when again I looked, light and heads had vanished."

The Baroness von Vay has written a book entitled "Tagebuch eines Kleinen Mädchens," the profits on which are to be given to the Red Cross Society of Gönitz.

THE BRAHMA SOMAJ.—This remarkable religious movement is steadily gaining in power and usefulness in India. Any system of belief and practice that leads men to open their consciences, their intellects and their faculties to the revelation of Divine truth, thereby stimulating spiritual and true worship of God and a pure and noble life, cannot fail to win the hearts and sympathies of all who are interested in religious progress.

"THE OLD ORDER CHANGETH, GIVING PLACE TO NEW."—A certain bishop in the North country recently deplored the lack of enthusiasm and zeal amongst religious organisations of all grades of opinion. Bearing in mind the fact that when Christianity was introduced, the Romans and Greeks had lost all enthusiasm for Paganism, may we not see in this a sign of the times and reasonably look for the gradual advent of that higher and truer ideal of religious faith and practice which so many hopefully and trustfully look for? And, turning our eyes nearer home, may not the Spiritualist discern in the present apathy of those who once were full of zeal and earnestness, an indication that the old Spiritualism is moribund—its work done—and also find comfort in the thought that when the higher Spiritualism, which is slowly yet surely being evolved, stands revealed in its beauty and power, the old zeal and earnestness will again make itself felt as in the days that are even now beginning to seem distant. There is sometimes much to be learnt by reading between the lines.

PIECES JUSTIFICATIVES

OF THE NEED OF A SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH

CLAIRVOYANCE.

I find among my papers one or two more cases of clairvoyance which may be of use to put on record. The first case came to me from Mr. Glendinning, of Stockport, in answer to my letter in the Times in 1876. The subject in this case was a boy about ten years of age, named Frank M.

"I mesmerised him by making passes down from the head. I asked him to look in my father's house in Birkdale, Southport; where his father and mother and baby were also staying. We were at Aintree, sixteen miles from them. He described his father leaning against the fire-place, reading a railway time-table, but he said he would not come home that evening. He saw his mother reading on a couch; my father, he said, had a book with a black back; the baby was in bed; he described the room and contents—though he had not been in the room before; also my sister in another room playing the piano; another upstairs brushing her hair, with her dress off. He said the servant girl was taking out the tea-tray, &c., and then described the servants sitting down to their tea, afterwards washing up, &c. Strange as this may seem, all the details were verified. Unless he had seen them he could not have given such minute details. He is a very delicate boy, and very backward. He can learn nothing at school—in fact, he cannot repeat the alphabet. I have repeated these experiments several times, but only on this occasion with satisfactory results. Sometimes he was very dull and stupid, which caused me to be displeased with him; then all became clouded, and he could see nothing clear. Any further information about this boy I shall be happy to give."

The next case is of a different kind. It is one of those wherein an exaltation of the ordinary sense perceptions is brought about by illness. The lady who sent me the case, and who is an acute and careful observer, gave me full particulars as to name, &c., but which I am not at liberty to mention. Two or three cases of an exactly similar kind have reached me; and doubtless others are known to some of your readers.

"Some years ago I was acquainted with a Miss B., an elderly lady, active in all good works, but who suffered occasionally from 'very bad headaches.' During such times she was dull and depressed, but her senses were quickened in a strange and altogether abnormal way. Two instances of this I remember distinctly, and my impression is that her sister Mrs. X., with whom she and I were staying, spoke of both as having occurred frequently; but of this I am not quite sure. Miss B.'s room looked out on the garden at the back of the house, and whilst sitting there working she suddenly said to her sister, 'Annie, I hear the fisherwoman coming up to the front door; she has (so many) soles, and (so many) mackerel, in her basket, but don't buy the mackerel, for one of them is bad!' After a minute or two, the front door bell rang, and a servant came up to say the fisherwoman was there, and Mrs. X. going down found the contents of the basket as her sister had said. On another occasion (I think more than once), Mrs. X. entered the room, saying, 'Here is a letter for you,' and placed it in her sister's hand, with the address downwards. Miss B. closed her fingers over it, and remarked quietly, 'It is from so-and-so, and he says such-and-such things.' Items of news, messages, &c., all which, on opening the letter, they found to be written in it as she had said."

PROFESSOR ZÖLLNER.—Another refutation of the assertion of the Rev. Joseph Cook that Professor Zöllner was indignant at being denominated a Spiritualist reaches us; this time from Germany. The Spiritualistische Blätter for March 8th contains a statement that from letters received from the Professor previous to 1881, and from frequent conversations with him since that time, the writer can testify that "it was in no way disagreeable to him if his name was used in connection with Spiritualism," and that he (Professor Z.) never expressed the least doubt of the verity of the phenomena. The same paper also presents an interesting account of some most satisfactory physical manifestations occurring in Chemnitz, under strictly "fraud-proof" conditions, through the mediumship of Mr. Emil Schrapf.

LETTER FROM A SPIRITUALIST IN MEXICO.

The Révue Spirite gives the following from a letter which it has received from one of its old correspondents:—

"Mexico, which has had so many spiritualist journals, has only one at present. Do not imagine, however, that Spiritualism is fading out from among us. The reason is that men's minds have been for some years past strongly diverted into new channels. Our Government has granted various concessions to wealthy American companies, who have extended our railway system and constructed new lines, besides which we have had a vast immigration from Europe and the United States. All this has drawn the minds of people to worldly affairs, and Spiritualists have been left much to themselves. But circles continue to meet; and I know spiritualist families who, like my own, keep out of the business vortex. We have had some instances of Spiritualists being misled in their affairs by certain spirits who, while preaching ecclesiastical doctrine, have shewn a love of homage and a desire to rule, and who have injured those who trusted to them instead of exercising their own reason and judgment."

"In one of your numbers to hand I see an account of the doings of disorderly spirits. We had an instance here not long ago. In one of our suburbs was the tenement of a woman who had a retail business in wood and charcoal. After retiring to rest, her place used to resound with noises as of her stock being thrown about. On rising after sleepless nights she found things undisturbed. She told her neighbour, a shoemaker. He volunteered to fathom the mystery. At night she went to sleep with a relation close at hand, and the shoemaker gave his mind to watching in her place. His report in the morning was that, after fastening up, all being quiet, he laid down on the mattress, with a stout stick by his side, and blew out his light. Presently came sounds of all the wood in the place being thrown about. Starting up, with threats against the invaders, he reached for his stick, and felt it, not with his hand but on his shoulders, on which in the dark was dexterously dealt, blow after blow, until he called out Mercy! He then found his way out. He declined watching again. The woman had to give up the tenement."

"I have also an experience. It may be due to one of our domestics being a strong medium. One night, at my house half a league from the city, I was roused from sleep by sounds as of men knocking down the court-yard wall. Then the sounds shifted to the parapet of the house, as if that were being knocked down. That subsiding, I thought my horse must really be loose and kicking everything to ruin in his stable, which opens upon the court-yard. By this time I had got my clothes on, when suddenly all noise ceased, and I returned to bed. In the morning the horse and stable were all right, so also the walls. All this seems to have been done just to disturb us in the house."

"In the immediate vicinity of our medium, Nina, we are often made aware of the action of some spirit, not, perhaps, of an elevated character, but occasioning reflection. One day, coming in from the city, she took her new silk kerchief from her shoulders, and hung it across a chair while she went to the kitchen; when she came back it was gone. Wanting fruit, I told her to follow me into the garden with a basket. Not far from the house is an orange-tree; looking among its branches for fruit I espied Nina's fine kerchief tied, cravat-fashion, on a high branch out of reach without the ladder."

"One day I had laid my watch on my writing table, and presently I saw on the face of it a thimble. I called Nina's attention to it, and she recognised it as belonging to her sister, who lives in the city. I went into the town next day, and purposely took the thimble to her sister. She claimed it and had been charging a neighbour with having taken it. She now ran to the neighbour and begged her pardon. The sister is a medium."

"But they can do things not mischievous. Having to be in the city very early one morning, I asked at a séance that I might be awakened at a certain hour. At the precise time loud raps awoke me and also the servants."

"At our séances in town we sometimes place the medium behind a curtain seated in a chair with a high back of open cane work. Once, so placed, the spirits, through the medium, asked for my little boy's india-rubber ball, four inches in diameter. It was put behind the curtain. The ball was beaten about while a guitar at the top of a wardrobe was loudly thrummed in accompaniment to its bounds. The séance over, we found the medium immovably fixed by her hair, separated into strands, being passed through the open cane work and tied together at the back of the chair. A puzzle for a conjurer. It took us a quarter-of-an-hour to liberate her."

"Nina can neither read nor write. She is a medium of various characteristics, and is easily controlled by spirits. Under certain conditions these are of an elevated character, immeasurably beyond her own. We have séances at which one of our neighbours, a physician, takes part, which are of great interest, and which, under more propitious circumstances, I propose to publish."

THOUGHT-TRANSFERENCE v. CLAIRVOYANCE.

By JOHN S. FARMER.

On Saturday, April 27th, I had a séance of half-an-hour's duration, with Miss C. E. Wood, at which I tested "Pocha's" power of reading clairvoyantly the names of cards hidden both from myself and the medium. Before commencing, the latter informed me she had a very bad headache and was not therefore, I presume, in the best of conditions for obtaining satisfactory results. She was, however, very desirous that the trial should be made, and the sitting commenced at 9.15.

I had previously obtained a new pack of cards, and having shuffled them well placed them face downwards on the table. As an additional precaution I bandaged Miss Wood's eyes with a silk handkerchief, but even had this not been done it would have been impossible for her to have seen the cards, as during the whole of the sitting their faces were never turned up until after the cards selected had been named, when, of course it was exposed to view in order to ascertain whether it had been correctly designated or not.

"Pocha" controlled Miss Wood five minutes after the séance commenced and placed the medium's hands upon the cards, but, as I have said, never attempting to "face" them. After the lapse of ten minutes she drew one card from the pack, and laying it on the table apart from the others and still back upward, her hands being placed over it, attempted to name it. The card was then turned and I then, seeing it for the first time, informed "Pocha" whether she had been successful or the reverse. Five experiments were made with the following results:—

- Ex. 1. Card as named, eight of diamonds; proved to be the six of diamonds.
- Ex. 2. Card as named, Queen then correcting herself immediately, "Pocha" said, "No; it is the Knave." "What suit?" I asked. "A black suit, but I cannot see which." The card proved to be the Knave of clubs.
- Ex. 3. Card as named, two of hearts; proved to be the three of clubs.
- Ex. 4. Card as named, Knave of spades. Correct.
- Ex. 5. Card as named, King of clubs. Correct.

Although these experiments are not by any means conclusive they seem to establish a prima facie case for further experiments. It will be seen that two of the readings were correct on the first trial; one reading was correct on the second trial as regards the name and colour of the suit; and that two experiments were nearly correct in the number and quite so as regards the suit of the card selected—under the circumstances a very satisfactory result. I hope Miss Wood will cultivate this phase of her mediumship.

PROGRESS IN BRAZIL.—The Moniteur Spirite (Belgium) informs us that a new Spiritualist Review, the Reformador, Organ Evolucionista, has made its appearance with the new year at Rio de Janeiro. One department of it is devoted to Science and its relations, and to the discussion of new ideas. In his introductory article the editor says:—"It is to Spiritualism that is reserved the task, glorious because difficult, of effecting the harmonious alliance between science and religion."

HINTS AND SUGGESTIONS FOR INQUIRERS INTO SPIRITUALISM.

In view of the current issue of "LIGHT" being brought to the notice of many who will be more or less new to the subject of Spiritualism it may not be altogether out of place to throw out a few suggestions for their guidance.
